This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

Divine Providence, under whose patronage alone the Christian's Penny Magazine was commenced, has brought it successfully to the close of the first year. That it has answered its professed end, in promoting the edification of the many thousands of its readers, the numerous letters from Clergymen of the Church of England, and Ministers and Friends of different denominations, acknowledging their obligation, amply testify. In thus advancing the glory of God in the welfare of men, its Conductors have richly received their most valued reward. They have endeavoured to furnish a series of the most instructive papers, illustrative of the Wonderful Works—the Universal Providence—and the Inspired Word of the ever-blessed God, worthy of the sacred title which their humble Periodical assumes; and in some good measure they have succeeded. At the same time they are confident that no sentiment has been inculcated at variance with Evangelical Charity, or with those divine doctrines, which are the glory of Protestant Christianity.

To their various and respectable Correspondents, the Conductors of the Christian's Penny Magazine present their grateful acknowledgments, requesting the continuance of their esteemed favours. To their numerous and increasing Readers, they would offer their assurance, that their Publication, in the new year, will contain an improved succession of valuable papers, from the pens of those, who have merited the esteem and confidence of the public, by their interesting writings and labours.

The appetite for intellectual food is increasing. So great is the craving for it, that no period of our history has exhibited the same degree of solicitude; and it must now receive that aliment with which it will be satisfied. The rising generation and youth of our country are thirsting; and unless the streams of "the water of life" are made to flow towards them, the enemies of God and truth will supply them with the impurities and poisons of the lake of death. While, therefore, we sincerely rejoice in the prosperity of every Society, and of every Publication, having for their object the "Diffusion of Useful Knowledge," we cannot forget that Earth is not the boundary of human existence. That which is useful, though necessary and good, will yet "perish in the using;" and nothing but that which is inseparably connected with the Glorious Gospel of the blessed God "is incorruptible seed, which liveth and abideth for ever." This inseparable connection we profess uniformly to regard; and determine that it shall constitute the chief glory of our pages; while, like the sacred volume of Divine Inspiration, they embrace the principal branches of that knowledge which is really and permanently Useful.

Patronage we have recently sought, at the suggestion of esteemed Metropolitan Clergymen, and respectable patronage we readily obtained. Under such sanction, the Christian's Penny Magazine, we are assured, will become much more extensively circulated, especially in pious Families and Sunday Schools, and among the busy Mechanics and reading Cottagers of our country. One great object especially is sought by our Publication—the preparation of our countrymen for the participation of the Intelligence, Holiness, and Happiness of that glorious state of our world which is approaching, because Almighty God has sworn, "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord;—for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Num. xiv, 21; Isa. xi, 9. Bible and Missionary Societies, therefore, and every Institution calculated to hasten that renovated state in our world, shall have our humble but cordial advocacy.

Again, as in the first number of their Publication, the Conductors of the Christian's Penny Magazine declare, "that their Work shall not be Political, nor Sectarian, nor Controversial, except so far as regards Infidelity and Immorality. With them it will urge a determined warfare, as the worst enemies of our countrymen; yet the contest will be carried on in the spirit of that name, which has been assumed for the title of this Magazine." They therefore confidently ask the countenance of all who hold sacred Knowledge and Patriotism, Morality and Scriptural Religion.

EXPLANATION OF THE VIGNETTE IN THE TITLE PAGE.

The four principal figures in the Vignette are intended to represent the chief Protestant Reformers: Luther in the centre, Cranmer on his right hand, Knox on his left, and Calvin on his extreme right: each holding in his hand a manuscript or printed copy of the word of God. The Rock, on which they are standing, is intended to denote the Truth of the doctrine of the Divine Oracles; on which, as on an immutable Rock, the Reformers rested all their claims, in labouring to restore pure Christianity. Around the Rock of Truth, the waves of Error and Superstition are seen dashing; and in that sea appear plunged and struggling for existence, the four chief supporters of the Papal Antichrist. The principal figure represents His Holiness the Pope, with his triple crown, grasping in one hand his once dreadful Bull, and in the other, his formerly terrible sceptre. On his right hand appears a bloated Mendicant Friar; on the left, a wily Jesuit; and on his extreme right a Romish Dignitary, each with his peculiar symbols of hypocrisy, imposture, and terror; but all become useless to their possessors, in the presence of the published Holy Scriptures.

Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, and Knox, have laid Europe and the whole world under the greatest obligations to them, by their courageous, indefatigable, and successful labours; overthrowing the Priestcraft of Popery, that blasphemous "Man of Sin," and "Mystery of Iniquity," 2 Thess. ii; and restoring to the people the Holy Scriptures, as their only infallible directory in matters of Religion.

Although we have adorned our Periodical with the effigies of those illustrious men, we are not prepared to call either of them "Master." We esteem One infinitely more worthy, to whom alone we are directed by their imperishable writings: "One is our Master, even Christ, and all these are brethren." Our principles are those for which the Martyrs, especially the British Martyrs, shed their blood; and their united testimony declares, in the language of Chillingworth, "The Bible—the Bible only—is the Religion of Protestants:" or, in the words of the Protestant clergy in Ireland, recently adopted as their noble maxim—"The Bible—the whole Bible—and nothing but the Bible."

In our future labours we shall have occasion to pourtray more fully the immortal labours of Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, and Knox; and for that reason we shall only just notice a few particulars respecting them.

Martin Luther, the father of the Protestant Reformation in Germany, was born at Isleben in Saxony, in 1483. He was educated for the law; but on becoming pious, in his twenty-first year, he retired to a monastery, to study for the service of religion. Providence directing him to a neglected Latin Bible, he became acquainted with the purity of Evangelical truth, and a most zealous preacher of the Gospel of Christ. In 1517, he began to oppose the impositions of Popery, especially in the sale of Indulgences, and the iniquitous courses of the priests and monks. In 1520 the Pope excommunicated Luther, when he publicly burnt the papal decrees before an immense concourse of people, relinquishing all connection with the Bishop of Rome, and declaring him Antichrist. Luther commenced a translation of the Holy Scriptures into the German language, and completed that inestimable work, which incalculably served the cause of truth and religion. After a series of the most important services in the cause of Christ and of his country, Luther died in the full assurance of hope, in 1546.

John Calvin, the father of the Protestant Reformation in France, was born in 1509, at Noyon in Picardy. He was educated for the church at Paris, but in reading the Holy Scriptures, his mind was renewed, and led to discover the abominations of Popery. This led him to devote himself to the study of the law: but on embracing the doctrines of Luther, he was persecuted in France, on which he fled to Switzerland, where, in 1535, he published his celebrated work, entitled "Institutes of the Christian Religion," dedicated to Francis I, king of France. In the year following he settled at Geneva, where he continued a most laborious professor of divinity, and indefatigable preacher of the Gospel, with some intermissions, until his death in 1564. Calvin's fame for learning and piety was great throughout Europe, especially in England; and after the death of Luther, he was regarded as the chief pillar of the Protestant Reformation.

Thomas Cranmer, the father of the Protestant Reformation in England, was born in 1489, at Aslacton in Nottinghamshire. He was educated for the church at Jesus College, Cambridge. Luther's writings attracted the attention of Cranmer; by which he was led to search the Scriptures, to make them the only rule of his faith, and to favour the doctrines of the Reformation. Approving of Henry VIII divorcing his Queen Catherine, who had been before married to his elder brother, he was introduced to the king, and by him promoted in 1533 to be Archbishop of Canterbury. His influence with the king was exerted in favour of the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, which had been translated into English by Tindal. Cranmer employed his power, during the reign of Edward VI, in promoting the cause of pure Christianity, and made various preliminary arrangements towards perfecting the Reformation of religion in England: but in 1556, under Mary, he suffered martyrdom.

John Knox, the father of the Protestant Reformation in Scotland, was born in that country at Haddington, or at the neighbouring village of Gifford. He was educated for the ministry in the Romish Church: but he imbibed the doctrines of the Reformation, partly from the martyr Wishart, and partly from his study of the Scriptures. Knox was some time chaplain to Edward VI, and one of the six Home Missionaries, licensed to preach the Gospel through the kingdom. He refused a bishopric, and retired to the continent, and assisted in the translation of the Geneva Bible. In 1559, he returned to Edinburgh, and became the principal agent in perfecting the Reformation in his native country, and establishing the church of Scotland. He died in 1572, greatly honoured by the principal men in the kingdom.

APPEAL TO THE BRITISH PEOPLE.

Britons! intelligent, pious, and generous Britons! A crisis has arrived in our history. Upon yourselves, under the blessing of Providence, much, far beyond all human calculation, depends, as to the interests of our country, and the circumstances of our posterity. "The schoolmaster is abroad," and we have become, not only a numerous people, but a nation of readers, from the highest to the lowest in society. This peculiarity may become an evil: but with a proper direction, it may be made to contribute to the virtue and the greatness, to the security and happiness of our country.

Judiciously has the present Bishop of London said, in his first charge, "The almost universal diffusion of elementary knowledge furnishes the enemies of Revealed Religion with abundant materials to work upon: but then it also furnishes the friends of truth with the obvious means of counteracting the influence of erroneous doctrines, and of instilling sounder principles into the bulk of the community. Any attempt to suppress, or even to check, the spirit of inquiry which is abroad in the world, would not only be a vain and fruitless attempt, but a violation of the indefeasible liberty of the human mind, and an interference with its natural constitution. To impart to that spirit a right direction, to sanctify it with holy motives, to temper it to righteous purposes, to shape it to ends which lie beyond the limits of this beginning of our existence, will be the endeavour of those who desire to make the cultivation of intellect conducive to moral improvement, and to establish the Kingdom of Christ at once in the understandings and affections of mankind."

Intelligent and benevolent Britons! Shall our fellow countrymen be carried away with the stream of deistical Freethinking? Shall we become a nation of Infidels? A large portion of the press holds a truce with Infidelity, and ridicules every thing sacred. Shall we be satisfied with their preoccupying and filling the minds of our mechanics, our labourers, and our youth, with that which is inflammatory and injurious? Sincerely may every true Christian rejoice, that there is much put forth that is "Scientific," "Entertaining," and "Useful:" but every one knows, that there is a mass of reading supplied in the cheapest form, of a character which is antichristian and destructive.

Shall we make no corresponding efforts to vindicate the honour of our Divine Christianity? Shall we practically surrender the Bible? Or shall we labour, according to our professed obligations, to counteract or cure the pernicious epidemic? Ponder seriously these momentous considerations.

A writer of no ordinary mind observes, "The storm which now threatens Europe is no passing cloud. The stream and tendency of opinion in Europe is eminently revolutionary; it is powerful to destroy, but weak to rebuild. Old institutions are rapidly falling before it; but the new institutions which were intended to supply the place of their predecessors, perish still more rapidly than those which they have supplanted. There is no stability, because there is little religion. But God is employing all these political changes and convulsions to introduce one great and permanent revolution, the change of the kingdoms of this world into the everlasting kingdom of the Saviour. The Christian, therefore, while he is warranted to rejoice that those civil and ecclesiastical tyrannies are falling on every side which have so long barred the entrance of the truth, and that freedom, which is the birth-right of every man, should at length be imparted in all probability to many nations, will yet regard this extension of liberty rather as a means than as an end, as accelerating the approach of the reign of the Just One, rather than as sufficient of itself to procure many lasting blessings to men who are as yet but indifferently prepared to receive them.

"The purpose of God is to 'overturn, overturn, overturn,' till He comes to whom by right the kingdom belongs, and these changes are likely to increase in rapidity and intensity, the nearer we approach to the advent of the universal King. While a Christian, therefore, gives thanks to God for the spread of liberty, he will be most anxiously desirous that God, by his Spirit, should teach men the true use of the blessing; nor will His views rest in these transitory mercies, or ever stop short of that glorious period when all shall partake of spiritual liberty as well as civil, and become partakers of the freedom and inheritance of the children of God."

Personally, as Christians, the servants of God have nothing to fear on earth, how tumultuous soever it may be; "for we know that all things work together for good, to them that love God." Still we have interests at stake, the greatest, and the dearest which can possibly be contemplated, next to our own personal salvation. Our children, and "our children's children," and our property, liberty, and privileges for their sakes, we must desire to transmit to them unimpaired as their inheritance. Their welfare, in every respect, is involved in the character of the present and future age; and every thing which affects their interests must be dear to us—as men—as patriots—and as Christians.

The Conductors of the "Christian's Penny Magazine" hold sacred the principles of the Protestant Reformation; and they deem it right to declare, that their Work will not be Political, nor Sectarian, nor Controversial, except so far as regards Infidelity and Immorality. With them it will wage a determined warfare, as the worst enemies of our countrymen; yet the contest will be carried on in the spirit of that name, which has been assumed as the title of their Magazine.

Assistance and cooperation from their talented friends, they respectfully request, in rendering effectual this humble attempt to befriend their countrymen, and to make their labours the means of furnishing rational entertainment, useful instruction, and Christian edification.

EVILS OF POPULAR IGNORANCE.

SOLOMON, by divine inspiration, has said, "That the soul be without knowledge, it is not good." Facts of the most appalling description, from every part of our country, at once prove and illustrate this heaven-born sentiment. Mr. Foster remarks—

"One of the most melancholy views in which a human being can be presented to us, is when we behold a man of perhaps seventy years, sunk in the gross stupidity of an almost total ignorance of all the most momentous subjects, and reflect, that more than three thousand Sundays have passed over him, of which every hour successively has been his time, since he came to an age of some natural capacity for mental exercise. Perhaps some compassionate friend may have been pleading in his behalf, Alas! what opportunity, what time, has the poor mortal ever had? His lot has been to labour hard through the week, throughout almost his whole life. Yes, we answer, but he has had three thousand Sundays; what would not the most moderate improvement of so immense a quantity of time have done for him?—But the ill-fated man (perhaps rejoins the commiserating pleader) had no advantages of education, had nothing in any sense deserving the name. There, we reply, you strike the mark. Sundays are of no practical value, nor Bibles, nor the enlarged knowledge of the age, nor Heaven, nor Earth, to beings brought up in estrangement from all discipline of their minds.

"How many families have we seen, where the parents were only older and stronger animals than their children, where they could teach nothing but the methods and tasks of labour. They naturally could not be the mere companions, for alternate play and quarrel, of their children, and were disqualified by mental rudeness to be their respected guardians. There were about them these young and rising forms, containing the inextinguishable principle, which was capable of entering on an endless progression of wisdom, goodness, and happiness; needing numberless suggestions, explanations, admonitions, and brief reasonings, and a training to follow the thoughts of written instruction. But nothing of all this from the parental mind. Their case was as hopeless for receiving this benefit, as the condition for physical nutriment of infants attempting to draw it (we have heard of so affecting and mournful a fact) from the breast of a dead parent. The unhappy heads of families possess no resources for engaging and occupying, for at once amusing and instructing, the younger minds; no descriptions of the most wonderful objects, or narratives of the most memorable events, to set, for superior attraction, against the idle stories of the neighbourhood; no assemblage of admirable examples, from the sacred or other records of human character, to give a beautiful real form to virtue and religion, and promote an aversion to base companionship.

"Now imagine a week, month, or year, of the intercourse spent in such a domestic society, the course of talk, the mutual manners, and the progress of the mind and character; where there is a sense of drudgery approaching to that of slavery, in the unrelenting necessity of labour; where there is none of the interest of imparting knowledge or receiving it, or of reciprocating knowledge that has been imparted and received; where there is not an acre, if we might express it so, of intellectual space around them, clear of the thick universal fog of ignorance; where, especially, the luminaries of the spiritual heaven, the attributes of the Almighty, the grand phenomenon of redeeming mediation, the solemn realities of a future state and another world, are totally obscured in that shade; where the conscience and the discriminations of duty are dull and indistinct, from the youngest to the oldest; where there is no genuine respect felt or shown on the one side, nor affection unmixed with vulgar petulance and harshness, expressed perhaps in wicked imprecations, on the other; where a mutual coarseness of manners and language has the effect, without their being aware of it as a cause, of debasing their worth in one another's esteem, all round; and where, notwithstanding all, they absolutely must pass a great deal of time together, to converse, and to display their dispositions towards one another, and exemplify what the primary relations of life are reduced to, when divested of all that is to give them dignity, endearment, and conduciveness to the highest advantage of existence."

THE ANTIQUITY OF THE BIBLE.

IN what point of view soever we regard the Bible, we must acknowledge that it is an extraordinary book. And whether we consider our readers as Britons or as Christians, we are persuaded that we shall render them an essential service by calling their attention to its Antiquity. We extract therefore the chapter with the above title, from a popular and valuable little work—"The Companion to the Bible."

"That the Bible has existed from very remote ages, will not be disputed, except by those who are grossly ignorant. The proofs of its antiquity are, beyond all comparison, more numerous and convincing, than can be advanced in favour of any other book in existence. It has never been without its intelligent witnesses, and zealous guardians; though some of them have been the greatest perverters of its peculiar principles, or the bitterest enemies of the Christian name.

"The Old Testament has been preserved by the Jews, in every age, with a scrupulous jealousy, and with a veneration for its words and letters, bordering on superstition; demonstrating their regard for it as divinely inspired. The Hebrews never were guilty of negligence in relation even to the words of their sacred books; for they used to transcribe and compare them so carefully, that they could tell how often every letter came over again in writing any book of the Old Testament.

"The Old Testament contains, besides the account of the former ages of the world, the code of the Jewish laws, both civil and religious; and the records of their national history, for more than one thousand nine hundred years, from the call of Abraham; as well as prophecies, which regarded a distant futurity, and which have respect to times yet to come. The celebrated Roman historian Tacitus, who lived in the apostolic age, speaks of the Jewish books as very ancient in his time. They were translated from the Hebrew into the Greek language more than two thousand and one hundred years ago; and they were possessed in both those languages by the Jews. By those Jews who lived among the Greeks, they were read in their synagogues every sabbath day, in the translation, the same as the Hebrew Scriptures were read by the native Jews: commentaries were written upon them by their learned doctors; copies of them were circulated in every nation where the Jews were scattered, and thus the sacred books were multiplied without number.

"The books of Moses, including Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, were written more than three thousand and three hundred years ago, and nearly fifteen hundred years before the Christian era; many of the other books were published above a thousand years, and those of the elder prophets about eight hundred years before the advent of Christ.

"As to the writings of uninspired men, they are modern compared with the Holy Scriptures. The earliest profane history which is known is that of Herodotus, in Greek; which was written no earlier than the time of Malachi, the last of the Old Testament writers. Somewhat more ancient than Herodotus, are the poems of Homer and Hesiod: the period in which they were written cannot be correctly ascertained; but those who allow them the remotest antiquity, place Homer only in the days of Isaiah the prophet, and Hesiod in the age of Elijah. It is not, indeed, agreed among the learned, whether there ever was such a person as Hesiod. The books of these ancient, uninspired writers are of a quite different character from the Holy Scriptures; they are filled with silly and absurd fables, and contain many impurities. They make no discovery of the just character of the only living and true God, though they contain much concerning religion. As to the history by Herodotus, it contains much that is merely fabulous and untrue; but as far as it records the transactions of his own age, or describes the things within the compass of his own observation, or details matters of fact of which he was correctly informed, his statements confirm the faithfulness and accuracy of the records contained in the holy and inspired word of the Lord."

THE FRUITS OF INFIDELITY.

Mr. Editor,

If you think the following suitable for your intended Magazine, it is at your service, with my best wishes. Z.

Infidelity continues to rage! but "great is truth, and it must prevail!" May every possible effort be made to advance the one and confound the other! The unskilful villager and inexperienced youth require the friends of wisdom and virtue to fortify their minds against the influence of pernicious principles. May these classes never be forgotten by the intelligent advocates of morality and religion.

Our divine Master has given us a comprehensive though simple rule, calculated for universal adoption, in reference not only to teachers, but also with respect to principles: "By their fruits ye shall know them." A short time ago, I was led to try its application in the case of deistical infidelity: not so much to satisfy my own mind as to lead myself into a more grateful contemplation of the value of revealed religion, of "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord."

Mentioning to a gentleman of property and of professed liberality of thinking, a case of Christian charity, for which I was soliciting contributions, he made me an abrupt reply. With a tone and countenance expressive of ineffable contempt and self-complacency, he delivered himself in substance as follows: "I am one of those persons who do not believe in that book called the Bible, as divinely inspired. I regard it as the work of interested priests, contrived to uphold and support their craft. The noble mind of man does not need a divinely written law as its guide of life; and I do not believe that God ever gave a written revelation."

I was astonished at the unhesitating boldness of this avowal, and a number of queries soon arose in my mind respecting the moral influence of such disbelief. "What," said I, "is the real genius of this rejection of the Bible? Is it more rational, more virtuous, or blissful, than repentance towards God and faith in the doctrine of atonement by our Lord Jesus Christ? Does it sanctify the conjugal relation? Does it excite and direct parental and filial affection? Does it contribute to the endearments of domestic intercourse? Does it strengthen the social compact? Does it inspire the sacred flame of patriotism? Does it elevate the tone of universal philanthropy? Does it afford any powerful stimulus to virtue?" I forbear to state what I know of the influence of Deism in the case to which I have made allusion. To each of the foregoing reasonable questions, veritable facts compelled me to give an unqualified negative. The practical denial of Christianity has never, in any age or nation, contributed, in the smallest degree, either to exalt the character, or to advance the happiness of man.

Are there, then, no moral benefits in existence, the fruits of Deism? If there be, where are they to be discovered? In what nation, or province, or city? Where is the town or village that they have blessed with elevating knowledge and fraternal concord? Do the fruits of Deism appear in asylums prepared for the foundling and orphan?—in the schools established for the instruction of the ignorant poor?—in the retreats erected for the repose of the aged?—in the hospitals endowed for the sick and diseased? Have its professors sent forth and supported missionaries to enlighten and civilize the barbarous and idolatrous nations?—or have they directed their united energies to emancipate the slave, and purchase liberty for the oppressed captive? Ah, no! None of these works of benevolence have been either accomplished or undertaken by the sons of infidelity, the votaries of Deism. Deism has reared to its immortal fame no monuments of mercy in any land in any quarter of the world.

Its spirit is indeed distinguished, but it is principally from being shrunk with selfishness. "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," cannot possibly have any place in its system of morals. It has no golden rule of duty, nor any solid ground of immortal anticipation. Its gloomy futurity is bounded by the impenetrable darkness of the grave, at best by the yawning gulph of terrifying uncertainty.

Let the poor, the unlearned, and the young, learn to judge of principles by their fruits, and with abhorrence they will soon reject every attack upon their most holy faith. Thus they will be prepared to say, with Dr. Watts, that example of human excellence and universal benevolence,

"Should all the forms that men devise
Assault my faith with treach'rous art,
I'd call them vanity and lies,
And bind the gospel to my heart."

ON THE CHANGES THAT TAKE PLACE IN NATURE.

Surrounded as we are by wonders of every kind, and existing only by a miraculous concurrence of events, admiration seems the natural avocation of our being; nor is it easy to pronounce amidst such a creation what is most wonderful. But few things appear more incomprehensible than the constant production and reabsorption of matter.—An animal falls to the ground and dies, myriads of creatures are now summoned, by a call, by an impulse of which we have no perception, to remove it, and prepare it for a new combination; chemical agencies, fermentation and solution, immediately commence their actions to separate the parts, and in a short time, of all this great body nothing remains but the framework or bones, perhaps a little hair or some wool, and all the rest is departed we know not whither! Worms and insects have done their parts; the earth has received a portion, and the rest, converted into gases and exhalable matters, has dispersed all over the region, which, received into vegetable circulation, is again separated and changed, becomes modified anew, and nourishes that which is to continue the future generations of life. The petal of the rose; the pulp of the peach; the azure and the gold on the wing of the insect; all the various productions of the animal and vegetable world; the very salts and compounds of the soil, are but the changes some other matters have undergone, which have circulated through innumerable channels since the first production of all things, and no particle been lost. Bearing in mind this assured truth, that all these combinations have not been effected by chance or peculiarity of circumstance, but the predetermination of an Almighty Intelligence, who sees the station, progress, and final destination of an atom, what an infinity of power and intellective spirit does this point out! An Omnipotence, the bodied minds of us poor creatures cannot conceive. Truly may we say, "who can find out the Almighty to perfection!"—Journal of a Naturalist.

CRIME IN ENGLAND AND WALES, &c.

The number of criminals committed during the last year, throughout England, has been in the proportion of 1 to 740 inhabitants; in Wales, 1 to 2,320; in Scotland, 1 to 1,130; and in Ireland, 1 to 490. In London and Middlesex, the proportion of commitments has been higher than in any other county in England, being 1 criminal to 400 inhabitants. In Surrey, the proportion is 1 to 680; in Kent, 1 to 730; in Sussex, 1 to 750; in Essex, 1 to 650; in Hertfordshire, 1 to 520; in Bedfordshire, 1 to 710. In the manufacturing districts, the proportion is, in Lancashire, 1 to 650; in Warwickshire, 1 to 480; in Gloucestershire (including Bristol), 1 to 630; in Nottinghamshire, 1 to 750; in Cheshire, 1 to 630. In the more remote counties, the proportion is small; that of Northumberland being only 1 to 2,700; in Westmoreland, 1 to 2,500; in Durham, 1 to 2,460; and in Cornwall, 1 to 1,600. In Rutland also, the proportion is very much smaller than in the adjacent counties. In Wales, the highest proportion of offenders is found in the most populous county, Glamorgan; while Cardigan presents the lowest proportion of crime in any county of the United Kingdom, being only 1 to 4,920. In the large manufacturing counties of Scotland, the proportion is nearly as high as in England: in Edinburgh it is 1 to 540; in Lanark, the most populous county, 1 to 600. In Ireland, the highest proportion of crime is in the city of Dublin, where there has been 1 criminal to 96 inhabitants: in the city of Waterford, the proportion is 1 to 125. Of the counties in Ireland, that which has the largest proportion is Longford, being 1 to 260: the lowest proportion is in Downshire, which has only 1 criminal to 990 inhabitants. Of the total number of persons convicted in Ireland, viz. 9,902, only 262 were sentenced to death; and of these, 95 were for offences against the person: of the 262 sentenced to death, 39 suffered.—Eclectic Review for April 1832.

Crime is well ascertained to be the consequence of ignorance: ignorance not merely of letters, but of pure, scriptural religion. He is therefore the best friend to the people, who is most successful in promulgating the unadulterated truths of Christianity.

ON A TEAR.

Oh that the chemist's magic art
 Could crystallize this sacred treasure!
Long should it glitter near my heart,
 A secret source of pensive pleasure.

The little brilliant, ere it fell,
 Its lustre caught from Chloe's eye,
Then, trembling, left its coral cell—
 The spring of sensibility.

Sweet drop of pure and pearly light!
 In thee the rays of virtue shine;
More calmly clear, more mildly bright,
 Than any gem that gilds the mine.

Benign restorer of the soul,
 Who ever flies to bring relief,
When first we feel the rude control
 Of love or pity, joy or grief.

The sage's and the poet's theme,
 In every clime, in every age;
Thou charm'st in fancy's idle dream,
 In reason's philosophic page.

That very law which moulds a tear,
 And bids it trickle from its source,
That law preserves the earth a sphere,
 And guides the planets in their course.

MY BOOK OF WISDOM.

Mr. Editor,

If you think any of the extracts from my "Book of Wisdom," will be useful to your readers, I shall be gratified by your using them in the projected "Christian's Penny Magazine." I herewith send you a few of them.

"No revenge is more heroic, than that which torments envy by perseverance in doing good."

"Money, like manure, does no good till it is spread. There is no real use of riches, except in the distribution: the rest is all conceit, or delusion."

"Pitch upon that course of life which is the most excellent; and habit will render it most agreeable and delightful."

"There is but one way of fortifying the soul against all gloomy presages and terrors of the mind; and that is, by securing to ourselves the friendship and protection of that Being, who disposes of events, and governs futurity."

"Truth is always consistent with itself, and needs nothing to help it out. It is always near at hand, and sits upon our lips, and is ready to drop out before we are aware: whereas a lie is troublesome, and sets a man's invention upon the rack; and one trick needs a great many more to make it good in appearance."

JAPAN.

Japan, of one of whose sacred temples the above is a representation, is a large and powerful empire near to China. It consists of three principal islands, with a number of smaller ones, lying between the east coast of Asia and the west coast of America. Japan has been said to resemble the British isles for situation and magnitude; and were South Britain divided from the North by a channel, Japan might be fitly compared to England, Scotland, and Ireland, with their islands, peninsulas, bays, and channels. The population is estimated at more than 40,000,000, being about double that of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; but the people are sunk in the most degrading ignorance and superstition.

Japan is the European name of this empire; but the inhabitants call it Niphon, from the largest island belonging to it: the Chinese call it Chiphon, from its eastern situation, a name signifying the Foundation of the Sun. Niphon is about 850 miles long, and averaging rather more than 100 in breath. Jeddo, the capital, is said to be 60 miles in circuit; and Miaco, the second city, is said to contain 1,000,000 of inhabitants. Some of their mountains are enriched with mines of gold, silver, and excellent copper, besides tin, lead, iron, and various other minerals and fossils; whilst others abound with several sorts of marble and precious stones. Of these mountains, some may justly be ranked among the natural rarities of this country; one in particular, in the great island of Niphon, is of such prodigious height as to be easily seen 120 miles off at sea, though its distance from the shore is about 44 miles. Some authors think it exceeds the Peak of Teneriffe, which is more than 12,000 feet above the level of the sea.

The vast quantities of sulphur with which most of the Japan islands abound, makes them subject to frequent and dreadful earthquakes. The inhabitants are so accustomed to them, that they are scarcely alarmed, unless they lay whole towns in ruins, which often proves the case. On these occasions they have recourse to extraordinary sacrifices and acts of worship to their deities or demons, according to the different notions of each sect, and sometimes they even proceed to offer human victims: but in this case they take only the vilest and most abandoned, because they are sacrificed to the malevolent deities.

The Japanese are very ingenious in most handicraft trades, and excel the Chinese in several manufactures, particularly in the beauty, goodness, and variety of their silks, cottons, and other stuffs, and in their Japan and porcelain wares.

The women are subjected to a most wretched state of degradation. A husband may put his wives to a more or less severe death, if they give the least cause of jealousy, by being seen barely to converse with another man, or suffering one to come into their apartment.

The religion of the Japanese throughout the empire is paganism, including several sects, who live together in harmony, each having its own temples and priests. The spiritual emperor, Dairi, is the chief of their religion: though they acknowledge one Supreme Being. Dr. Humbey saw two temples of "the god of gods" of a majestic height. The idol that represented this divinity was of gilded wood, and of so prodigious a size, that upon his hands six persons might sit in the Japanese fashion. In the other temple, the infinite power of this god was represented by little gods to the number of 33,333, all standing round the great idol, which represented the Supreme Being. The priests, who are numerous in every temple, have nothing to do but to clean the pavement, light the lamps, and dress the idols with flowers. The temples are open to every one, even to the Dutch; and if they are in want of a lodging, when they go to the court of Jeddo, they are entertained with hospitality in these temples.

In Miaco there are multitudes of temples; and one in particular, has no less than three thousand idols in it. In the middle of the temple there is a gigantic figure of an idol, whose head is bald, and his ears bored through, but without a beard. On each side of his throne there are statues of armed men, moors dancing, witches, magicians, and devils. There are likewise several representations of thunder, winds, and rain, with all sorts of stones. Each idol has thirty hands, with seven heads on his breast, all made of solid gold, and all the decorations of the temple are made of the same precious materials. Near this idol is another of a most gigantic size, with forty-six arms and hands, attended by the figures of sixteen black devils. A row of idols is placed at a considerable distance, each of which has several arms, all of which are intended to signify the power they have over the affairs of this lower world. Their heads are adorned with rays of glory, and some of them have shepherds' crooks in their hands, to intimate their being guardians of mankind against all the machinations of evil spirits.

The Temple of Apes, represented in our engraving (see Carpenter's Scripture Nat. Hist.) is magnificent; richly adorned with many figures of that grotesque animal. Apes and monkeys, with a variety of other creatures, are reverently worshipped in their pagods; and each of these sapient brutes is considered as emblematical of some of the operations of nature or providence. All the attitudes in which these creatures are placed, afford subjects for the priests to enlarge on in their sermons to the people: should we with a smile say, "for their instruction or amusement?"

The doctrine of metempsychosis, or the transmigration of souls, is firmly held by the Japanese, as it is by many of the Hindoos and Chinese; and which, while it strips death of much of its terror, destroys the tenderest feelings of humanity, causing them to set scarcely any value on human life, even of their own parents.

The Japanese are so fully persuaded of the passing of human souls from their purgatorial prison in hell, into the bodies of vile creatures on earth, such as serpents, toads, insects, birds, fishes, and quadrupeds, and from them again into human bodies after a season of suffering, that they have hospitals for beasts, which are fed and supported as if they were human beings. And what is more remarkable, there is a convent near Jeddo, in which a vast number of priests reside, whose time is employed in feeding these irrational brute creatures!

British Christians cannot but mourn over such a miserable, superstitious, and degraded population. Sympathetic piety will lead the man of God to pray, "Have respect unto the covenant, for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." Psal. lxxiv, 20.

Christianity, however, or rather popery, had once a considerable number of converts in Japan: but the mission was productive of little good. Many reckon it to have been pernicious, as it terminated in the most dreadful massacre of all who professed the Christian name, through the pride and the rapacity of the Jesuits, and their conspiracies against the government.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF BISHOP WARBURTON.

Bishop Warburton was, as Mr. Grainger, in his "Biographical History" observes, "an English prelate of gigantic abilities." We introduce this great man to the contemplation of our young readers, as a worthy example of persevering and successful diligence in the paths of learning. We especially propose him as an inducement to study and application, because, as a highly respectable clergyman remarks, "Bishop Warburton, the greatest master of human learning that in modern times has adorned the English episcopacy, went to no university. The author of the 'Divine Legation of Moses' began life as an attorney's clerk, and continued in the legal profession till he was twenty-five years of age."

The subject of this biographical sketch was born at Newark, December the 24th, 1698. He was first put to school there under a Mr. Twells, but had the chief part of his education at Oakham in Rutlandshire, where he continued till the beginning of 1714, when his cousin being made head-master of the school at Newark, he returned to his native place, and was for a very short time under the care of that learned and respectable relation. In April that year, he was put out clerk to Mr. Kirke, an eminent attorney of Great Markham, in Nottinghamshire; and continued with that gentleman till 1719. He then returned to his family at Newark; devoting a considerable portion of his time to study, and became usher in a school. Having expressed a strong inclination for the church, he was ordained deacon, December the 22d, 1723, and priest, March the 1st, 1727. His first work appeared in 1724, under the title of "Miscellaneous Translations in Prose and Verse, from Roman Poets, Orators, and Historians," 12mo. The volume was dedicated to Sir Robert Sutton, and seems to have laid the foundation of his first ecclesiastical preferment. In 1727 his second work, entitled "A Critical and Philosophical Inquiry into the Causes of Prodigies and Miracles, as related by Historians," &c., was published in 12mo., and was also dedicated to Sir R. Sutton. On his Majesty's visit to Cambridge, Mr. Warburton had the honour of being in the King's list of Masters of Arts, created in consequence of the royal visit to that university. In June, the same year, he was presented by Sir Robert Sutton to the rectory of Brand Broughton, in the diocese of Lincoln, which he retained till his death, and where he spent a considerable part of his middle life in a studious retirement, devoted entirely to letters. In 1736 he published a pamphlet, which rendered him famous, entitled "The Alliance between Church and State; or the Necessity and Equity of an Established Religion and a Test Law; demonstrated from the Essence and End of Civil Society, upon the fundamental Principles of the Law of Nature and Nations." But the work, which especially has immortalized the name of Warburton, is, "The Divine Legation of Moses demonstrated on the Principles of a religious Deist, from the Omission of the Doctrine of Rewards and Punishments in the Jewish Dispensation."

This work raised up a host of opponents; because, while it vindicated the claims of Moses as a Messenger from God, it surrendered to the enemies some of his capital doctrines: but its display of prodigious learning secured him many friends. We cannot follow him through his several stages of honour and dignity, as chaplain to the king,—prebend of Durham,—D. D.,—dean of Bristol,—and bishop of Gloucester. Toward the close of his life, Bishop Warburton transferred five hundred pounds to Lord Mansfield, Sir Eardley Wilmot, and Mr. Charles Yorke, upon trust, to found a lecture, in the form of a course of sermons, to prove the truth of revealed religion in general, and of the Christian in particular, from the completion of the prophecies of the Old and New Testament which relate to the Christian church, especially to the apostacy of Papal Rome. To this foundation we owe the admirable Introductory Lectures of Hurd, and the well-adapted Continuation of Halifax and Bagot. Bishop Warburton died in June 1779, in the eighty-first year of his age, leaving the character for learning which we have quoted.

THE REV. GEORGE BURDER.

Full of days, and beloved by all denominations of Christians, this venerable man finished his mortal course, at the house of his son, Dr. Burder, in Brunswick Square, May the 29th, 1832. He had attained the eightieth year of his age; and for more than half that period, we believe, he had been minister of Fetter Lane Chapel. His literary labours were considerable and useful; and "The Village Sermons," which have been translated into many languages, will immortalize the name of George Burder. His services to the public, in promoting the cause of the Redeemer, cannot on earth be estimated; as he was for many years the able Secretary to the London Missionary Society, and the intelligent, candid Editor of the Evangelical Magazine. This excellent man has left a treasure to the world, in his eminent and honoured sons; and we rejoice that his sorrowing church is blessed with the oversight of a minister so qualified as the Rev. Caleb Morris, who for several years had been co-pastor with our departed friend. May the spirit of Elijah rest upon Elisha!

RELIGION.

By J. Montgomery.

Through shades and solitudes profound
  The fainting traveller winds his way;
Bewildering meteors glare around,
  And tempt his wandering feet astray.

Welcome, thrice welcome, to his eye,
  The sudden moon's inspiring light,
When forth she sallies through the sky,
  The guardian angel of the night!

Thus mortals, blind and weak, below
  Pursue the phantom Bliss, in vain;
The world's a wilderness of woe,
  And life a pilgrimage of pain!

Till mild Religion, from above,
  Descends, a sweet engaging form,
The messenger of heavenly love,
  The bow of promise in a storm!

Then guilty passions wing their flight,
  Sorrow, remorse, affliction cease;
Religion's yoke is soft and light,
  And all her paths are paths of peace.

Ambition, pride, revenge depart,
  And folly flies her chastening rod;
She makes the humble contrite heart
  A temple of the living God.

Beyond the narrow vale of time,
  Where bright celestial ages roll,
To scenes eternal, scenes sublime,
  She points the way, and leads the soul.

At her approach the Grave appears
  The Gate of Paradise restor'd;
Her voice the watching Cherub hears,
  And drops his double flaming sword.

  May we the crown of glory gain;
Rise when the host of heaven expire,
  And reign with God—for ever reign!

A RICH INFIDEL REFLECTING ON HUMAN LIFE.

Melancholy gloom or licentious gaiety pervades the mind of even the most favoured infidel. Voltaire was rich, and honoured by the great; yet, amid his boasting, and the worship of his admirers, he was the victim of the bitterest vexation, even when in his glory; and deliberately he could record, "I WISH I HAD NEVER BEEN BORN!"

"Who," says this prince of infidelity, "can, without horror, consider the whole world as the empire of destruction? It abounds with wonders; it also abounds with victims. It is a vast field of carnage and contagion. Every species is without pity pursued and torn to pieces through the earth, and air, and water. In man there is more wretchedness than in all the other animals put together. He loves life, and yet he knows he must die. If he enjoys a transient good, he suffers various evils, and is at last devoured by worms. This knowledge is his fatal prerogative; other animals have it not. He spends the transient moments of his existence in diffusing the miseries which he suffers; in cutting the throats of his fellow-creatures for pay; in cheating and being cheated; in robbing and being robbed; in serving that he might command, and in repenting of all he does. The bulk of mankind are nothing more than a crowd of wretches, equally criminal and unfortunate; and the globe contains rather carcasses than men. I tremble at the review of this dreadful picture to find that it contains a complaint against Providence; and I WISH I HAD NEVER BEEN BORN!"

BOOKS OF STERLING MERIT.

In our Prospectus of the "Christian's Penny Magazine," we declared our intention of noticing, among other things, "New Books of Sterling Merit." Our limits will not allow us to give an extended review of any: but we intend to point out some of those works, which are best suited to form an economical, but valuable library for that class of readers, whose time and money render such direction indispensable; and think we cannot do better than commence with the

COMPANION TO THE BIBLE,

Intended for Bible Classes, Families, and Young Persons in General.

This little Work, price only three shillings, illustrated with three coloured Maps of Biblical Geography, has been pronounced one of the most instructive and valuable, on the best and greatest of subjects, that have ever issued from the British press. It contains a condensed mass of information, connected with almost every subject relating to the history, inspiration, and design of the Bible. Every young person ought to possess this work, to fortify his faith against the daring and insinuating attacks of the various classes of Infidels. A specimen of the style and manner of the work, we have given in the chapter on the "Antiquity of the Bible."

VISIT OF THE DUKE OF YORK TO MILTON.

Dr. Symonds, in his Life of Milton, produces "many effusions of malevolence of which Milton was the object during his life-time; and which fully justify his complaints, and our execration of the malignity of party.

"A story I have seen in print (but by whom told, or on what authority, I know not), shall be inserted for the amusement of my readers. It bears some internal marks of authenticity, and exhibits very justly the gay and the gloomy malignity of the two royal brothers, Charles and James.

"The Duke of York, as it is reported, expressed one day to the King his brother, a great desire to see old Milton, of whom he had heard so much. The King replied, that he felt no objection to the Duke's satisfying his curiosity: and accordingly, soon afterwards James went privately to Milton's house, where, after an introduction, which explained to the old republican the rank of his guest, a free conversation ensued between these very dissimilar and discordant characters. In the course, however, of the conversation, the Duke asked Milton, whether he did not regard the loss of his eyesight as a judgment inflicted on him for what he had written against the King. Milton's reply was to this effect; 'If your Highness thinks that the calamities which befal us here are indications of the wrath of Heaven, in what manner are we to account for the fate of the King, your father? The displeasure of Heaven must, upon this supposition, have been much greater against him than against me—for I have lost only my eyes, but he lost his head.'

"Much discomposed with this answer, the Duke soon took his leave and went away. On his return to court, the first words which he spoke to the King were,—'Brother, you are greatly to blame that you don't have that old rogue Milton hanged.' 'Why,—what is the matter, James?' said the King, 'you seem in a heat. What! have you seen Milton?' 'Yes,' answered the Duke, 'I have seen him.' 'Well,' said the King, 'In what condition did you find him?' 'Condition? why he is old and very poor.' 'Old and poor! Well, and he is blind too—is he not?'—'Yes, blind as a beetle.' 'Why then,' observed the King, 'you are a fool, James, to have him hanged as a punishment: to hang him will be doing him a service; it will be taking him out of his miseries. No—if he is old, poor, and blind, he is miserable enough in all conscience:—let him live!'"

A DEN OF RATTLESNAKES.

In Flint's Geography and History of the United States, we have an account of an emigrant family who inadvertently fixed their cabin on the shelving declivity of a ledge, that proved a den of Rattlesnakes. Warmed by the first fire on the hearth of the cabin, the terrible reptiles issued in numbers, and of course in rage, by night, into the room where the whole family slept. As happens in those cases, some slept on the floor, and some in beds. The reptiles spread in every part of the room, and mounted on every bed. Children were stung in the arms of their parents, and in each other's arms. Imagination dares not dwell on the horrors of such a scene. Most of the family were bitten to death, and those who escaped, finding the whole cabin occupied by these horrid tenants, hissing and shaking their rattles, fled from the house by beating off the covering of the roof, and escaping in that direction.

COW TREE.

On the barren flank of a rock, says Humboldt, grows a tree with dry and leather-like leaves; its large woody roots can scarcely penetrate into the stony soil. For several months of the year not a single shower moistens its foliage. Its branches appear dead and dried; yet when the trunk is pierced there flows from it a sweet and nourishing milk. It is at sun-rise that this vegetable fountain is most abundant. The blacks and the natives are then to be seen hastening from all quarters, furnished with large bowls to receive the milk, which grows yellow and thickens at its surface. Some employ their bowls under the tree, while others carry home the juice for their children. This fine tree rises like the broad-leaved star-apple. Its oblong and pointed leaves, tough and alternate, are marked by lateral ribs: some of them are ten inches long. We did not see the flower. The fruit is somewhat fleshy, and contains a nut, sometimes two. The milk obtained by incisions made in the trunk is glutinous, tolerably thick, free from all acrimony, and of an agreeable and balmy smell. It was offered to us in the shell of the tutuno or calabash tree. We drank a considerable quantity of it in the evening before we went to bed, and very early in the morning, without experiencing the slightest injurious effect. The viscosity of this milk alone renders it somewhat disagreeable. The negroes and free labourers drink it, dipping into it their maize or cassava bread. The butter tree of Bambarra, mentioned by Mungo Park, is suspected to be of the same genus as the Palo de vaca.—Modern Traveller, Columbia, 263.

"The infinitely wise Author of nature has so contrived things, that the most remarkable rules of preserving life and health are moral duties commanded us; so true it is that 'godliness has the promises of this life as well as that to come.'"—Dr. Cheyne.

TO OUR READERS.

Such is the First Number of "The Christian's Penny Magazine," which we have endeavoured to make not only "entertaining" and "useful," but conducive to the spread of Christian knowledge, the cultivation of genuine piety, and to the practice of that pure morality which can only spring from a heart governed by the principles of the Gospel. In what measure our efforts have been successful, we now leave to our Readers to pronounce. That our aim is approved by them we doubt not; and we therefore unhesitatingly claim their support, not merely as purchasers to keep the Work in existence; but especially to aid us by their talents in improving its character, and their influence in enlarging its sphere of usefulness. A ready and respectful attention will be paid to any suggestions for its improvement, and insertion given to whatever may be thought likely to promote its utility. And so we launch our bark with confidence, commending it to the blessing of Him who alone can give it a prosperous gale, and who we humbly trust will smile upon this attempt to promote his glory and the good of mankind.

THE HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

This truly apostolical Society, consisting of churchmen and dissenters, was founded in 1819. Its design is the "evangelization of the unenlightened inhabitants of the towns and villages of Great Britain, by preaching the Gospel, the distribution of Religious Tracts, and the establishment of Prayer-Meetings and Sunday Schools, with every other Scriptural method for the accomplishment of this important object." The Report of the "Home Missionary Society," for the year ending March 1831, states, "the Society employs thirty-five missionaries; in addition to whom there are about twenty pastors and stated ministers, who devote a portion of their time to the objects of this Society. There are, in all, sixty agents, who employ every practicable mode of communicating religious instruction, by schools, by the distribution of tracts, and by regular preaching. They have 200 villages, and not fewer than 4,000 children under their care, in a population of nearly 200,000 souls. The treasurer has received during the past year 4,909*l.* 4*s.*, and paid 4,900*l.*; but the Society is still indebted not less than 700*l.*

That such a Society is founded on Scriptural principles, we need only refer to the New Testament, to read of the Home Missionary itinerant labours of our blessed Saviour and his Apostles. It corresponds with the operations of the servants of Christ in all ages of the church. We are rejoiced to know that the same system has been extensively acted upon in Ireland by the several denominations of protestants. We have heard that one of the prelates has declared his determination, not to ordain any candidate for holy orders, unless he can preach in the native Irish language. "The Irish Society," supported almost exclusively by the members of the Established Church, is formed upon the same principles of Home Missionary itinerating, and preaching the Gospel to the neglected villagers.

After much careful inquiry, we have not heard of a single instance of any individual connected with any of the Home Missionary stations, being found among the offenders against the law in the disturbed districts of our country, in the last several years. Such societies deserve universal support.

We sincerely rejoice in every effort to promote the evangelization of our countrymen, assured that Scriptural knowledge will promote the general cultivation of the mind, secure the best moral habits, and prepare the soul for a blissful immortality.

HOME MISSIONARY LABOURS OF THE CLERGY.

"Those truly sound Discourses on Repentance," published in the third folio volume of the famous Mr. Perkins (of whom Bishop Hall speaks in terms of such high commendation), were preached out of doors, to several thousands of hearers at Stourbridge Fair. The title of them is, "A faithful and plain Exposition upon the two first verses of the second chapter of Zephaniah, by that late Reverend Preacher of God's Word, Mr. William Perkins, containing a powerful Exhortation to Repentance, &c. Preached at Stourbridge Fair, in the Field; taken from his mouth, and now published for the common good. London, 1631."

BISHOP LATIMER A HOME MISSIONARY.

It is recorded of the good old Martyr Latimer, who was for a time Bishop of Worcester, that he frequently preached out of doors in different parts of his own diocese. He carried his spectacles on one side of his girdle, and on the other his New Testament. Fox, the Martyrologist, says of him, "that all King Edward's days, he travelled up and down, preaching for the most part twice every Sunday; and that he took little ease and care of sparing himself, to do the people good."

THE FRUITS OF CHRISTIANITY.

Every labourer, servant, or mechanic, cannot be supposed capable of examining all the variety of proofs by which the Christian religion is supported. But it is impossible that even the weakest should be incapable of estimating its value and its character, by considering the rich fruit which it naturally produces in every part of the world.

Such, however, are the magnitude and diversity of its heavenly benefits to mankind, that it is difficult to make a representation of them by any means corresponding to their worth and importance.

The impure and brutalizing systems of idolatry have been abolished by the merely formal and national reception of Christianity. Christianity has clearly revealed the existence, the universal providence, and the infinite perfections of the only true and living God. Christianity has both published and illustrated the holy law of the divine Majesty, as the eternal rule of moral duty for all the intelligent creation. It proclaims a future judgment, and declares that all men shall be righteously rewarded in that day according to the deeds done in the body. It contemplates man as he evidently is in his present circumstances, a creature, fallen from his integrity—a transgressor, guilty in the sight of his Maker. It exhibits to his awakened mind, and brings to his terrified conscience the Divine provision for full forgiveness of sins and perfect justification by the substitution of an almighty Surety. It regards the understanding of man as darkened, and his mind as depraved; and it sends him an omnipotent Sanctifier, whose invincible influences illuminate, and purify, and regenerate the soul. Christianity thus destroys the deeply-rooted enmity of the heart, and brings the alienated rebel to God as his heavenly Father, to receive the unnumbered blessings of divine adoption; and to enjoy the sweet assurances of immortality in the life everlasting.

This system of sovereign grace and mercy implants the principles and enforces the practice of every virtue which can exalt, adorn, and improve the human character. Where it has been fully received, it has annihilated the cruel barbarities and the degrading customs inseparable from every species of slavery. It has elevated lovely woman to her righteous equality with man—it has sanctified the conjugal relation—it has inculcated the duty, and exemplified the expression of domestic harmony, and of parental and filial affection—it enforces mutual forgiveness, confidence, and brotherly love, irrespective of clime, and age, and country. It binds all classes together in universal sympathy, under a sense of our common necessities, as equally children of the same Almighty Parent; and being Christians, as members of the same mystical body.

Christianity is the benevolent angel of celestial mercy to the children of wretchedness and affliction, anticipating every kind and every measure of human misery and woe.—"To the influence of Christianity are to be attributed those asylums for the relief of the miserable, which humanity has consecrated as monuments of beneficence. Constantine was the first who built hospitals for the reception and maintenance of the sick and wounded in the different provinces of the empire. These establishments were multiplied in the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries, in Italy, France, and Spain. They were afterwards so generally adopted, that, according to Matthew Paris, not less than 19,000 charitable houses for leprosy alone existed in the Christian states in the tenth century. Rome contains forty hospitals for various charitable purposes. The number of similar establishments in Petersburgh is almost incredible to those who recollect the sudden growth of that capital. In Paris, besides private establishments, there were, before the revolution, forty-eight public foundations for the relief of disease and indigence. Since that disastrous period, the increase of physical misery and the neglect of moral good and healing mercy have afforded a melancholy proof, that the exercise of the virtues of humanity is proportional to the cultivation or decay of religion."

The metropolis of our favoured country is eminently distinguished above every city in the world by such noble monuments of Christian charity. In every part of it are to be seen, hospitals, infirmaries, dispensaries, and asylums, built and endowed by the benevolence and compassion of the disciples of Christ, provided for the relief of the sick and the poor, the blind and the dumb, the aged and the orphan. The detail would show a list of many hundreds in our British capital, besides the incalculable number of the same monumental ornaments which dignify and bless every city and town in the kingdom.

Christianity has given us our inestimable sabbaths—it has sanctified to our enjoyment this seventh part of our days for the necessary and merciful purposes of repose, instruction, and devotion. It prescribes our social meetings on the day of the Lord, to cherish fraternal affection, to increase rational and enlightened piety, and mutually to encourage our sublimest anticipations of a glorious immortality, at the termination of our earthly sorrows.

The sacred and social exercises of the Christian sabbath promote the purest, the most enlarged philanthropy, and they have been the means of constraining the disciples of Christ to care for the salvation of the souls of others. The immortal welfare of their neighbours, of their fellow countrymen, and of the earth's population, has engaged their benevolent solicitude. Probably, more than fifty thousand children of the indigent, are, in Britain, supported and clothed, and educated in their duty to God and man, by means of the bounty of deceased Christians. Not less than a million of the children of our labouring poor are collected every sabbath, and gratuitously, by a hundred thousand disciples of Christ, they are taught to read the words of eternal life. Thus they are directed in the practice of virtue by the doctrine of salvation, and taught how they may glorify God and enjoy him for ever. The principles of British Christians inspire them to contribute, constrained by love to their Saviour, to the amount of four hundred thousand pounds annually for the divine purposes of improving the condition of all the families upon earth, and for their advancement in knowledge and undefiled religion. British Christians support six hundred Missionaries among the degraded and perishing heathen—to learn their languages—to translate for them the oracles of God, to preach among them the unsearchable riches of Christ—to instruct their children in heavenly wisdom—to bring down upon guilty and depraved nations the unspeakable blessings of redeeming grace—and by the only Mediator between God and sinners, to lead them to the possession of life everlasting.

The numerous privations, the painful sufferings, and the difficult labours which are endured by our self-denying Christian brethren, in their Missionary services, are known only to themselves and to their gracious Master; but he supplies them richly with present divine supports and consolations; and he will crown their zealous toils with "a far more exceeding and an eternal weight of glory."

Such are the inestimable fruits of Christianity. This is, indeed, an exceedingly imperfect exhibition; but who would presume upon ability to declare the whole? "The eye hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what God hath prepared, even on earth, for them that love him," as the first fruits of Christian benevolence.

But has Deism or Anti-christianity, in any of its forms, produced fruit, bearing the least resemblance to this, in any measure, in any age, or in any country? Alas! no. Yet its votaries are unconvinced of their folly. They are shameless, or the wondrous facts of the sober history of Christianity would overwhelm them in confusion, while cherishing their unbelief. They obstinately reject the gospel of salvation. They caricature its celestial features, and then endeavour to expose it as an object of contempt and scorn. Shame upon their irrational, debasing, and inhuman efforts! Their wild and malicious ravings, however, supply to Christians an important lesson. They afford a demonstration of the radical corruption of the human heart, which itself is the grand reason for our holy and regenerating religion.

Should any plain and unlettered inquirer after the "truth," have no ability to examine any of the other evidences of Christianity, the fruits here discovered, will be found sufficient to prove its divinity against all the cavils of infidel or irreligious men. It is needful, however, for every reader to remember, that a rational conviction of the truth and divinity of the gospel is not sufficient for the salvation of the soul. Every real Christian possesses in his own bosom an inward, sanctifying, comforting evidence, impressing and transforming his mind. "The kingdom of God is within you," says our Lord. "The kingdom of God is righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," says his apostle Paul. John declares, "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself."

"The gospel of Christ is like a seal or signet, of such inimitable and divine engraving, that no created power can counterfeit it; and when the Spirit of God has stamped this gospel on the soul, there are so many holy and happy lines drawn or impressed thereby—so many sacred signatures and divine features stamped on the mind, that give certain evidence both of a heavenly signet and a heavenly operator."

This inward evidence of Christianity is of serious and indispensable necessity, not to illiterate villagers only, but even to the most learned believer, as it constitutes the essence of religion; it is ever ready at hand, depending, not upon argument, intellect, or science, but upon the individual possession of the Holy Spirit: it is proof against all the temptations of the adversary—it will be present at every season of trial—it will supply the want of ministers and means, in the chamber of sickness—and it will serve as an anchor of the soul, until its possessor enjoy an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

IGNORANCE AND CRIME INSEPARABLE.

There are most melancholy exceptions to the general instruction of our countrymen, and their ignorance produces its natural fruits. The following is an affecting illustration of this fact.

"I have ever been convinced that ignorance is productive of crime: but nothing can so fully confirm that conviction as an intimate knowledge of the inmates of a prison. From Jan. 1825, to March 1826, four hundred persons came under my examination. Of these, one hundred and seventy-three could neither read nor write; twenty merely knew the alphabet; forty-nine could read very imperfectly, so as not to be able to obtain any information by it; fifty-nine could read only; and ninety-nine could read and write. But this statement by no means presents the sum of ignorance in these persons. Nothing but actual investigation can render credible the gross ignorance that painfully comes under the observation of a chaplain in a gaol. Even among prisoners who have mechanically learned to read and write, there exists, generally speaking, a lamentable ignorance of moral and religious duties and the awful sanctions of religion: and of the rest, some know as little of the very first principles of religion, as the wildest savage. And yet, the prisoners are generally willing to learn, and attentive to the instructions afforded them."—Testimony of the Rev. Mr. Brown, Chaplain of Norwich Castle.

PERILS OF THE DEEP.

From the narrative of Lord Cochrane's cruise in 1821, in search of the Spanish fleet.

The dangers and privations endured on this cruise have seldom been surpassed. The crazy ships were tossed about in a tempestuous and unfrequented sea, while the ill-paid and discontented crews, suffering from great scarcity of fresh water and of provisions, were obliged to keep constantly working at the pumps. At one time, after a long calm, and when ninety leagues from the nearest land, the stock of water in the whole squadron was reduced to less than a hundred gallons. The crews were in a state of consternation at the horrid death which seemed to await them, and which no human efforts could avert. Every eye was lifted towards heaven; fervent ejaculations were uttered; for, on such trying occasions, there are no unbelievers. The crews were a medley of all religions; but the same thoughts, the same fears, and the same hope in the all-powerful Director of events, pervaded every breast. When the feelings of all were approaching to frenzy and despair—when they had arrived at that pitch of heart-rending agony, of which none, but those who have experienced similar calamities, can form any idea—at this critical period the sky assumed a threatening aspect; the lightning flashed on the horizon; black clouds arose; peals of thunder resounded through the air, and every thing indicated an approaching storm. The drooping spirits of the sufferers revived, and one and all earnestly looked for the speedy bursting of the tempest. Dangers which, at other times, would have been dreaded, in such shattered vessels, were now hailed with rapture. The rain soon fell in torrents, and, as if escaped from shipwreck, the men wept with joy. Every awning and sail that could be made available was spread. It continued unceasingly for twenty-four hours, and every cask was filled. The wind, boisterous at first, soon moderated into a fair steady breeze, and the trials and danger of the sufferers were forgotten.

IMMOLATION OF WOMEN AMONG THE AFRICANS.

"Landers' Journal of an Expedition to explore the Course and Termination of the Niger," supplies us with an instructive variety of information concerning, not only the important geography of Africa, but respecting its ignorant and superstitious inhabitants. It seems that the sable Yarribanians in Africa practise some abominations similar to the degraded Hindoos in Asia. When a governor dies, one or two of his favourite wives are expected to quit the world on the same day, "to bear him company." Nature cannot but rise up and rebel against a custom so repugnant to its first dictates; as we find in the case of the sable ladies of Negroland. Two of the devoted wives of the late governor of Jenna had fled and concealed themselves with the remainder of his women, in the hope of being able to elude the honourable death, which superstition pretended would restore them to their deceased lord. Landers' account of the conduct of one of these unhappy creatures on being discovered, is deeply affecting, and we are sure it will be interesting to our readers.

"To-day one of these unfortunates (she to whom our house belongs) was discovered in her hiding-place at the governor's, and the alternative of a poisoned chalice, or to have her head broken by the club of the fetish priest, was offered her. She has chosen the former mode of dying, as being the less terrible of the two, and has come to our yard, to spend her last hours in the society of her faithful slaves. These address their mistress by the endearing name of mother. Poor creatures! as soon as they learned her misfortune, they dropped their spinning; the grinding of corn was also relinquished; their sheep, goats, and poultry were suffered to roam at large without restraint; and they abandoned themselves to the most excessive grief. But now, the arrival of their mistress has added, if possible, to their affliction.—Females have been coming all day to condole with the old lady, and to weep with her; so that we have heard and seen nothing but sobbing and crying from morning till the setting of the sun. The principal males in the town have likewise been here, to pay their last respects to their mistress; and so has her grave-digger, who has just risen from prostrating himself on the ground before her. Notwithstanding the representations and remonstrances of the priest, and the prayers of the venerable victim to her gods for fortitude to undergo the dreadful ordeal, her resolution has forsaken her more than once. She has entered our yard twice, to expire in the armsof the women, and twice has she laid aside the fatal poison, in order to take another walk, and gaze on the splendour of the sun and the glory of the heavens, for she cannot bear the idea of losing sight of them for ever. She is still restless and uneasy, and would gladly run away from death, if she durst, for that imaginary being appears to her in a more terrible light than our pictures represent him with his shadowy form and fatal dart. Die she must, and she knows it; nevertheless she will tenaciously cling to life till the very last moment. Meanwhile her grave is preparing, and preparations are making for a wake at her funeral. She is to be buried here in one of her own huts, the moment after the spirit has quitted the body, which will be ascertained by striking the ground near which it may be lying at the time, when, if no motion or struggle ensues, the old woman will be considered as dead. The poison used by the natives on this occasion destroys life, it is said, in fifteen minutes."

"Widows are burnt in India, just as they are poisoned or clubbed here. The origin of this abominable custom is understood to have arisen from a dread on the part of the chiefs of the country in olden time, that their principal wives, who alone were in possession of their confidence, and knew where their money was concealed, might secretly attempt their life, in order at once to establish their own freedom, and become possessed of the property. That, far from any motives to destroy her husband, a woman might, on the contrary, have a strong inducement to cherish him as long as possible, the existence of the wife was made to depend entirely on that of her lord."

WHAT IS GLORY?

ALTERED FROM P. S. COURTIER.

What is glory? Say, a feather,
 Mounted on the buoyant air,
Prey to every wind and weather,
 Often soil'd, and seldom fair.

What is glory? Ask the garter
 Twining round his grace's knee:
Wouldst thou ease and conscience barter,
 Such a thing on thine to see?

What is glory? Ask the maiden
 Wedded to a titled drone;
Sick at soul, and heavy laden,
 Empty pageantry her own.

What is glory? Ask the lawyer,
 Feeless trudging to the court;
Harder work than any sawyer,
 Ceaseless labour, less support.

What is glory? Ask the miser,
 Starving mid his bags of gold.
Ask his heir; he hardly wiser,
 Scattering wide the sordid mould.

What is glory? Ask the poet,
 Pocket low, and wishes high;
Wanting—and yet none must know it—
 All but earth, and air, and sky.

What is glory? Ask the sailor,
 Weather-beaten, tempest-tost:
Ship his prison, winds his jailor;
 Kindred, friend, and country lost.

What is glory? Hero! striding
 Madly o'er a ruin'd land.
What is glory? Time is gliding;
 Death and judgment are at hand.

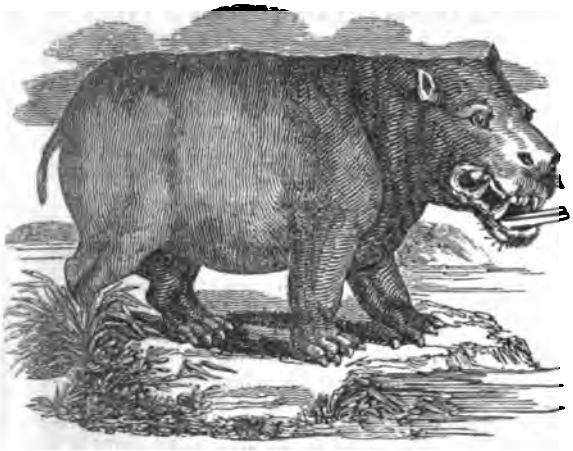
What is glory? Ask the Christian,
 Looking for immortal joys;
He can wisely solve the question,
 Heir, through Christ, of Paradise!

THE SILENT REPROOF.

Superbus was blessed in no ordinary degree by the bountiful hand of Providence, which had showered its gifts upon him in rich abundance. A healthy body, an ample estate, a thriving family, and friends on every hand. But "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of his possessions," and with all these advantages, Superbus was unhappy. Such must be the lot of the man, whatever his earthly condition, whose happiness is derived merely from the objects around him, which all perish with the using, and leave in the soul a void that can only be filled by its Infinite Author. But Superbus had a still acuter sting in his mind. He had drank deep in the cup of infidelity; and not content with ridiculing the idea of the superintending care of the Most High, he at length proceeded to doubt, and at last to deny his existence. Respect for the opinions of others, and doubtless some remains of the working of God's vicegerent within, prevented a very open avowal of his sentiments; but such was the man in reality, however outwardly conformed to the observances of those around him.

One summer's day, while regaling himself with the beauties of creation in his pleasure grounds, which were laid out with exquisite taste, he sat down under the spreading branches of an oak, to enjoy the scene, and to pursue those speculations to which he had been long accustomed. Nature in her gayest hues was before him;—every flower the earth could produce to gratify the eye by its colour or form, to excite admiration by the peculiarity of its structure, or to regale the senses by its fragrance—while the adjoining groves were made vocal by the song of the happy inhabitants of the firmament, who were glorifying their Creator by a general chorus of praise. Amongst other objects, on a raised bed at a short distance "forth crept the swelling gourd," wantoning in all the luxuriance of its own nature, aided by the most careful cultivation. But, alas for our philosopher! as the spider extracts poison from the same flowers where the bee gathers honey; so he turned the bounties of his Creator to his own bane. "Preposterous!" said he, "How preposterous the idea, that the wonders we see around us are the production of an Almighty agent! Would a Being of infinite wisdom, or indeed of any wisdom at all, have created a plant such as I see before me; so weak as to trail its branches on the ground, yet bearing a fruit of many pounds weight; while the monarch of the forest, beneath whose ample shade I am reposing, produces only the diminutive acorn! No—doubtless these things are all the work of chance."

"The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise that they are vain," and not unfrequently instructs our ignorance and mortifies our pride, in a way equally unexpected and effectual. In the midst of the philosopher's meditations, the breath of heaven agitated the branches of the oak, and a falling acorn gently tapped him on the head. The most convincing train of reasoning could not have produced such a revolution in his mind, as was here wrought in an instant. He gazed a moment on the little silent monitor as it rolled at his feet, and with deeply-humbled pride and admiring gratitude he exclaimed—"What a mercy that was not a pumpkin!"



THE HIPPOPOTAMUS.

Hippopotamus, the River Horse (from two Greek words, hippos, a horse, and potamos, a river), is an enormous animal, supposed by many to be the creature called Behemoth, in Job xl, 15—24. Mr. Greenfield, the learned Editor of the "Comprehensive Bible," gives a striking description of it as follows—"It is nearly as large as the elephant: its head is enormously large; its mouth very wide; the jaws extending upwards of two feet, armed with four cutting teeth each twelve inches long; its hide is so tough and so thick as to resist the strokes of a sabre, and is thinly covered with hair of a lightish colour; its legs are three feet long. Though amphibious, its hoofs which are quadrifid are unconnected; and its tail is naked, about a foot in length, but exceedingly thick and strong. It inhabits the rivers of Africa; feeds on grass and other vegetables; moves slowly and heavily; swims dexterously; sleeps in reedy places; has a tremendous voice, between the lowing of the ox, and the roar of the elephant; when irritated, will attack boats and men with fury."—Note on Job xl.

Mr. Carpenter, in his "Scripture Natural History," referring to Zeringhi, an Italian surgeon, who procured one of these animals to be killed on the banks of the Nile, says, "The hippopotamus which Zeringhi brought from the Nile to Italy was sixteen feet nine inches long, from the extremity of the muzzle to the origin of the tail; fifteen feet in circumference; and six feet and a half high; and the legs were about two feet ten inches long. The head was three feet and a half in length, and eight feet and a half in circumference. The opening of the mouth was two feet four inches, and the largest teeth were more than a foot long."

Dr. Pocock mentions having seen the flesh of the hippopotami sold in the shambles like beef: and it is said, that their breast in particular is as delicate eating as veal. They are said to weigh as much as four or five oxen.

Sparman, in his "Voyages to the Cape of Good Hope," calls them Sea Cows, and mentions one that had been shot at the Cape, whose bulk was so great, that twelve oxen were found necessary to draw it on shore. He further says, "on my return to Sweden, I had the honour to furnish His Majesty's table with a dried Sea Cow's tongue, two feet eight inches long."

Various methods, both in the water and on the land, are employed in vanquishing this creature, all of which are attended with serious danger. Canoes or boats are upset, or smashed to pieces by one gripe in his enormous jaws; which are sometimes dreadfully fatal to the luckless negro hunter on land, of which, if our limits would allow, we might give some instructive instances.

HIPPOPOTAMI IN THE RIVER NIGER.

It is probable that, on account of the increase of mankind in every part of the world, monstrous beasts and reptiles are far less numerous than in former ages. Still it appears that in Africa, hippopotami are numerous, as we learn from the following extract from Landers' Travels. Descending the Niger in a large canoe, he says—"We had paddled along the banks a distance of not less than thirty miles, every inch of which we had attentively examined, but not a bit of dry land could anywhere be discovered, which was firm enough to bear our weight. Therefore we resigned ourselves to circumstances, and all of us having been refreshed with a little cold rice and honey, and water from the stream, we permitted the canoe to drive down with the current, for our men were too much fatigued with the labours of the day to work any longer.

"But here a fresh evil arose, which we were unprepared to meet. An incredible number of hippopotami arose very near us, and came plashing, snorting, and plunging all round the canoe, and placed us in imminent danger. Thinking to frighten them off, we fired a shot or two at them, but the noise only called up from the water, and out of the fens, about as many more of their unweildy companions, and we were more closely beset than before. Our people, who had never in all their lives been exposed in a canoe to such huge and formidable beasts, trembled with fear and apprehension, and absolutely wept aloud; and their terror was not a little increased by the dreadful peals of thunder which rattled over their heads, and by the awful darkness which prevailed, broken at intervals by flashes of lightning whose powerful glare was truly awful. Our people tell us, that these formidable animals frequently upset canoes in the river, when every one in them is sure to perish. These came so close to us at first that we could reach them with the butt end of a gun. When I fired at the first, which I must have hit, every one of them came to the surface of the water, and pursued us so fast over to the north bank, that it was with the greatest difficulty imaginable we could keep before them. Having fired a second time, the report of my gun was followed by a loud roaring noise, and we seemed to measure our distance from them. There were two Bornou men among our crew, who were not so frightened as the rest, having seen some of these creatures before on Lake Tchad, where, they say, plenty of them abound. However the terrible hippopotami did us no kind of mischief at all; no doubt, at first, when we interrupted them, they were only sporting and wallowing in the river for their own amusement, but had they upset our canoe, we should have paid dearly for it."

ANIMAL SAGACITY.

The faculty by which animals can communicate their ideas to each other is very striking; in dogs it is particularly remarkable. There are many curious anecdotes recorded, illustrative of this faculty; but we prefer giving one from our own knowledge. At Horton, in Buckinghamshire (a village where Milton passed some of his early days), about the year 1818, a gentleman from London took possession of a house, the former tenant of which had moved to a farm about half a mile off. The new inmate brought with him a large French poodle, to take the duty of watchman, in the place of a fine Newfoundland dog, which went away with his master: but a puppy of the same breed was left behind; and he was incessantly persecuted by the poodle. As the puppy grew up, the persecution still continued. At length, he was one day missing for some hours; but he did not come back alone: he returned with his old friend, the large house-dog, to whom he had made a communication; and in an instant the two fell upon the unhappy poodle, and killed him before he could be rescued from their fury. In this case, the injuries of the young dog must have been made known to his friend; a plan of revenge concerted; and the determination to carry that plan into effect formed and executed with equal promptitude.—Library of Entertaining Knowledge.

ON GENIUS. (By Dr. Linn.)

The following Reflections on the Nature of Genius, do much honour to the author, who was a native of America, and promised to be an ornament to his country, but was cut off at an early age, leaving behind him only some pieces on Theological Controversy with Dr. Priestley, and the "Powers of Genius," and a few smaller poems, which have been reprinted in England, but are not known equal to their merit.

"Genius is the highest power of the soul, and opens before the poet a subject interesting and extensive. The different faculties which are subservient to its influence, have frequently undergone investigation; while genius itself has seldom been examined with care. Genius receives assistance from all the intellectual powers; but it is, however, to be carefully distinguished from them. We often meet with works of great invention, abounding with errors: the defect then, is not in the genius. It is necessary to direct the wild sallies of imagination, and to regulate the course of the inventive mind. Taste is more generally bestowed upon mankind than genius, and is dependent on cultivation and rules. Genius, though always incorrect without study and investigation, still overcomes every difficulty, and penetrates through the thickest and most hidden recesses. It stoops not to the smaller niceties of taste, but heedless of them, pours along its irresistible course. An excellent taste may exist with little invention, but invention is the distinguishing mark of genius. Taste is improved by the comparison of the different grades of sublimity and beauty. Genius, disdaining any imitation, strikes out a path for itself, wild and hazardous, where foot has never trodden. 'Genius (says Lord Kaimes) is allied to a warm and inflammable constitution; delicacy of taste to calmness and sedateness: hence it is common to meet with genius in one who is a prey to every passion—but seldom delicacy of taste.'

"The greatest incorrectness is frequently connected with genius. Numerous errors spring up in the most fruitful mind. The rich soil which gave birth to the oak, which waves its head in the tempest, also produces weeds and sickly flowers. The slightest impulse is at times sufficient to rouse the full strength of genius. A spark communicated excites the most terrible explosion. The greatest river proceeds from the smallest fountain, rolls its waves over a large extent of country, and heaves its billows with the voice of the ocean." It is supposed that the fall of an apple to the ground directed Newton to the investigation and discovery of the law of gravitation; that the sound of a smith's hammer gave to Pythagoras the first hint of his theory of music; and that a wretched dramatic performance, by an Italian of the name of Adreino, awakened the soul of Milton to the grand conception of Paradise Lost. Genius implies such vast comprehension, such facility in the association of ideas, as enables a person to call in the conceptions that are necessary to execute the design in which he is engaged. We always discover that great stores of materials have been collected by his fancy, and subjected to his judgment. He darts with rapidity over the fields of his investigation; and by this rapidity his ardour becomes more inflamed. "The velocity of his motion sets him on fire, like a chariot wheel, which is kindled by the quickness of its revolution."

REFLECTIONS OF A CHRISTIAN ON HUMAN LIFE.

Haliburton was an eminent minister of the gospel in Scotland: as learned as Voltaire, but a believer, a man of God, a servant of Christ, whose life was spent in seeking the happiness of his fellow creatures. How different his reflections from those of the French unbeliever! He says, "I shall shortly get a very different sight of God from what I have ever had, and shall be made meet to praise him for ever and ever. O, the thoughts of an incarnate Deity are sweet and ravishing! O how I wonder at myself that I do not love him more, and that I do not admire him more! What a wonder that I enjoy such composure under all my bodily pains, and in the view of death itself. What a mercy that, having the use of my reason, I can declare his goodness to my soul. I long for his salvation; I bless his name I have found him, and die rejoicing in him. O blessed be God that I was born! O that I was where he is. I have a father and mother, and ten brothers and sisters in heaven, and I shall be the eleventh. O there is a telling in this providence, and I shall be telling it for ever! If there be such a glory in his conduct towards me now, what will it be to see the Lamb in the midst of the throne? Blessed be God that ever I was born!"

GOD IS LOVE.

All his perfections and procedures are but so many modifications of his love. What is his omnipotence, but the arm of his love? What his omniscience, but the medium through which he contemplates the objects of his love? What his wisdom, but the scheme of his love? What are the offers of the gospel, but the invitations of his love? What the threatenings of the law, but the warnings of his love? They are the hoarse voice of his love, saying, Man! do thyself no harm! They are a fence thrown round the pit of perdition, to prevent rash men from rushing into ruin! What was the incarnation of the Saviour, but the richest illustration of his love? What were the many miracles of Christ, but the condescensions of his love? What were the sighs of Christ, but the breath of his love? What were the prayers of Christ, but the pleadings of his love? What were the tears of Christ, but the dew-drops of his love? What is the earth, but the theatre for the display of his love? What is heaven, but the Alps of his mercy, from whose summit his blessings, flowing down in a thousand streams, descend to water and refresh his church situated at its base.—Dr. Waugh.

TRUTH OF THE SCRIPTURES.

How but from God, could men unskill'd in arts,
In different ages born, in different parts,
Weave such agreeing truths; or how, or why,
Should all conspire to cheat us with a lie?
Unask'd their pains, ungrateful their advice,
Starving their gain, and martyrdom their price?

Dryden.

RUSALEM AT THE TIME OF THE CRUCIFIXION.

By Frederick S. Muller, Esq.

Matt. xxvii, 45, 46, 50—53.

Jerusalem! Jerusalem!
What darkness veils thy diadem!
What shouts are ringing on the air!
What cries of savage fierce despair!
What vengeance in each darkened eye,
Beneath that wild and stormy sky!

Out rush from every gate and tower
Ten thousand gathered in their power;
With flash of shield, and sword, and spear,
And shouts of death and vengeance near;
With tauntings rude, and savage cry,
They bear him on to Calvary.

He bends beneath th' accursed load;
His brows are bath'd in deepest blood;
The weight of woe, the agony,
The thirsting spirit born to die:—
Was there no voice, no mighty power,
To utter vengeance in that hour?

It comes! the hour of wrath is nigh,
Pale wings are rushing through the sky,
Wild heralds of the coming hour,
When earth and heaven shall meet in power;
When hell shall sweep in vengeance by,
With rushing blast and whelming cry.

It comes! it comes! in wildest gloom,
Lone, dark despair, and wrathful doom,
Deep thunder bursting through the sky,
Pale wildness in the lightning's eye,
And crash, and groan, and trumpet swell,
And cloud, and fire, and thunder's knell.

Earth yawns beneath Jerusalem!
A grave for spear, and shield, and helm;
The temple's vail is rent in twain;
The thunder peals in louder strain;
The lightning gleams 'mid deepest gloom,
O'er temple, tower, and ancient tomb.

"Eli!" He spake! from mount and hill
The thunder's shout re-echoed still;
"Eli!" 'Twas done! from earth and sky
The clouds rolled back in majesty;
And o'er that sad and ruined scene,
Broke forth the evening's purple sheen.

The graves by every mount and steep
Gave up their dead from buried sleep:
The tomb was burst, the lightning shed
A gleam around the rising dead,
As on they went from grave and glen—
The dead towards Jerusalem.

The day is done, the starry sky
Is shining over Calvary;
The crucified are in the tomb,
Where midnight sheds her darkest gloom;
And grave, and shroud, and cypress bough,
Are hush'd in deepest slumber now.

Redeemer! Lord! Anointed King!
Thou that dost dwell where angels sing!
Earth waits thy second-advent hour,
When thou shalt come in wrath and power;
When this dark world shall pass away
To endless night, to endless day;
When song and hymn shall be alone,
"Redeemer, may thy will be done!"

Christian Lady's Friend.

THE PLANETARY AND TERRESTRIAL WORLDS.

Mr. Editor,

I sincerely rejoice in your new undertaking, and wish you the largest measure of success, in communicating improving instruction to our reading population. Perhaps you will deem the following admirable piece from the Spectator, worthy of a place in your "Christian's Penny Magazine."

"To us, who dwell on its surface, the earth is by far the most extensive orb that our eyes can anywhere behold: it is also clothed with verdure, distinguished by trees, and adorned with variety of beautiful decorations; whereas to a spectator placed on one of the planets, it wears an uniform aspect, looks all luminous, and no larger than a spot. To beings who still dwell at greater distances, it entirely disappears. That which we call alternately the morning and the evening star, as in one part of the orbit she rides foremost in the procession of night, in the other ushers in and anticipates the dawn, is a planetary world, which, with the four others, that so wonderfully vary the mystic dance, are in themselves dark bodies, and shine only by reflection; have fields, and seas, and skies of their own, are furnished with all accommodations for animal subsistence, and are supposed to be the abodes of intellectual life; all which, together with our earthly habitation, are dependent on that grand dispenser of Divine munificence, the sun; receive their light from the distribution of his rays, and derive their comfort from his benign agency.

"The sun, which seems to perform its daily stages through the sky, is in this respect fixed and immovable: it is the great axle of heaven, about which the globe we inhabit, and other more spacious orbs, wheel their stated courses. The sun, though seemingly smaller than the dial it illuminates, is abundantly larger than this whole earth, on which so many lofty mountains rise, and such vast oceans roll. A line extending from side to side through that resplendent orb, would measure more than eight hundred thousand miles: a girdle formed to go round its circumference, would require a length of millions. Were its solid contents to be estimated, the account would overwhelm our understanding, and be almost beyond the power of language to express. Are we startled at these reports of philosophy? Are we ready to cry out in a transport of surprise, "How mighty is the Being who kindled such a prodigious fire, and keeps alive from age to age such an enormous mass of flame!" Let us attend our philosophic guides, and we shall be brought acquainted with speculations more enlarged and more inflaming.

"This sun with all its attendant planets is but a very little part of the grand machine of the universe; every star, though in appearance no bigger than the diamond that glitters upon a lady's ring, is really a vast globe, like the sun in size and glory; no less spacious, no less luminous than the radiant source of the day: so that every star is not barely a world, but the centre of a magnificent system; has a retinue of worlds, irradiated by its beams, and revolving round its attractive influence, all which are lost to our sight in immeasurable worlds of ether. That the stars appear like so many diminutive and scarcely distinguishable points, is owing to their immense and inconceivable distance. Immense and inconceivable indeed it is, since a ball, shot from the loaded cannon, and flying with unabated rapidity, must travel at this impetuous rate almost seven hundred thousand years before it could reach the nearest of these twinkling luminaries.

"While beholding this vast expanse I learn my own extreme meanness, I would also discover the abject littleness of all terrestrial things. What is the earth with all her ostentatious scenes, compared with this astonishingly grand furniture of the skies? What but a dim speck, hardly perceptible in the map of the universe! It is observed by a very judicious writer, that if the sun himself, which enlightens this part of the creation, was extinguished, and all the hosts of planetary worlds which move about him were annihilated, they would not be missed by an eye that can take in the whole compass of nature, any more than a grain of sand upon the sea shore. The bulk of which they consist, and the space which they occupy is so exceedingly little in comparison of the whole, that their loss would leave scarce a blank in the immensity of God's works. If then, not our globe only, but this whole system, be so very diminutive, what is a kingdom or a country? What are a few lordships, or the so much admired patrimonies of those who are styled wealthy? When I measure them with my own little pittance, they swell into proud and bloated dimensions: but when I take the universe for my standard, how scanty is their size, how contemptible their figure! they shrink into pompous nothings."

IGNORANCE AND IRRELIGION IN LONDON.

St. Barnabas District Visiting Society was formed, January 1830, for the purpose of carrying on a system of benevolent operations, relieving the miserable, and imparting evangelical instruction to the ignorant. The following is an extract from the first Report of this Society: can we, therefore, wonder at crime in London?

"From the families already visited it is a lamentable fact, that two out of three thousand have been found destitute of the Sacred Scriptures, and unaccustomed to attend any place of divine worship. It appears therefore indispensably necessary that means, heretofore not resorted to, should be employed for moralizing, evangelizing, and saving the ignorant and neglected poor. The Committee respectfully and affectionately solicit you to survey the parish in which you reside, and to observe its spiritual condition. Amongst a population of above fifty thousand immortal souls, what proportion of these are in the habit of attending public worship? In the Churches of St. Luke and St. Barnabas, and the Chapels connected with our Dissenting Brethren of every denomination, accommodations for one-fourth of the population are not provided. There must therefore be multitudes of the neglected poor, whose moral and spiritual welfare should be the object of earnest solicitude to their more enlightened and affluent neighbours."

NEW MAP OF THE HOLY LAND.

To promote the study of the Word of Life is one of the principal objects of the Christian's Penny Magazine. We therefore announce with pleasure the following publication of the Sunday School Union, as eminently calculated to assist in a right understanding of the sacred volume.

A MAP OF PALESTINE

In the time of our Saviour, illustrative of the books of the Evangelists; also containing the principal places mentioned in the Old Testament.

It is an admirable help to the intelligent reading of the Holy Scriptures; and what we can cordially recommend to all our readers, especially Sunday School Teachers, Young Persons, and Families. The map is on a whole sheet of large vellum imperial.

OTHER TIMES, AND TIMES TO COME.

How often all curious to know
What the world may have heretofore been,
To ancient and damp musty records we go,
Or sit down and imagine within.

What castles are ruin'd and gone,
What fights have ensanguin'd our plains;
What splendours our hills and our vales have put on
In the villas where opulence reigns.

How strangely our warriors have gleam'd
Cap-a-pié in their martial attire:
With the lance and the plume they contended, nor dream'd
That the chivalrous day should expire.

And how oddly our grandsires are drest
As in fancy they seem to revive,
With the hood and the hoop, and the doublet and vest,
Like some rudely carved figures alive.

And the large chimney corner in hall,
Where the yeomen have met for good fare,
In the stiff stately mansion with windows so small,
One would think that a prison was there.

How precise in their manner they seem,
Scarcely thawed by the heat of the sun!
And how seldom the soft-flowing charities beam,
Or appear through their system to run.

But enough—there's a mist on the view,
'Tis an outline imperfect I trace;
They are seen but obscurely, as I shall be too,
When to others I stand in their place.

For my children their children shall show
What I was, and my story convey;
But the next generation will wonder to know
What the world could have been in my day.

Then of all who now bustle around,
The history a mystery will be;
For how few will be here when that period comes round,
Of the thousands—nay, millions we see!

And the world is just what it has been,
And in some degree yet must remain,
Made perfect and pure, now by reason of sin
All perturbed with affliction and pain.

But the leaven is cast in the meal,
And the earth is remember'd of God;
There's a heaven-born principle works for our weal
With an energy widely abroad.

Better times than the present or past,
Will arrive with a happy increase;
And the world all reform'd will be happy at last,
In simplicity, safety, and peace.

KING HENRY VIII ORDERING THE PUBLICATION OF THE FIRST ENGLISH BIBLE.

RITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

wondrous Institution, the glory of our age and n, originated in the endeavours of the Rev. Thomas les, of Bala, the principal leader of the Calvinistic iodists in Wales, to supply his countrymen with loly Scriptures in their native language. On his to London for that purpose, the subject being ioned at a committee-meeting of the Religious Society, its secretary, the Rev. Mr. Hughes, sug- d the idea of a general society for supplying the world with Bibles! The friends present ap- ng the proposition, measures were taken to call a c meeting, which, on the 7th of March 1804, was it the London Tavern, consisting of about three ed persons of different denominations, including worthy Quakers. For the purpose of carrying resolutions into effect, it was deemed advisable to the patronage of some person of rank. Dr. Por- then Bishop of London, yielded to the applica- gave his cordial sanction; and recommended Teignmouth as president; an office which that guished nobleman has ever since filled with honour. al other prelates gave their names, which were led on the list of vice presidents. The Rev. Jo- Hughes, M. A., a Baptist minister, and its original tor, the Rev. Josiah Pratt, M. A., of the Church gland, and the Rev. Charles F. A. Steinkopff, D. D., ter of the Lutheran Chapel in London, were ap- d secretaries.

The fundamental law of the Bible Society declares its title as above; and also, that its object is exclusively to promote the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, both at home and abroad; and further, that the copies circulated in the United Kingdom, in the English language, shall be those only of the authorized version. The constitution of this great Society admits of the co-operation of all persons who are disposed to concur in its support; and it is ordained that its proceedings shall be conducted by a committee, consisting of thirty-six laymen, six of whom shall be foreigners residing in London and its vicinity; half of the remainder members of the Church of England, and the other half members of other denominations of Christians. The presidents, and all clergymen and dissenting ministers, subscribing to the Society, may vote at the meetings of the committee.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has had many enemies; but to detail its history would require volumes. It has been the means of originating similar institutions in most parts of the world in which the Bible is believed, conveying its immortal blessings to all nations. Either in England or in foreign countries, directly at the expense of the Society, or indirectly by grants to societies abroad, or to individuals, this astonishing Institution has reprinted the Holy Scriptures in 44 languages; re-translations of the Scriptures in 5 languages; in 72 languages and dialects in which they never had previously been printed; and in 32, new translations commenced or completed; making a total of 153 different languages and dialects! It had issued, up to March 1831, more than seven millions of copies of the Holy Scriptures; and had expended the sum of 1,779,993*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* Besides which, nearly five millions of copies of Bibles and Testaments had been issued by the kindred societies in other parts of Europe, in Asia, and in America.

Worthily have the British and Foreign Bible Society directed their generous efforts to supply the poor of our own country with the Word of God; and the benefits which they have derived from these attentions are incalculable. This noble Institution claims, as it deserves, the liberal support of every Christian patriot; as it is evidently ordained to be eminently instrumental in regenerating our own nation, and of recovering all the nations of the earth to the knowledge and enjoyment of God, in the ordinances of true religion.

FIRST PUBLICATION OF THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

William Tindal, called "The Apostle of England," and "the good martyr of God" for the Holy Scriptures, deserves to be had in everlasting remembrance, by every Christian using the English language. For to that devoted man, under the gracious providence of God, we owe the English translation of the Holy Bible.

Tindal was born at the close of the fifteenth century, in or near to Wales, and received his education partly at Oxford, and afterwards at Cambridge. Being called by grace at an early period of his life, his diligence and success as a scholar were extraordinary; and his thirst after divine knowledge was insatiable. He heard of Luther's Reformation in Germany, and procured some of that great man's writings, by which his mind was confirmed in his abhorrence of the abominations of Popery. As Luther had translated the Bible into German, and thus conferred an inestimable benefit on his countrymen, Tindal determined on translating the word of God into English He attempted to accomplish that noble work in England; but the opposition and persecution of the popish priests in this country, necessitated him to withdraw to the continent; and after conferences with Luther and his colleagues, he settled at Antwerp, where in 1526, he printed an octavo edition of the New Testament.

Many of the copies of this volume were imported and sold in England; when "Archbishop Warham sent a pastoral letter to all the prelates of his province, A. D. 1526, acquainting them that certain children of iniquity, blinded by malice, had translated the New Testament into English, to spread heresy, and ruin men's souls; and that some of these pernicious books had been brought into England. He directed them, therefore, to command all persons in their diocese, who had any of these dangerous books, to deliver them up to their bishop, or his commissary, within thirty days, under the pain of excommunication, and of being punished as heretics."

Sir Thomas More, then Lord Chancellor, condemned the work; and those who sold or purchased it were sentenced to ride on horseback with their faces to the tail, the condemned volumes tied about them;—and, at the Standard in Cheapside, London, they were compelled to throw them into the fire, after which they were to pay a heavy fine to the king. Great numbers of the New Testament were sold; and, supported by the price of them, Tindal, assisted by John Frith, William Roye, and Miles Coverdale, proceeded to translate the Old Testament, which was published in 1535.

Incensed against the authors of this translation, which was extensively sold in England, the Bishops contrived the destruction of Tindal; and as he lodged in the house of Thomas Pointz, an Englishman at Antwerp, Henry Philips was employed to seek his friendship and betray him. This guilty work he accomplished: Tindal was betrayed; condemned by the officers of Charles V, and strangled at Tilford Castle near Antwerp, in 1536. This holy man, however, instead of indulging enmity against his enemies, cherished for them divine benevolence; and aware that Henry VIII had in some measure sanctioned the prelates in his ruin, he died, praying, "Lord! open the eyes of the king of England."

The Scriptures were loudly called for by many in the nation; but Henry published a proclamation against them in 1530. Dr. Cranmer being, on the death of Warham in 1533, made Archbishop of Canterbury, moved in a convocation that an application be made to the king for a translation of the Bible. Cranmer obtained the king's permission, and delivered it in parts to several learned men; but in the mean time Tindal and Coverdale were perfecting their work; and the next year, 1537, after Tindal's martyrdom, Coverdale, assisted by John Rogers, published a new edition of the Bible revised, and compared with the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Luther's German translation, dedicated to Henry VIII, under the feigned name of Matthews.

Cranmer presented the Bible to king Henry, who ordered it to be printed as newly translated; and it was committed to the care of Richard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch, who, by means of Bonner, the English ambassador in France, obtained leave to have it printed in Paris. This being made known to the priests, the French printers, their English employers, and Coverdale, who superintended the work, were summoned by the inquisitors; and the impression, consisting of 2,500 copies, was seized and condemned to the flames. Covetousness induced the officers to sell some of them for waste paper, and by this means many reached England. When Cranmer received some copies of this Bible, he said it gave him more joy than if he had received ten thousand pounds.

The proprietors of the work escaped, and succeeded in bringing the types, presses, and printers to London, where the undertaking was finished. In 1538, by the king's proclamation, dated 1537, one of these Bibles was ordered to be placed in every parish church; and in 1539, Lord Cromwell procured permission for private persons to purchase copies of the English Scriptures.

Bishop Burnet observes, that in 1541, "Bonner, seeing the king's mind was set on this, ordered six of these great Bibles to be set up in several places of St. Paul's; that all persons who could read, might at all times. And upon the pillars to which these Bibles were chained, an exhortation was set up, admonishing all that came thither to read, that they should lay aside vain-glory, hypocrisy, and all other corrupt affections, and bring with them discretion, good intentions, charity, reverence, and a quiet behaviour, for the edification of their souls.—But people came generally to hear the Scriptures read; and such as could read, and had clear voices, came often thither with great crowds about them. And many sent their children to school, that they might carry them to St. Paul's, and hear them read the Scriptures."

Pilate's question to our Saviour, "What is truth?" in the Latin vulgate stands thus: "Quid est veritas?" These letters transposed make "Est vir qui adest." "It is the man before thee."—Youth's Magazine.

THE CAUSE OF INFIDELITY.

Mr. Editor,

The apathy of man with respect to his uture destiny, so vividly displayed in the conduct and writings of the Atheists of our own times, is to me a ubject of wonder and astonishment. I mix with the men of the world. I see them in their business, and hear their conversation. I talk with them in private, and yet cannot find that they are at all careful of what shall be their fate hereafter: any subject seems more nteresting than religion—any topic more cheerfully argued. Why then, I am compelled to ask, is this the case? How comes it that this indifference pervades every mind, and this thoughtlessness fills every heart? Are men ignorant of their nature? Do they not know that they are destined to be the possessors of a boundless eternity—that their continuance on earth will be of short duration, and yet, that when myriads of years shall have rolled by, their spirits will be found either enjoying happiness in the bosom of their God, or writhing beneath the fell tyranny of the Evil One in the regions of the lost? That they are in ignorance of these facts, I cannot, I will not believe. Who is he that shall stand beside the death-bed of a friend, and yet profess gnorance of the nature of the spirit's departure from its earthly tabernacle? Who is he that shall see his acquaintance drop one by one into the grave, and still believe that the life of man is not transitory, and of short duration? That all men die, is a fact so evident that none can deny it. That the writer and the reader of this article will ere long be laid in the silent tomb is certain: and that the multitudes which now crowd our streets and market places will soon become food for the worms, is incontestibly proved by the years that are past. True it is, that no traveller has returned to tell the tale of what he has had to undergo; but does that form a sufficient excuse for indifference on the part of beings, who ere long will have to experience all he realities of eternity? I should have thought that uch a consideration as this would have increased rather han diminished our anxiety respecting the part we hall act, and the course we shall tread in the boundless ges of futurity. A novel or romance possesses the ower of working our feelings to the highest, and we an watch with anxiety every step which the hero of ction takes, every word that he utters, every trial he ndures, and in a painful and breathless suspense, attend to the denouement of all his plans, and the conlusion of his sufferings. The business of life has harms to engross the whole soul, and call forth every nergy of the mind, and with painful watchings we bserve every opening prospect which seems to increase r lessen our chances of success. What! shall I be old then that this same being is inattentive to the most wful of all plans, and indifferent about the termination f his own existence; that he treats with contempt the Revelation which God has given of his Son, and, drunk with the cup administered by the syren, Pleasure, reuses to drink of those waters of life which are pure, and the drinker of which is assured that he shall thirst no more. Clear it must be to every man, that some trange infatuation overwhelms the soul, for otherwise t would not be careless on these important topics. And what is this infatuation? What is it that has the power of blinding man to his best and only real interest? None other than The Devil!! Yes, Infidel, ridicule you may, and scoff you may, and jeer you may; but the awful truth is inscribed in letters which the ocean of eternity can never wash out—that you are under Satanic influence; that when you rise up it is to spend the day under the guidance of the father of lies, and when you lie down to take your rest his wings overshadow you. What an awful thought!

This is the only cause which I can discover for the reign of infidelity. It does not rest in man's own heart, for it is clear that his mind does look forward to futurity. It consists in him who has the power of blinding this heart to its own interest, and stilling all its secret admonitions And, therefore, I hesitate not to say, that every one who in thought, word, or deed, is indifferent to his future destiny, is the servant and slave of Satan now:—and I leave him to judge whose servant he will be hereafter.

To you, Mr. Editor, I cannot but be thankful (as one most anxious for the eternal welfare of my fellow men) for establishing a work which bids fair to shake the strong-holds of infidelity; and that it may do so, will ever be the earnest prayer of, yours most sincerely,

MARTYRDOM OF ST. VINCENT, A SPANISH MARTYR.

This Christian hero was a native of Saragossa, and the son of a distinguished magistrate. His learning and eloquence early introduced him to the notice of his diocesan Valerius, whose deacon he became; and as that prelate was afflicted with an impediment in speaking, on him devolved the duty of addressing the congregation from the episcopal seat. His popularity reached the ear of Dacian, who summoned both bishop and deacon before him, and who committed both, heavily fettered, to the dark dungeons of Valencia. Having passed some time in this horrible abode, with food scarcely sufficient to sustain life, both were again brought before the tyrant, who, on observing their cheerful countenances, which exhibited no marks of suffering, angrily demanded of the guards whether they had not disobeyed his commands. On hearing that his orders had been punctually performed, he artfully endeavoured to seduce by an affected moderation those on whom severity had produced no visible effect. He exhorted them to comply with the decrees of the world's great masters, who insisted that the dignity of the ancient worship should be restored, and the gods everywhere honoured by sacrifices.

Valerius attempted to reply, but seeing his embarrassed utterance, his young friend said: "Father, dost thou permit me to answer this judge?" The other replied, "My son, I have long trusted thee with the office of speaking, and I leave thee now to justify the faith for which we are standing here." In a discourse of surprising energy and eloquence, the deacon then vindicated the unity of God, and the divinity of Christ, and contrasted the sublimity of the doctrines he professed with the puerile absurdities of paganism. He concluded by asserting that entreaties no less than menaces would be unable to make them guilty of idolatry.

The intrepidity of the advocate filled Dacian with fury. "Let this bishop," he exclaimed, "be removed hence; as he has disobeyed the imperial edict, he is justly exiled: but for this fellow, who to disobedience adds insult, a heavier punishment is reserved. Apply the torture; dislocate his limbs, and let him feel a rebel's punishment." The order was promptly obeyed, and Dacian had both the gratification to witness, and the barbarity to deride, the agonies of the sufferer. The latter, whose cheek blanched not, and whose lips uttered not one word of complaint, regarding his persecutor with that calm composure which proved that his heaven was already begun, merely replied,—"I have always wished for an opportunity of proving my attachment to the religion of Christ; thou hast given it me, and I am content;" Mad with rage, the governor struck the executioners because they could not force a single groan from their victim. "What!" exclaimed the sufferer, with the most provoking coolness, "dost thou too wish to avenge me of these brutal men?" Dacian now foamed at the mouth, and roared, rather than spoke, to them,—"Cannot you extort one cry of pain from this man, ye who have so often bent the most stubborn malefactors? Is he thus to triumph over us?" Sharper instruments were now brought, the flesh of the Christian was torn from his bones, and his whole body represented the appearance of one vast wound. For a moment even the savage Dacian was, or appeared to be, softened. "Young Christian," said he, "hast thou no pity for thyself? In the flower of thine age canst thou not be persuaded to avoid a horrible death by one act of submission?" "Thy feigned sympathy," replied the other with the same unshaken tranquillity, "affects me as little as the exquisite torments thou causest me to feel. I will not deny my Maker for thy idols of wood and stone. Thy perseverance will fail sooner than my constancy."

The victim was next laid on an iron bed, the surface of which was covered with sharp projecting points, and a slow fire placed under it. His body was pressed against the spikes, boiling liquids were poured into his wounds; his bones were crushed by blows with iron bars: in short, every species of torture was employed that hellish cunning could devise. Still the heroic sufferer murmured not. At length, his mangled limbs having been dashed on a bed of sharp flints, he felt that the moment of his deliverance was at hand. In vain did the tyrant order him to be laid on a comfortable couch, and every effort made to restore him, that, on his recovery, human ingenuity might be taxed for the invention of new torments: in a few hours he expired. His corpse was carried out to sea, and plunged into the waves: it was soon washed on shore, was found by some Christians, and secretly buried. The report of his superhuman constancy was rapidly spread throughout Christendom; and in the time of St. Augustine his festival was celebrated in every Christian place.—Lardner's Cyclopedia, History of Spain and Portugal.

ON THE GROWTH OF PLANTS.

The astonishing power with which God has endued the vegetable creation to multiply its different species, may be instanced in the seed of the elm. This tree produces one thousand five hundred and eighty-four millions of seeds; and each of these seeds has the power of producing the same number. How astonishing is this produce! At first one seed is deposited in the earth; from this one a tree springs, which in the course of its vegetable life produces one thousand five hundred and eighty millions of seeds. This is the first generation. The second generation will amount to two trillions five hundred and ten thousand and fifty-six billions. The third generation will amount to fourteen thousand six hundred and fifty-eight quadrillions, seven hundred and twenty-seven thousand and forty trillions. And the fourth generation will amount to fifty-one sextillions, four hundred and eighty-one thousand three hundred and eighty-one quintillions, one hundred and twenty-three thousand one hundred and thirty-six quadrillions! Sums too immense for the human mind to conceive; and when we allow the most confined space in which a tree can grow, it appears that the seeds of the third generation from one elm would be many myriads of times more than sufficient to stock the whole superficies of all the planets in the solar system!

Thistles multiply enormously: a species called the carolia sylvestris bears ordinarily from twenty to forty heads, each containing from one hundred to one hundred and fifty seeds. Another species called the acanthum vulgare, produces above one hundred heads, each containing from three hundred to four hundred seeds. Suppose we say that these thistles produce, on a medium, only eighty heads, and that each contains only three hundred seeds; the first crop from these would amount to twenty-four thousand. Let these be sown, and their crop will amount to five hundred and seventy-six millions. Sow these, and their produce will be thirteen billions, eight hundred and twenty-four thousand millions; and a single crop from these, which is only the third year's growth, would amount to three hundred and thirty-one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six billions; and the fourth years' growth will amount to seven thousand nine hundred and sixty-two trillions six hundred and twenty-four thousand billions;—a progeny more than sufficient to stock not only the surface of the world, but of all the planets in the solar system, so that no other plant or vegetable could possibly grow, allowing but the space of one square foot for each plant.—Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary on the Bible.

DIVISIBILITY OF MATTER.

Divisibility is that property of matter by which its parts may be divided and separated.

Thus, as matter cannot be annihilated by division, so, however small the particles into which it is divided, each will have an upper and under surface, which may be separated by suitable instruments.

Exp. 1. A grain of gold, melted with a pound or 5,760 grains of silver, and a single grain of the mass dissolved into diluted nitric acid, the gold, though only the 5,761st part of a grain, will fall to the bottom, and be visible; but the silver will be dissolved in the acid.

2. A grain of silver may be beaten till a microscope shows 1,000 distinct parts; if one of these be then dissolved, it will tinge 18,000 grains of water; a grain is therefore divisible into 18,000,000 sensible parts.

3. A pound of cotton has been spun so fine, that it would extend 168,000 yards, or 95 miles.

4. A grain of gold may be hammered by the gold beater, so that the naked eye can see the two millionth part of the grain.

5. Also till it will cover 50 square inches, and is only then the hundred thousandth part of an inch.

6. In addition to these experiments, there are animalculæ so small, that many thousands together are smaller than the point of a needle.

Mr. Lewenhoeck says, there are more animals in the milt of a cod-fish, than men on the whole earth; and a single grain of sand is larger than four millions of these animals. Moreover, a particle of blood of one of these animalculæ has been found by calculation, to be as much less than a globe of 1-10th of an inch diameter, as that globe is less than the whole earth. He states, that a grain of sand, in diameter but the hundredth part of an inch, will cover 125,000 of the orifices through which we perspire; and that of some animalculæ, 3,000,000,000 are not equal to a grain of sand.

7. The natural divisions of matter are still more wonderful. In odoriferous bodies a surprising subtility of parts is perceived; several bodies, in a long time, scarcely lose any sensible part of their weight, and yet continually fill a very large space with odoriferous particles.

Dr. Keill computes the magnitude of a particle of assa fœtida, to be only thirty-eight trillionths of a cubic inch. One grain of musk will diffuse its odour for many years.—Blair's Natural and Experimental Philosophy.

NATURAL HISTORY.

As this beautiful and interesting science will form one among the departments of our Magazine, it has been thought, that it would prove acceptable to many, especially to our junior readers, to give a few papers, with the view of exciting attention to those objects, which lie immediately within their reach, and of assisting them in their observations. We shall endeavour to divest our descriptions of all the technicalities of science, or, if we are compelled to use them, shall afford such explanation, that they will easily be understood. We shall offer no apology for using what may have been written by other people; our object is to instruct, and we wish to do it in the most pleasing and in the most efficient manner; at the same time, we shall duly acknowledge to whom we are indebted, for any matter we may introduce to our readers. We begin with

THE SPARROW.

(Fringilla Domestica, Linn. Passer Domesticus, Ray).

This well-known little bird is found all over Europe, and also in Africa and Asia. It may be called the companion of man, never appearing but where he has erected his dwelling; and, as Col. Montague observes, "on the extensive and dreary mountain not a sparrow is to be seen, and the sight of one bespeaks some habitation near." It seems to depend on man for its supplies, taking its place with much audacity among the poultry, and feeding upon what has been thrown to them. It will also visit the garden, and pick up the seeds sown by the gardener, unless he takes some method to prevent it; and although it prefers grain of all kinds, yet it will take its station in a gooseberry or currant bush, especially the latter, and help itself very freely, "without having been invited."

From the circumstance that these birds build either about the house, or on trees, it has been popularly inferred that there are two kinds; but this is not the case. The bird usually selects some warm situation for its nest, either upon or near the dwelling of man, sometimes building in holes under the tiles, &c., and sometimes in trees. Its nest is made in a very slovenly manner, and consists of the refuse of the work table, sweepings of the house, bits of bass from the garden, &c. Mr. Rennie says (Architecture of Birds, p. 319), "a pair of these birds, unfortunately for themselves, carried off from the garden a long piece of bass; but when this had been successfully stowed in the nest under the tiles, it appeared that they had not sufficient skill to work it into the fabric, and in their endeavours to manage it, both the birds entangled their feet so inextricably in the folds, that they were held close prisoners, one only having line enough to flutter about a foot beyond the entrance. How long they had remained thus entangled, we know not, as our attention was called to their situation by the more than ordinary cackling of their neighbour sparrows, who had assembled, it appeared, more to scold the unfortunate pair for their carelessness, than to assist them in getting rid of the bass, for not one attempted to aid them. We therefore had them taken down, but they were so exhausted with their struggles that they did not long survive; and a pair of their scolding neighbours took possession of their premises a few days afterwards." It is very amusing to watch the birds collect materials for their nests; they will be seen to carry away pieces of coloured silk, feathers, or any thing that they can work up.

Mr. Rennie observes (Architecture of Birds, p. 320), "It is worthy of notice, that sparrows always proportion the quantity of materials to the size of the nest-hole, which is generally packed close, leaving only a sufficient cavity for hatching the eggs, and rearing the young. We have one of these nests, for example, which could almost be hid in the hollow of the hand, and another built about a yard from it which would fill a hat. When the nest is built on a tree, however, it is always nearly of the same dimensions, about a foot in diameter each way." "But wherever the nest is placed, a roofing seems to be an indispensable requisite; and when built on a tree, a dome of straw is piled together in the loose, lumbering, inartificial style of the rest of the structure, an entrance being formed under this, in the side, sufficient to admit the birds, but not neatly rounded. When sparrows build in the ivied wall of a house, as they often do, they do not consider the thick clustering of the leaves above the nest as a sufficiently warm coping; and in such cases, usually, if not always, they construct a dome of straw, though much more slight than in nests built on the exposed branches of trees." Mr. Rennie has placed this bird in a class which he ingeniously calls dome-builders.

"This bird lays six eggs of a whitish colour, spotted with dusky brown or ash grey" (Col. Montague's Ornithological Dictionary, p. 486); but there is a remarkable difference in the marking of the eggs, no two being exactly alike. The writer of this paper possesses specimens taken from different nests about his house, in which this is particularly the case; and this difference does not only exist in the eggs of different birds, but between the eggs of the same bird; however, the general character is as described above: he has two specimens taken from a nest under the tiles, in which the colour is dusky brown, spotted with darker shades of the same colour. The sparrow weighs about seven drachms: it produces three broods in a year.

SIGNS OF RAIN.

The following "Signs of Rain" may prove acceptable to our readers in this beautiful but variable month of June. They form an excuse to a friend for not accepting an invitation to make an excursion with him, by the late Dr. Jenner.

"The hollow winds begin to blow:
The clouds look black, the glass is low;
The soot falls down, the spaniels sleep,
And spiders from their cobwebs peep.
Last night the sun went pale to bed,
The moon in halos hid her head;
The boding shepherd heaves a sigh,
For, see! a rainbow spans the sky.
The walls are damp, the ditches smell,
Clos'd is the pink-eyed pimpernel.
Hark! how the chairs and tables crack;
Old Betty's joints are on the rack;
Loud quack the ducks, the peacocks cry;
The distant hills are looking nigh.
How restless are the snorting swine;
The busy flies disturb the kine;
Low o'er the grass the swallow wings;
The cricket too, how sharp he sings.
Puss on the hearth, with velvet paws,
Sits, wiping o'er her whiskered jaws.
Through the clear stream the fishes rise,
And nimbly catch th' incautious flies.
The glow-worms, numerous and bright,
Illum'd the dewy dell last night.
At dark the squalid toad was seen,
Hopping and crawling o'er the green.
The whirling wind the dust obeys,
And in the rapid eddy plays.
The frog has chang'd his yellow vest,
And in a russet coat is drest:

Though June, the air is cold and still,
The mellow blackbird's voice is shrill.
My dog, so altered is his taste,
Quits mutton-bones, on grass to feast;
And see, yon rooks, how odd their flight,
They imitate the gliding kite,
And seem precipitate to fall,
As if they felt the piercing ball.—
'Twill surely rain, I see with sorrow;
Our jaunt must be put off to-morrow."

ORIGIN OF THE ART OF PRINTING.

Printing by moveable types is one of the most wonderful arts which Divine Providence has ever enabled man to discover. Benefits and blessings innumerable have been enjoyed by this means; and it appears evidently designed to be instrumental in overthrowing the reign of ignorance and misery throughout the world. "Knowledge is power." Knowledge is one of the chief elements of happiness. Knowledge is essential to true religion; and Christianity is especially a religion of knowledge: we hail, therefore, the "wondrous art," as ordained of God to be an admirable auxiliary in the promotion of the emancipation, the regeneration, and the salvation of the human race.

Our readers cannot but be interested in learning the origin and progress of that art, from which they have derived so much pleasure and improvement.

Some writers have ascribed the origin of the Art of Printing to the East, and affixed a very early period for its invention. But these have evidently confounded the European mode of printing, with the engraved tablets which to this day are used in China.

The honour of having invented this most useful art has been claimed by three different cities of Europe, and by three different individuals connected with them: viz. Laurentius of Haerlem, Fust or Faustus of Mentz, and Guttemberg, or Gutenberg, of Strasburg. Without troubling our readers with a tedious detail of the claims on each side, or the various arguments and circumstances adduced in their respective support by different authors, we shall only state it as our decided opinion, that the whole series of facts appears to be entirely in favour of Laurentius of Haerlem, who first made use of separate wooden types about the year 1430; and that Faustus and Guttemberg had only acquired and improved the art in consequence of his original invention. Along with this fact, Junius mentions a number of trivial circumstances, of which one is chiefly worthy of notice; viz. that Laurentius made his discovery in consequence of cutting some letters on trees in a wood, afterwards rubbing them with ink, impressing a piece of paper upon them, and taking off the impression to amuse his grandchildren. After this accidental discovery, Laurentius, who was the son of John Koster, or Custos, or Æditous (i. e. keeper) of the cathedral at Haerlem, then a respectable office, made first wooden types of beech, in whole pages, with which he printed an anonymous work on one side; but the pages were afterwards pasted together, and the book entitled, Speculum nostræ Salutis (the Mirror of our Salvation). His ingenuity led him to contrive moveable wooden types, with which he printed many works; afterwards he formed his types of lead, and at last he mixed a portion of tin in the composition. When his types were useless, he melted them; of which he made several "wine pots," which his grandson Gerard Thomas possessed, above a century after. Laurentius, finding his trade increase, multiplied the number of his workmen; but one of them, John Faustus, having seized a collection of the types and other implements, set off with an accomplice, first to Amsterdam, then t Cologne, and last to Mentz, where he settled an wrought "with the tools he had stolen." Some sa that John Genfleish was the thief, and others that i was Guttemberg, and that Faustus, who was a wealth man, assisted the first printers with money, to carry o their art at Mentz.

Perfect information on this subject may not be attainable, nor is it necessary for us: we learn, however that the two brothers, Genfleishes, hired the house o Zum Jungen, at Mentz, in 1443; and being assiste with money by Faustus, he and John Meidenbachi and some others, were admitted partners; and in 144 they were also joined by Guttemberg, who for that purpose left Strasburg. The Genfleishes made further improvements in their metal types; and after som smaller attempts, they printed in 1450, an edition o the Bible in Latin!

The same year the partnership was dissolved, and new one formed between Faustus and Guttemberg; b whom the art of printing was improved during seve years, and in 1457, a "magnificent edition" of th Psalter was published by Faustus and Schoeffer; bu which owed much of its elegance to the ingenuity o Guttemberg. This was the first book that was printe with a date: after which the practice of prefixing o subjoining the date and printer's name became common.

Peter Schoeffer, who had been a kind of foreman, or under-partner of Faustus, completed the discover of the art by the efforts of his own genius. For afte various experiments, he found that the character might be cut in a matrix, in which the letters might b singly cast instead of the tedious process of cuttin every one. He then privately cut matrices for th whole alphabet; and when he showed his master th types cast from these matrices, Faustus was so overjoyed, that he promised him his only daughter Christina in marriage; which fair portion he soon possessed, the well-earned reward of his persevering ingenuity. The method of hardening the metal he soon afterwards discovered, by which he completed the whole of this inestimable invention.

Faustus and his son-in-law were accustomed to make their workmen take an oath to keep their improved art a secret. But the city of Mentz being taken and sacked, October 27, 1462, by Abp. Adolphus, of Nassau, their compositors were dispersed, and the invention spread throughout Europe, to diffuse its marvellous benefits. From this period to 1466, Faustus and Schoeffer continued to print a great number of books, mostly on vellum, and beautifully ornamented with gilt and painted head and tail pieces, like the old manuscripts. In 1466, Faustus carried a large numbe of Bibles to Paris, and sold them at first as manuscript, obtaining from five hundred to six hundred crowns fo a single copy: but afterwards he lowered the price t sixty, and even to forty crowns.

William Caxton, a mercer and citizen of London, i commonly honoured as having introduced the art o printing into England, in 1471. But a small book i the public library at Cambridge, which had not bee observed before the Restoration, affords clear evidenc that Caxton was not the first English printer. Thi book, consisting of eighty-two quarto pages, was printe at Oxford, in December 1468. In that it is stated that "as soon as the art of printing made some noise i Europe, Thomas Bourchier, Abp. of Canterbury, move the king (Henry VI), to use all means for procurin a printing mould to be brought into this kingdom. Th king, a good man, readily hearkened to the motion. He devoted first one thousand merks towards the expense, and afterwards five hundred more; the arc bishop gave three hundred. Mr. Robert Turnour, the master of the robes to the king, was appointed commissioner; who took with him Mr. Caxton, he being an experienced trader to Holland. His business afforded him good pretence for the journey. Accordingly, they accomplished their object, and Frederick Corsellis stole off with them in disguise, and was quickly brought to London, and thence sent to Oxford under a strong guard, till he accomplished his engagement of teaching several Englishmen the whole art of composing, printing, distributing, &c. Thus the first British press was set up at Oxford; and this press at Oxford was at least ten years before there was any printing in Europe, except at Haerlem and Mentz.

Corsellis perhaps must be allowed priority in point of time, but the merit of being the first printer in England, who used fusile types, belongs to William Caxton. This benefactor to his country was a very respectable character; and in 1464 had been employed by Edward IV along with R. Whitehall, Esq., to conclude a treaty with Edward's brother-in-law, the Duke of Burgundy. In the Bodleian library there is a copy of Æsop's Fables, printed by Caxton, which is believed to be the first book which has its leaves numbered. After living to be upwards of 80 years of age, Caxton died in 1494.

Since the days of Caxton, the father of the typographic art in England, how wonderfully has this most wonderful invention been improved! We cannot here enlarge upon the ingenious contrivance of stereotype plates; nor speak of the immense printing establishment at Oxford, which now is said to print at the rate of ONE BIBLE PER MINUTE, nor of the still more magnificent establishment at New York, in which, with sixteen steam presses, they are able to print at the astonishing rate of FIVE BIBLES PER MINUTE through the year. But to what a degree of perfection it is possible to carry this amazing invention, we are utterly at a loss to conceive, when we are assured, that the Times Newspaper can be struck off by means of their steam apparatus at the rate of fifty copies per minute!!

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

THIS is an establishment highly worthy of the encouragement, especially of our citizens, and the inhabitants of the eastern parts of the metropolis, as it affords to them an evening's most delightful walk and amusement, every way rational and instructive. To have the mind thus employed after the fatigues of business, in contemplating the wonders of creation in some of the more noble animals, would be highly beneficial; while the walk would, we doubt not, contribute much to the health of those who of necessity are kept within the "smoke of London" all the day.

It would be impossible to do any thing like justice to these gardens within the limits of a single paper; we wish to draw the attention of our readers to them, and we advise that they should inspect them for themselves. They will find among the animals some very fine specimens. That of the Barbary lion is most magnificent, and those of the true Asiatic lion are well worth attention. These, as well as other exotic animals, are kept in a magnificent building, designed by Mr. H. Phillips of Brighton. It is circular, and three hundred feet in circumference, and is inclosed by about thirty thousand panes of glass: it will be warmed by hot water, in order to preserve the animals from the rigours of our climate in winter. There is another smaller building also inclosed in glass; this is used as a monkey-house, and will prove effectual, we hope, in preserving these animals during the winter. We were pleased to see there, in a visit we paid the other day, two fine specimens of the boa constrictor, each about thirteen feet in length, and one specimen of what was called an African boa just received. We were gratified also in observing that many of the plants and trees had their names attached to them, a plan that cannot be too strongly recommended in all public institutions of this character. The whole gardens comprise an extent of fifteen acres, and there is a piece of water of about three acres which gives a beautiful effect. The animals are fed twice a day, in the morning, and at five o'clock in the afternoon; an organ, which is stationed in the circular building, gives notice to the animals that the feeding time has arrived, and a bell is rung in the gardens to give the same notice to the company. We think this is one of the best times to visit them, as the animals then of course are particularly lively. The effect of the music upon the animals is curious, making the lions roar, &c. We understand that an elephant is shortly to be placed among the collection. In conclusion, we cordially wish the proprietors every success in this spirited undertaking.

CHRISTIANITY RECOMMENDED BY AN INFIDEL.

DR. ELLIOTT was well acquainted with Colonel Allen, a celebrated infidel in America, and made him a visit at a time when his daughter was sick and near dying. He was introduced to the colonel in his library, where he read to the Doctor some passages of his writings with much evident self-complacency, and asked, "Is not that well done?" While they were thus engaged, a messenger entered, informing Colonel Allen that his daughter was dying, and desired to speak with him. Immediately he hastened to her chamber, accompanied by Dr. Elliott, who was desirous of witnessing the affecting interview. The wife of Colonel Allen was a pious woman, who had carefully instructed her daughter in the principles of Christianity. As soon as her father appeared at her bed-side, she said to him, "I am about to die: shall I believe in the principles you have taught me, or shall I believe in what my mother has taught me?" The infidel colonel became extremely agitated: his chin quivered, his whole frame shook; and after waiting a few moments, he replied, "Believe what your mother has taught you."

THE HEAVENLY CROWN.

DURING the last French war, a French officer, who was a prisoner upon his parole at Reading, met with a Bible; he read it, and was so struck with its contents, that he was convinced of the folly of his sceptical principles, and of the truth of Christianity, and resolved to become a Protestant. When his gay associates rallied him for taking so serious a turn, he said in his vindication, "I have done no more than my old school-fellow Bernadotte, who has become a Lutheran." "Yes," but he became so, said his associates, "to obtain a crown." "My motive," said the Christian officer, "is the same; we only differ as to the place. The object of Bernadotte is to obtain a crown in Sweden, mine is to obtain a crown in heaven!"

HOW TO ENJOY LIFE.

"Live while you live," the Epicure would say,
"And seize the pleasures of the present day."
"Live while you live," the sacred preacher cries,
"And give to God each moment as it flies."
Lord! in my views let both united be:
I live in pleasure when I live to thee.

DODDRIDGE.

A MORNING IN JUNE.

BY W. AND M HOWITT.

The morning bursts—all heaven has shed
Its light and music round thy bed:
The birds are busy in the eaves;
The sunlight dances on the leaves
That tremble round the window's rim;
And to and fro the shadows skim
Of busy wings without, that ply
In quest of lava, worm, or fly.
Throw now the sunny casement wide,
In flows the warm and odorous tide
From dew-besprinkled shrub and flower,
That blossom round that sylvan bower.

But, oh! thou world of light and glee!
What soul can ever picture thee?
As strays the fond enthusiast eye
Round the green earth and flaming sky,
From every meadow, bush, and tree,
Rings morning's loudest melody.
Hark to the cuckoo's wand'ring notes!
Hark to the lark, whose music floats
Through the wide air!

The dew yet lingers on the grass,
As down the long green lane you pass,
Where, o'er the hawthorn's snowy wreaths,
The woodbine's honied perfume breathes;
And the wild rose's arching spray
Flaunts to the breeze above your way.
What palace proud—what city hall,
Can match these verdant boughs that fall,
Vaulting o'er banks of flowers, that glow
In hues of crimson, gold, and snow?
Where, 'midst the wild-briar's emerald leaves,
Her gauze-like nest the white-throat weaves.
What sense of joy hath ever stole,
From song, or harp, into thy soul,
Like this, from young birds all unseen,
Chirping amongst the foliage green?

CULTIVATION OF COCHINEAL.

The nopal is a plant consisting of little stem, but expanding itself into wide thick leaves, more or less prickly according to its different kinds: one or two of these leaves being set as one plant, at the distance of two or three feet square from each other, are inoculated with the cochineal, which, I scarcely need say, is an insect: it is the same as if you would take the blight off an apple or other common tree, and rub a small portion of it on another tree free from the contagion, when the consequence would be that the tree so inoculated would become covered with the blight: a small quantity of the insects in question is sufficient for each plant, which, in proportion as it increases its leaves, is sure to be covered with the costly parasite. When the plant is perfectly saturated, the cochineal is scraped off with great care. The plants are not very valuable for the first year, but, from questions I put to the steward about the produce, it appeared that they might be estimated as yielding, after the second year, from a dollar to a dollar and a half profit on each plant.—Thompson's Visit to Guatemala.

MAMMOTH CAVE.

In Warren County, Kentucky, is a cavern in limestone, which has been explored by gentlemen of science for the astonishing distance of ten miles, without finding the end.—Mag. of Nat. History.

MARYLAND (U. S.) SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

Learning and religion flourish in America, under the Divine blessing, through the pious, generous, and indefatigable zeal of the servants of Christ. When did Infidelity ever contemplate such a benefit for the poor, as the following resolution expresses?

At a late meeting of the Sunday School Union of the State of Maryland, it was unanimously resolved, that the said Union "undertake, in humble reliance upon the aid of Almighty God, in the space of two years, to institute, or cause or procure to be instituted, in every town, village, congregation, society, or section of the State of Maryland, where it is practicable, a Sabbath School or Schools, for the purpose of instructing the rising generation to read the sacred Scriptures."

The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has recently resolved to present any National School with books and tracts to the amount of Five Pounds, if books and tracts to the same amount be purchased by the School from its own funds. This is to encourage the formation of National School Lending Libraries throughout the kingdom.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

Sir Isaac Newton, universally acknowledged to be the ablest philosopher and mathematician that this or perhaps any other nation has produced, is also well known to have been a firm believer, and a serious Christian. His discoveries concerning the frame and system of the universe, were applied by him to demonstrate the being of a God, and to illustrate his power and wisdom in the creation.

Reading is to the mind what food is to the body, it nourishes, refreshes, and invigorates it. Be careful therefore that all mental food be of good quality. Let nothing be received into the mind, but that which will produce such effects. Let every thing be well digested, and laid up in the storehouse of the memory, to be applied by the judgment, as occasion may require.

TO OUR READERS.

Several Clergymen, Dissenting Ministers, and Members of Parliament, besides many Sunday School Teachers, have expressed their high approbation of the Christian's Penny Magazine. We return them our sincere thanks for their countenance and promised support; and beg to assure them, that arrangements have been made to render it more permanently useful and instructive, particularly to Families and Sabbath Schools.

The Christian's Penny Magazine may be delivered weekly in the Towns of the United Kingdom, by those Booksellers and Newsmen to whom Subscribers address their orders. Being unstamped, it cannot be transmitted by post as a Newspaper. But for the convenience of our country friends and others, who cannot obtain the publication weekly, it will be published every four weeks in parts, each including four numbers; excepting in June and December, in each of which a part will be published containing six numbers. No extra charge will be made for the wrapper: so that the whole annual expense of the Twelve parts will be 4*s*. 4*d*.

London: Printed and Published by C. WOOD AND SON,
Poppin's Court, Fleet Street, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

Communications (post paid) to be addressed to the Editor, at the Publishers'.

BRITISH SAILORS.

sailors, of whom it is computed there are h seamen is improving greatly, and not a few have become real Christians; intelligent, pious, ngenuity has contrived various plans for the nt benefit of sailors; among which, besides the and Military Bible Society," "Sailors' Magazines," "Ship Libraries," and Tracts of different kinds must not pass unnoticed. "A Mariner's Church," near the water, a "Floating Chapel," on the river Thames, and more recently by some zealous churchmen, an "Episcopal Church," have been fitted up for divine worship, by which means we believe great good has been done among seamen and watermen, and many officers have declared that their pious men are the best sailors.

Numerous anecdotes might be given of the beneficial effects of religious instruction among both sailors and soldiers, but the following will perhaps be most interesting to our young readers.

The Young Praying Sailor.—"Some time ago, in a dreadful gale of wind, in which a vessel called the Betsey was lost, and all hands perished except the master and carpenter, there was one of the ships whose master was often at the prayer-meetings, and his vessel was always open for these exercises. The gale was so severe, and the ship was so much injured by it, that she became almost a wreck, and quite ungovernable; the master gave up all for lost, as every human effort seemed in vain, and nothing but a watery grave awaited them. There were two little boys in this vessel, one cried very much, and said he should be drowned; the other said, 'Don't cry, Jack; I am not afraid,—it is now eight o'clock, and they are praying for us on board some ships in the Thames; you know they always pray for us when we are at sea.' The captain heard the remark; it seemed to invigorate him; he and all hands used every exertion; and it pleased God to abate the severity of the gale, and in thirty-eight hours afterwards they were safely moored in the river, when they hoisted the signal flag for prayer, and had a meeting for praise and thanksgiving for their great deliverance. A friend who was on board at the time, and spoke to the lads, said to the one who made the above remark, 'Was it you, Dick, that cried during the gale, and was afraid of being drowned?' 'No, it was Jack: I was not afraid. Don't you always pray for our ship in London?' 'Yes, and didn't you pray?' 'Yes, I did.' 'And what did you say, my lad?' 'I said, O Lord, save my master! O Lord, save the ship! Let Daniel's God save the ship!' 'I trust you always pray.' 'Yes, ever since the prayer-meeting was held on board our ship; I never get into my hammock without first praying; but Jack won't, although I tell him he ought.'"

NOAH'S ARK.—GEN. VII.

THE prodigious magnitude of which Noah's Ark must have been constructed, has occasioned serious speculation and ingenious calculations. Infidels, as was natural to expect from them, have zealously laboured to discredit the account which has been given of it by Moses: but their attempts have only manifested their enmity and folly; while they have been the means of calling forth the talents of pious mathematicians, who have demonstrated the groundless nature of all their objections.

The materials of which the ark was made are mentioned by Moses. Noah was instructed to build it of gopher wood; and to "pitch it within and without with pitch." The timber is believed to have been of the cedar, or of the cypress tree: very strong, light, and durable wood, not easily subject to rottenness, or to decay through worms. The cypress abounded in Assyria, where the ark is supposed to have been made; and it was frequently used for ship-building, especially by Alexander the Great, by whom a fleet was built from the groves of cypress growing near to Babylon. The pitch was a kind of bitumen, a natural fat clay, found in abundance in the same country, and it is impenetrable by the worm or by water.

The dimensions and capacity of Noah's ark have been regarded by prejudiced unbelievers as a reason for their rejection of the writings of Moses. But a little calculation and reflection will show that the objection is founded in error. The form of the ark was an oblong square, with a flat bottom and a sloping roof, not suited for a distant voyage, but admirably adapted to float steadily upon the water. It was so contrived as to admit light and air on all sides, which is intimated by the general term window. It seems to have had another covering besides the roof, probably made of skins; which being thrown over, would hang before the window, to prevent the entrance of the rain. This Noah could easily remove, when he looked out and saw that the earth was dry.

The dimensions of the ark, as given by Moses, were 300 cubits in length, 50 cubits in breadth, and 30 cubits in height. Some learned men, who take the lowest computation, reckon the cubit at about 18 inches, by which the ark was 450 feet long, 75 feet wide, and 45 feet high; or nearly as long as St. Paul's cathedral in London, and about half the size of that immense building. By this measurement, Dr. Hale shows, that "it would be of 42,413 tons burthen; and as a first rate man-of-war is about 2,300 tons burthen, it would hold as much as eighteen of the largest ships now in use; and might carry 20,000 men with provisions for six months, besides the weight of 1,800 cannons, and all requisite military stores. Can any one, therefore, doubt of its being sufficient to contain eight persons, and about two hundred, or two hundred and fifty pairs of four-footed animals, a number to which, according to Buffon, all the various distinct species may be reduced? The fowls are to be added, and such insects and reptiles as cannot live in water, with provisions for twelve months."

But the Hebrew cubit is generally allowed to have been equal to nearly 22 inches, which would show the length of the ark about 550 English feet, its breadth 91 feet, and its height 55 feet. Upon this scale Dr. Arbuthnot has computed the ark to have been 81,062 tons burthen; and as the largest East India merchant ships are reckoned at about 1,300 tons burthen, the ark of Noah must have had capacity equal to more than sixty of those surprising vessels.

The ark contained, besides the eight persons of Noah's family, one pair of each species of unclean animals, and seven pairs of each species of clean animals, with provisions for them all during a year. Moses describes the ark as divided into three stories, each of ten cubits, or about eighteen feet high; and it is allowed, as most probable, that the lowest story was for the beasts, the middle for the food, and the upper for the birds with Noah and his family; each story being divided into different apartments or "rooms." Josephus, the Jewish historian, reckons, with much reason, another under story, or convenient place, to receive the filth of the whole living creatures in the ark.

The learned and ingenious Bishop Wilkins computes all the carnivorous animals equivalent, as to the bulk of their bodies, and their requirement of food, to 27 wolves, and all the rest to 280 oxen. For the former he allows 1,825 sheep; and for the latter 109,300 cubits of hay, all of which might be contained in two of the stories, and much room to spare. As to the third story, no one can doubt that it would be sufficient for the fowls, with Noah and his family. Upon the whole, the Bishop remarks, that of the two, it appears much more difficult to assign a number and bulk of necessary things to answer the capacity of the ark, than to find sufficient room for the several species of animals already known. This he attributes to the imperfection of our list of animals, especially of those of the unknown regions of the earth; and he adds, that the most expert mathematicians of this day could not assign the proportions of a vessel better accommodated to the purpose than is here done. Hence he concludes, that the capacity of the ark, which has been made an objection against Scripture, ought to be esteemed a confirmation of its divine authority; since, in those ruder ages, men, being less versed in arts and philosophy, were more obnoxious to vulgar prejudices than at the present time: so that, had it been a human invention, it would have been contrived, according to those notions, and from a confused and general view of things, as much too large, as it has been represented by inconsiderate persons as too small. Beside the places requisite for the beasts and birds, and their provisions, there was room, therefore, sufficient for Noah's utensils, instruments of husbandry, and seeds for the ground after the Deluge: for which purposes he might spare room in the third story for thirty-six cabins; besides a kitchen, a hall, four chambers, and a space of forty-eight cubits in length for the convenience of exercise in walking.

We may observe further, a vast multitude of persons must have been employed in building the ark under the direction of Noah, and also in furnishing its provisions; and few of them, it is probable, gave heed to the preacher's ministrations. How truly affecting the consideration, that great numbers of the workmen were disobedient to the prophet's doctrine, and unbelievers in the mission of Noah; and who, consequently, were excluded the ark and perished in their sins! But such has been the case in all ages of the church of God. Many, who have been instruments in building it up, have sacrificed all portion in its saving blessings, by their secret infidelity of heart, and their evident unholiness of life. Matt. vii, 22, 23.

STATISTICS OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

The empire of Great Britain far surpasses every other in the world. It is sometimes said that "The sun never sets on the British dominions." Extravagant as this expression may appear to some persons, it will probably be admitted as correct, when it is considered that the subjects of the crown of Great Britain are more than 150,000,000, more than a sixth portion of the human family; dwelling, not only in Europe, but in Asia, Africa, America, and Australasia.

The United British Empire consists of the two large islands of Great Britain and Ireland, with other smaller islands in their vicinities; of extensive colonies in North and South America, in the West Indies, in Africa, and the East Indies; of New Holland, the largest island in the world, Van Dieman's Land, and other islands in the vast Pacific Ocean; and of the fortresses of Gibraltar and Malta in the Mediterranean.

By means of its powerful and unequalled navy, the British government is enabled to extend its authority over all seas; and in the language of poets, Britannia is justly called, "The Mistress of the Ocean," and "Queen of the Isles." Its territories, and the population depending upon the British government, equal or exceed any of the four great monarchies of antiquity.

Great Britain itself is an island, including the three distinct divisions and ancient kingdoms of England, Wales, and Scotland, now united under one government: it is about 550 miles long, and from 120 to 300 miles broad. Great Britain contains 65,000,000 of acres of land; of which there are 42,000,000 in England, 5,000,000 in Wales, and 18,000,000 in Scotland: but of these nearly 20,000,000 are still uncultivated.

Ireland in its greatest length is about 200 miles, and in its greatest breadth about 200; containing nearly 20,000,000 of acres, two-thirds of which are in cultivation. The population of both islands, according to the returns of 1831, is for

England	13,089,336
Wales	805,336
Scotland	2,365,807
Ireland	7,734,365
Army and Navy	277,017
	24,271,861

Great Britain enjoys a temperate climate, and is covered with perpetual verdure: its soil amply rewards the toil of the husbandman, yielding abundance of grain, fruit, vegetables, wool, cheese, butter, and all other necessaries of life; neither is the science of agriculture better understood in any country, nor practised with such diligence and success. Though it has no Alpine mountains, like Switzerland and Italy, its scenery is diversified, romantic, and beautiful, and in Wales and Scotland mountainous and grand.

"——— A fairer isle than Britain, never sun
View'd in his wide career: a lovely spot
For all that life can ask; salubrious, mild.
Its hills are green, its woods and prospects fair;
Its meadows fertile; and, to crown the whole
In one delightful word, it is our home,
Our native isle, where pure religion dwells."

The United Empire possesses peculiar sources of transcendent wealth, in her inexhaustible mines of iron, copper, tin, lead, and coals; in her extensive manufacture of woollens, cottons, linen, cutlery, hardware, jewellery, &c.; and in her unexampled commerce, which is five times greater than that of any other nation, ancient or modern.

The present population of the British islands, is composed of descendants of the ancient Britons or Welch, the Irish, the Picts, the Romans, the Saxons, the Danes, the Normans, and those of various nations, who through a series of ages have settled in these islands, as a secure asylum. Britain is further distinguished by its language above any other nation, as it contains the beauties of all those which have been esteemed as the most learned or polished. It is derived from the Welch, the Latin, the French, the German, the Italian, and the Greek; so that the English language is the most copious of any now spoken by mankind, and adapted to every species of literary composition, scientific, poetical, or theological.

Besides all these advantages essential to national greatness is public liberty: this arises preeminently from just views of religion, and liberty has increased with the advancement of scriptural knowledge. While, therefore, rational liberty secures to individuals the rights of property, it confers independence on the industrious. The representatives of the people in the Commons' House of Parliament, have the power of refusing money supplies to the government; and juries protect their fellow subjects from vexatious accusations, and illegal punishments: these two are the great supports of civil liberty. As long, therefore, as the House of Commons and juries are independent, and do their duty, under the blessing of Almighty God, the English must remain a free and a prosperous people.

The wealth of the United Kingdom of Great Britain is prodigious, corresponding with the favoured circumstances of its industrious inhabitants.

Private property is estimated at	£.2,570,000,000
Public property	100,000,000
Colonial property	140,000,000
	2,810,000,000
Mortgaged for repayment of the national debt, about	810,000,000
Balance	£.2,000,000,000

From this brief view of the distinguished eminence of the British Empire, we learn several most important and interesting lessons.

First, That the four seasons of the year are experienced on the same day in the various parts of the British dominions.

Secondly, That the territory of the whole British empire equals in square miles the greatest empires of antiquity.

Thirdly, That in consequence of the universal diffusion of the British empire, all the natural productions of the earth, and all the industrious ingenuity of the whole human race, contribute to the wealth, luxury, and gratification of the inhabitants of Britain.

Fourthly, That Great Britain possesses the means of increasing or diminishing the prosperity and happiness of all nations; and that the whole human race depend in a great degree upon British wisdom, benevolence, and activity.

Fifthly, That the greatness and importance of the English nation arise from the influence of public liberty, independent representatives in the parliament, and trial by honest juries.

Sixthly, That the ascendancy of Great Britain in a great degree arises from the intelligence of her people, and that this is chiefly produced by the liberty of the press, which, though in many instances highly pernicious through abuse, is yet an inestimable blessing.

Seventhly, That the intelligence, liberty, industry, wealth, and national influence of Great Britain, arise directly or remotely from the possession of the Divine Revelation in the Holy Scriptures. These, while they make provision for mankind, as fallen guilty creatures, proclaiming forgiveness, a future life, and the resurrection to eternal glory through an Almighty Saviour, authoritatively teach and enforce the obligation of every personal and social duty, enjoin the cultivation of universal knowledge (much of which itself supplies), and the pursuit of liberty as essentials of religion; and requires the most enlarged benevolence to all the family of man, irrespective of clime or kindred.

ON CHRISTIAN UNION.

The following, which we extract from Flavel, will be found as suitable for the present times as for those in which that eminent servant of God lived:—

"God hath distributed variety of gifts and graces in different degrees amongst His people. The improvement of these gifts and graces to the glory of God, and our mutual edification, is the very scope and end of communion. Every man hath his proper gift of God, and the gifts and graces of all are this way made useful and beneficial. Job was exemplary for plainness and patience: Moses for faithfulness and meekness: Josiah for tenderness, and a melting spirit. Athanasius was prudent and active: Basil heavenly and of a sweet spirit: Chrysostom laborious, and without affectation: Ambrose resolved and grave. One hath quickness of parts, but not so solid a judgment: another is solid, but not ready and quick. One hath a good wit; another a better memory; a third excels them both in utterance. One is zealous, but ungrounded; another well principled, but timorous. One is wary and prudent; another open and plain-hearted. One is trembling and melting; another cheerful and full of comfort. Now the end and use of church-fellowship is to make a rich improvement unto all by a regular use and exercise of the gifts and graces found in every one. One must impart his light, and another his warmth. The eye (viz. the knowing man) cannot say to the hand (viz. the active man) I have no need of thee. Unspeakable are the benefits resulting from spiritual and orderly communion; but whatever the benefits be, they are all cut off by schisms and dissensions; for as faith is the grace by which we receive all from God, so love is the grace by which we share and divide the comfort of all among ourselves. The excellent things of the Spirit are lodged in earthen vessels, which death will shortly break, and then we have no more benefit by them; but these jars and divisions render saints, as it were, dead one to another whilst they are alive. Ah! how lovely, how sweet and desirable it is to live in the communion of such saints as are described, Mal. iii, 16. To hear them freely and humbly open their hearts and experiences to one another! After this manner, some say, the art of medicine was found out. As any one met with an herb, and discovered the virtue of it by any accident, he was to post it up; and so the physician's skill was perfected by a collection of those posted experiments. But, woe to us! we are ready to post up each other's failings and infirmities, to the shame and reproach of religion; and to furnish our common enemies with matter of contempt and scorn against us all."

INFLUENCE OF THE GOSPEL.

A slave in one of the islands of the West Indies, who had originally come from Africa, having been brought under the influence of religious instruction, became singularly valuable to his owner, on account of his integrity and general good conduct. So much so, that his master raised him to a situation of some consequence in the management of his estate. His owner, on one occasion, wishing to purchase twenty additional slaves, employed him to make the selection, giving him instructions to choose those who were strong and likely to make good workmen. The man went to the slave market, and commenced his scrutiny. He had not long surveyed the multitude offered for sale, before he fixed his eye intently upon one old and decrepid slave, and told his master that he must be one. The master appeared greatly surprised at his choice, and remonstrated against it. The poor fellow begged that he might be indulged; when the dealer remarked, that if they were about to buy twenty, he would give them the old man into the bargain. The purchase was accordingly made, and the slaves were conducted to the plantation of their new master: but upon none did the selector bestow half the attention and care he did upon the poor old decrepid African. He took him to his own habitation, and laid him upon his own bed, he fed him at his own table, and gave him drink out of his own cup; when he was cold, he carried him into the sunshine; and when he was hot, he placed him under the shade of the cocoa nut trees. Astonished at the attention this confidential slave bestowed upon a fellow-slave, his master interrogated him upon the subject. He said, "You could not take so intense an interest in the old man, but for some special reason: he is a relation of yours, perhaps your father?" "No, Massa," answered the poor fellow, "he no my fader!" "He is then an elder brother?" "No, Massa, he no my broder!" "Then he is an uncle, or some other relation?" "No, Massa, he no be of my kindred at all, nor even my friend!" "Then," asked the master, "on what account does he excite your interest?" "He my enemy, Massa," replied the slave; "he sold me to the slave-dealer; and my Bible tell me, when my enemy hunger, feed him; and when he thirst, give him drink."—Missionary Intelligence.

THE PASS OF UPSALLATA (S. AMERICA).

"It is impossible to convey an adequate idea of the solitary grandeur of those immeasurable ridges, whose peaky summits seem to pierce the firmament. The wearisome, and almost never-ending, ascents and descents along the course of rumbling torrents, so far beneath as to be, though within hearing, not always within sight, impart a character of loneliness not common to mountain barriers, when enlivened by a few scattered human habitations. In the Cordillera it is a pleasure to meet even the stag-like gaze of the guanaco, and equally a relief to look at the condor, as, with unfluttering wing, it floats almost movelessly above, bearing the same relative proportion to the eagle of Europe that his native Andes do to the Alps. The snow in some of the highest table-lands is difficult to pass, because it dissolves in such a manner as to leave an irregular surface, like fields of sugar-loaves of different sizes. Mules frequently sink to the girth, and surmount these obstructions with great toil. The strange noises made by gusts of wind in the reverberating valleys sound to the ear of the timorous guide like moans; and he does not fail to recount long stories of travellers that have perished, and whose souls he supposes still haunt the vicinity of their unburied remains." —Memoirs of General Miller.

THE PIGEON OF THE EAST.

The bird let loose in eastern skies,
When hast'ning fondly home,
Ne'er stoops to earth her wing, or flies
Where idler wanderers roam;

But high she shoots through air and light,
Above all low delay,
Where nothing earthly bounds her flight,
Or shadow dims her way.

So grant me, God, from every stain
Of sinful passion free,
Aloft, through virtue's purer air,
To steer my course to thee!

No sin to cloud, no lure to stay
My soul, as home she springs:
Thy sunshine on her joyful way,
Thy freedom on her wings.

FLOWERS AND FRUITS.

Flowers and Fruits in all their luxuriant loveliness cover the whole face of nature at this welcome season. Britain's varying climate is not indeed the most favourable to the perfection of flowers: but admirers of these loveliest ornaments of creation have no need to seek the emperor of Persia's celebrated garden at Negauristan, to enjoy their enchanting beauty and delightful fragrance. Our own gardens present them to us in the hardy snowdrop, the timid crocus, the smiling primrose, the modest violet, the splendid auricula, the gaudy tulip, the fair anemone, the gay carnation, the bold ranunculus, the delicate lily, and the brilliant rose, in > " Infinite numbers, delicacies, smells,

> With hues on hues beyond expression, paint
> The breath of Nature, and her endless bloom."

Sir Robert Ker Porter represents the rose especially as the glory of Negauristan, which abounds with the most beautiful trees. He speaks of two plants full fourteen feet high, laden with thousands of flowers, in every degree of expansion, and of a bloom and delicacy of scent, that imbued the whole atmosphere with the most exquisite perfume. Probably ours are neither so fragrant nor so beautiful; but we have seen in the royal gardens at Kew, more than a hundred varieties of the rose, perhaps little less lovely than those of Persia.

An elegant writer observes, " The kitchen garden presents us with a new train of benefits. In its blooming ornaments, what unaffected beauty! in its culinary productions, what diversified riches! It ripens a multitude of nutrimental esculents, and almost an equal abundance of medicinal herbs; distributing refreshments to the healthy, and administering remedies to the sick. The orchard, all fair and ruddy, and bowing down beneath its own delicious burthen, gives us a fresh demonstration of the Creator's kindness; regales us, first, with all the delicacies of summer fruits, next, with the more lasting succession of autumnal dainties.

" What is nature but a series of wonders, and a fund of delights! That such a variety of fruits, so beautifully coloured, so elegantly shaped, and so charmingly flavoured, should arise from the earth! than which nothing is more insipid, sordid, and despicable. I am struck with pleasing astonishment at the cause of these fine effects, and no less surprised at the manner of bringing them into existence. I take a walk in my garden, or a turn through the orchard, in the month of December. There stand several logs of wood fastened to the ground. They are erect indeed, and shapely, but without either sense or motion. No human hand will touch them, no human aid will succour them: yet, in a little time, they are beautified with blossoms, they are covered with leaves, and at last are loaded with mellow treasures, with the downy peach and the polished plum; with the musky apricot and the juicy pear; with the cherry and its coral pendants, glowing through lattices of green;

> Beneath her ample leaf, the luscious fig.'

" I have wondered at the structure of my watch; wondered more at the description of the silk mills; most of all at the account of those prodigious engines invented by Archimedes. But what are all the inventions of all the geometricians and mechanics in the world, compared with these inconceivably nice automata of nature! These self-operating machines dispatch their business with a punctuality that never mistakes, with a dexterity that cannot be equalled. In spring, they clothe themselves with such unstudied, but exquisite finery, as far exceeds the embroidery of the needle, or the labours of the loom. In autumn, they present us with such a collation of sweetmeats, and such blandishments of taste, as surpass all that the most critical luxury could prepare, or the most lavish fancy imagine. So that those coarse and senseless logs first decorate the divine creation, then perform the honours of the table."

Pope has represented Pride as saying,

> " For me kind Nature wakes her genial pow'r,
> Suckles each herb, and spreads out every flow'r,
> Annual for me, the grape, the rose renew
> The juice nectareous, and the balmy dew."

But piety may adopt the same language. The Christian philosopher, and every, even the youthful, admirer of the operations of nature, should reverence nature's God, and say with Thomson—

> " HAIL, SOURCE OF BEING! UNIVERSAL SOUL
> Of heaven and earth! ESSENTIAL PRESENCE, hail!
> To THEE I bend the knee, to THEE my thoughts
> Continual climb; who, with a master-hand,
> Hast the great whole into perfection touch'd.
> By THEE the various vegetable tribes,
> Wrapt in a filmy net, and clad with leaves,
> Draw living ether, and imbibe the dew:
> By THEE disposed into congenial soils
> Stands each attractive plant, and sucks, and swells
> The juicy tide, a twining mass of tubes!
> At THY command the vernal sun awakes
> The torpid sap, detruded to the root
> By wintry winds, that now in fluent dance
> And lively fermentation mounting, spread
> All this innumerous-colour'd scene of things!"

PROPORTION OF BRITISH EXPENDITURE FOR RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS.

Our population exceeds twenty-four millions. The rental of our landed property is rated at sixty millions a year; the interest of our funded debt is thirty millions; and to these the untold profits of professional pursuits, merchandize, traffic, and labour, must be added, to show the total income of the inhabitants of this country. Our taxes on luxuries may also, in some measure, illustrate our means of voluntary expenditure, remembering that these taxes are but a limited proportion of the real sum which we pay for luxuries taxed. In 1830, the amount of the customs in the British isles on foreign articles imported, was twenty-one millions; the amount of the duties on British and foreign spirits, was upwards of eight millions; the taxes on carriages and horses for riding, raised above 700,000*l*.

Contrast, then, exertions in missions by Protestants of every land, with the manifested resources of this country. Our national rental and funded interest, the more independent part of our national annual income, exclusive of the profits of professions, merchandize, traffic, and labour, averages about seventy-five shillings a year for each individual of our twenty-four millions of inhabitants. The aggregate sum given to all the religious institutions put together, averaged but sixpence a year for each individual inhabitant of our country. The bare taxes on luxuries, or injurious indulgences, make us blush for our country, by showing us how totally disproportionate is our whole expenditure for missionary objects. The mere customs are thirty-five times as much; the bare duties on British and foreign spirits are thirteen times as much as all Protestant Christians give to religious societies. The taxes on our carriages and riding horses exceed the whole annual income of all religious societies of Protestant nations! May we each gather a practical lesson—to give more to the cause of Christ than we do to vain pleasure; and not to be among those who are lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God.—Rev. E. Bickersteth.

COLONIZATION OF AMERICA.

EMIGRATION to America is talked of all over the nation, and thousands, annually, are seeking their fortunes in that amazing country. We conceive that a short notice of its first colonization will be acceptable to our Readers, as we are aware that many are extremely ignorant of its history. We shall give it in the language of an interesting new publication, "Church History through all Ages," by T. Timpson.

"America, in every point of view, cannot fail to be most interesting to the Christian. Though a 'new world,' the church of God has flourished in it in a degree far greater than in any country upon earth.

"The southern continent of America was colonized by Spain and Portugal during the sixteenth century: but the original population was mostly destroyed by the brutal oppressions of the colonists, aided by the terrible operations of the popish Inquisition. The forms of religion were retained by the Spanish and Portuguese settlers; but learning and scriptural knowledge had scarcely any existence; and the fine countries of that extensive region are still overspread with ignorance, superstition, and misery, under a jealous popish priesthood. Popery, in all its characteristic forms, holds the wretched inhabitants in mental and moral darkness; though various efforts have been made to promote education among the people, and to circulate the word of God.

"The northern continent was discovered in the commencement of the seventeenth century, and called North Virginia: but no European settled there till 1608. At this period, the persecutions which the Puritans endured, drove multitudes of them to the Continent, particularly to Holland. Among these were the celebrated Henry Ainsworth, famous for his Hebrew learning, John Canne, author of the marginal references to the Bible, and John Robinson. They were Independents in their views of church order; and a considerable church of that form existed and flourished among the English exiles. In a foreign country they were perplexed with many inconveniences, among a people of different language and manners. It was resolved, therefore, after prayer-meetings for Divine direction, that the younger part of Mr. Robinson's congregation should remove to America, under the crown of England; that so they might enjoy the liberty and purity of religion, and be capable of encouraging their persecuted friends and countrymen.

"They obtained from the government of England a patent for a settlement, and observed a day of fasting and prayer; when the venerable Mr. Robinson addressed to them an affectionate exhortation. He, with his elders, accompanied them to the port, where they spent the night in prayer, and, to the number of one hundred and twenty, with their minister Mr. Brewster, they embarked for America, July 2, 1620. They landed at Cape Cod, and called their settlement New Plymouth. Hardships of the most distressing kind they were necessitated to suffer during the first winter, by which their number was reduced to about sixty sickly persons: but as the spring returned, they recovered; and receiving supplies from their friends in England, they thus laid the foundation of 'New England,' the noblest settlement of America, a secure asylum for the oppressed servants of Christ.

"Feeble as was this colony at first, it rapidly increased, by the successive emigrations of the oppressed Puritans. For Charles I, pursuing the same course of policy as his bigoted father had done, employed some of the most worthless of men as his ministers; at the head of whom was the unprincipled Villiers, duke of Buckingham, with Archbishop Laud. Lord Clarendon declares, that the Attorney General Noy, and all the judges, were a scandal to their profession. The king's proclamations were established for laws, and the Council Table, the Star Chamber, and the High Commission Court, carried on the chief business of the nation, instead of the legal courts. By such means, some of the Puritan ministers were silenced and deprived every week, and their families reduced to distress; and as there appeared no prospect of relief, but rather the approach of a violent storm, they projected a further settlement in New England. Several of the Puritan nobles, disgusted with the unlawful and oppressive proceedings of the court, engaged in this design, and obtained a charter, May 4, 1628-9, constituting a body corporate and politic, by the name of Massachusett's Bay.

"The new planters being all Puritans, engaged Mr. Higgison and Mr. Skelton, two silenced ministers, to be their chaplains, who, with several of their friends, united to strengthen the colony. The little fleet that went upon this expedition consisted of six sail of transports, of from four to twenty guns, with about three hundred and fifty passengers, men, women, and children. They carried with them one hundred and fifteen head of cattle, as horses, mares, cows, &c., and forty-one goats; six pieces of cannon for a fort, with muskets, pikes, drums, colours, and a large quantity of ammunition and provision. They arrived in New England, June 24, 1629, and called their new settlement Salem, the Hebrew word signifying Peace.

"As the chief motive for their retreating to those foreign wilds, was to enjoy the privileges of pure religion, their earliest attentions were paid to its sacred ordinances: accordingly, the 6th of August was appointed as a day of fasting and prayer, and a church was formed under Mr. Higgison, each one making a public profession of faith in Jesus Christ, and declaring their determination to walk through life according to his gospel, agreeably to a covenant drawn up by their pastor.

"The persecutions under Laud continuing in England, the colony was recruited next year, by the arrival of two hundred persons, ministers, gentlemen, and others, thus driven out from their native homes. On leaving their country, they published an address, requesting the prayers of their brethren and friends, and promising, 'so far as God shall enable us, to give him no rest on your behalf, wishing our heads and hearts may be fountains of tears for your everlasting welfare, when we shall be in our poor cottages in the wilderness.'

"By such various accessions, the New England colonies were greatly augmented, both in numbers and wealth, as well as piety: for when it appeared that the planters could subsist in their new settlements, great numbers of their friends, with their families, flocked after them every summer.

"Remarkably singular was the circumstance mentioned, of Oliver Cromwell being prevented by Charles I from retiring to America. In 1638, there were eight sail of ships at one time in the river Thames, bound for New England, and filled with Puritan families, among whom were Oliver Cromwell, afterwards the lord protector of the Commonwealth of England, the famous John Hampden, and Arthur Haselrigge; who, seeing no termination to the oppressions of their native country, determined to spend their days in America: but the council being informed of their design, issued an order, dated May 1, 1638, to detain those ships, and to bring their provisions on shore. And to prevent the like for the future, his majesty prohibited all masters and owners of ships to set forth any vessels for New England with passengers, without special license from the privy council: this remarkable reason is assigned for the order, 'Because the people of New England are factious and unworthy of any support from hence, in regard of the great disorders and want of government among them, whereby many that have been well affected to the church of England have been prejudiced in their estates by them.' The truth of the case was, crowds were hastening their escape from prelatical tyranny, to the manifest loss of the country, and New England was too far from the reach of the Star Chamber.

"During the twelve years of Laud's administration, there went over from England about four thousand Dissenters, to settle as planters, and laid the foundation of several towns and villages, having carried with them, in materials, money, and cattle, an amount of property equal to about £200,000, besides the merchandize intended for traffic with the Indians. It has been computed, that from the commencement of the colony in 1620, to the year 1640, no less than twenty-one thousand two hundred British subjects settled in the four provinces of New England, viz. New Hampshire, Massachusett's Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, and Connecticut, and they had drained England of four or five hundred thousand pounds, which was a vast sum in those days."

ON THE INSECTS WHICH ARE HURTFUL TO MANKIND.

An insect is generally regarded as the most insignificant of created beings, and the word is often used to express our sense of the worthlessness of the object to which it is applied. The Scriptures, however, give us a juster notion of the importance of these minute creatures by calling them God's "great armies," and by the terrible display of his wrath in using them as the ministers of his vengeance against the proud king of Egypt. The following particulars of some of the many species of insects which are hurtful to mankind (from Kirby and Spence's Introduction to Entomology) will we doubt not be acceptable to our Readers.

Many insects seem to attack the human body solely for the purpose of feeding on the blood. Some of these produce exquisite pain when they strike their tremendous apparatus of knives and lancets into our skin. The horse fly will take away as much as eight drops of blood, when it attacks the human subject. The sand fly of America, called the burning fly from the intense burning pain which its bite occasions, will make the blood run down the face in streams, although it is so small as to be hardly perceptible. The bite of the stomoxys calcitrans, a fly not unlike the common house fly, produces almost as much pain as the sand fly; and an anecdote is related of a gentleman being dreadfully teased by an insect for several nights, so that he could not sleep; when it was found that a swallow fly had strayed from its natural habitation, the nest and skin of the swallow, and made a lodgment between the sheets of his bed. None of these torments however are more terrible than the many species of gnats or musquitoes. The rostra or beaks of these insatiable blood-suckers consist of five lancets besides the sheath; some of the lancets being barbed for the purpose of fastening the instrument in the skin, so that it may act as a syphon, and draw away the luckless sufferer's blood. In hot climates these insects form so great a pest, that the hum of a musquito becomes more terrible than the roar of a lion. Dr. Clarke relates, that in the Crimea, the Russian soldiers are obliged to sleep in sacks, and still some of these occasionally die in consequence of mortification produced by the bites of musquitoes. In America, soldiers have been obliged to dig holes in the earth with their bayonets, and sleep with their heads inserted in those holes, and their hammocks tied round their necks.

Some insects sting only out of revenge. In these the piercing instrument, which is essentially of the same kind, is fixed in the animal's tail, and generally their stings are venomous. The Linnæan order Hymenoptera comprises the majority of these insects. Ichneumon flies will occasionally attack the human subject, and the powers of the bee, the wasp, and the hornet are well understood. Ants also sting in the same way, and some of them give exquisite pain. A black ant at Ceylon, called coddia, produces as much pain as a coal of fire; but it is said to be of a noble nature and never to sting unless irritated. Scorpions come next under consideration. Some of them are a foot long. Their sting consists of a simple incurved mucro, terminating in an ampullaceous joint. These animals are exceedingly cruel and ferocious. Other insects produce injury simply by biting. The scolopendra or centipedes are of this class. Dr. Lister mentions one scolopendra which is eighteen inches long. The bite of some of these large ones is said to be mortal. Spiders also use their very strong jaws for the same purpose. The tarantula, which is a spider, is famed throughout the civilized world. The bite of the tarantula however is not dangerous; but that of another Mediterranean spider is said to be mortal to man as well as to animals. This insect is as large as a hornet, and its web is so fine as to be almost invisible.

A third class of insects produces great annoyance in other ways. A very minute creature, the thrips physapus excites an intolerable sensation in sultry weather by merely creeping upon the skin. Several foreign insects produce still greater evils. The common house fly acquires this power of annoyance when it walks upon the skin at the close of the summer; but Mr. Arthur Young relates, that an annoying fly is so numerous in certain parts of France, that he could manure four or five acres every year with dead flies. The eye fly of the East Indies is a very minute insect, which torments persons by flying into their eyes. It is well known that the hairs of the cowhage produce very great irritation on the skin: in the same way, the stiff hairs of certain caterpillars are very tormenting. Ladies standing near the nests of these insects have had numerous tumours produced on their necks, occasioned by short hairs, brought by the wind. Probably these hairs are barbed, and thus make their way into the skin; as is the case with certain seed vessels, those of the travelling oat for instance, which thus creep along the ground, or with the fur used by hatters, which is consolidated, so as to form felt, by favouring the operation of this barbed nature of the fur.

The juices of spiders are often very irritating to the skin; whilst in South America, if a fiery red acarus called coya or coyba be crushed on the skin, its fluids produce large tumours, which are often followed by death.

It is still necessary to mention that some insects actually live in the human stomach. The meal worm, a species of beetle, has been voided both by male and female patients. Maggots have often been discharged from the nostrils in certain patients; and a case occurred at Ashbornby in Lincolnshire, where a pauper was found in the middle of June, literally devoured by maggots before his death. He had concealed meat about his person, which became putrid and full of maggots; and these maggots by proceeding to attack the living substance caused the man's death.

AN INSCRIPTION FOR MY DAUGHTERS' HOUR GLASS.

Mark the golden grains that pass
Brightly through this channelled glass,
Measuring by their ceaseless fall
Heaven's most precious gift to all!
Busy, till its sand be done,
See the shining current run;
But, th' allotted numbers shed,
Another hour of life hath fled!
Its task performed, its travail past,
Like mortal man it rests at last!
Yet let some hand invert its frame,
And all its powers return the same;
Whilst any golden grains remain,
'Twill work its little hour again.
But who shall turn the glass for man,
When all his golden grains have ran?
Who shall collect his scatter'd sand,
Dispers'd by Time's unsparing hand?
Never can one grain be found,
Howe'er we anxious search around!

Then, daughters, since this truth is plain,
That time once GONE ne'er comes again,
Improv'd bid ev'ry moment pass—
See how the sand rolls down your glass!

M'CREERY.

TRACT OF COUNTRY COVERED WITH LAVA.

THIS tract is situated in Mexico, and the singular scene is thus described by Mr. Bullock. "The whole country for leagues was an entire mass of cinder, scoria, lava, and pumice, piled up in every form that can be conceived, and still remaining in the same state as when first left by some dreadful explosion of an unknown volcano: in some places huge pinnacles threatening to fall and crush the passing traveller; in others, the liquid lava seems to have burst like an immense bubble, leaving arches of solid crust, from sixty to eighty feet high, and three or four thick, all hollow underneath, and spread at the bottom with loose cinders. This valley is bounded on the left by a ridge or wall of immense height, as if the great flood of melted matter had been chilled and stopped in its course. In some parts, it seemed as if the lava and scoria had been in part decomposed, and in these, several species of aloes, yucca, dracinæ, and other strange and picturesque plants, were thriving luxuriantly. In other places thousands of trunks of huge trees, dead and crumbling into dust, added wildness to the scene of desolation. Still further on the left, the mountain of pines, of extraordinary size, and others covered with stunted oaks, served by contrast to exhibit the picture of this tremendous-looking and savage region with greater force. After travelling about four miles over this bed of eruptive matter, which was constantly varying in its features, we came suddenly upon a clayey and sandy soil, and soon after, to the Indian village of Los Vegos, built with planks and logs of wood, and covered with shingles, in the same manner as the mountain villages of Norway and the Alps."

DREADFUL ACCIDENT

Accompanied with curious phenomena at the Thorncliffe Iron-works near Barnsley, Yorkshire.

ON the 19th of July, 1820, during a tremendous thunder-storm, a number of workmen and boys belonging to the works, together with the acting partners and managers, altogether more than one hundred persons, were assembled at the casting house, as was customary when any thing particular was about to be cast, for the purpose of witnessing the casting of a tilt shaft, above five tons weight, in a perpendicular mould. When the casting was nearly complete, the liquid mass suddenly shot up like a cataract of molten lava from the orifice of a volcano, and, mingled with clouds of heated sand, fell in red-hot flakes on every side. Of the persons present twenty-two were burnt more or less severely, three perished on the spot, and six others died in a few days. The immediate cause of the catastrophe could not be satisfactorily ascertained: it did not arise from any failure in the cast-iron moulds, for these were found perfect after the accident; from moisture within the pit it seemed impossible, the mould having been comparatively filled with metal before the eruption took place. It was the opinion of the proprietors, that some communication took place between the electric fluid, with which the atmosphere was highly charged at the time, and the dense sulphureous vapour produced by the upright column of molten mineral in its matrix, whereby this explosion, resembling an earthquake in violence, noise, and fatality was occasioned. Happily occurrences of this sort are exceedingly rare; that at the place in question, formed the only instance of an accident having taken place, during twenty-five years.—Lardner's Cyclopædia.

THE BAPTIST ANNIVERSARIES.

WE have great pleasure in complying with the wishes of several of our friends, to mention the Anniversaries of the "Baptist Missionary Society," the "Baptist Home Missionary Society," the "Baptist Irish Society," and the "Baptist Continental Society," held in London this month. We most cordially rejoice in their successes, and delight to acknowledge the obligations under which the world has been laid by their devoted missionaries, Ward, Marshman, and Carey: the latter of whom has justly been pronounced "the most learned oriental scholar in the world."

DONATION OF FOUR HUNDRED POUNDS.

ONE morning (June 25, 1832), two gentlemen called at the office of the HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY, 11, Chatham Place, Blackfriars, and gave, without their names, the above noble sum, to promote the great objects of that truly patriotic and evangelical Institution.

TO OUR READERS.

WE have much pleasure in announcing to our Friends the increasing Sale of THE CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE. No effort shall be spared to render it worthy of a still more enlarged Patronage. The FIRST PART, consisting of Four Numbers, stitched in a Wrapper, price 4*d*, is now ready for delivery.

The CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE may be delivered weekly in the Towns of the United Kingdom, by those Booksellers and Newsmen to whom Subscribers address their orders. Being unstamped, it cannot be transmitted by post as a newspaper. CESSION OF THE DISTRICT OF MATAVAI, IN THE ISLAND OF OTAHEITE, TO CAPTAIN WILSON, FOR THE USE OF THE MISSIONARIES OF THE LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

n the right, seated on the ground, is Pytcea, the principal Chief of the district of Matavai; behind him stand Mr. and Mrs. Henry, d the Missionaries are behind them; Mr. Jefferson, the Secretary, stands behind Captain James Wilson, the principal person: tween him and his Nephew, Capt. W. Wilson, stands a Child of Mr. Hassel, and Mrs. Hassel with an infant is before them. ter the Swede acts as interpreter; by him stands Ideea the wife of Pomarre. Their son Otoo, who is carried on men's shoulders, th his Queen in a like situation, are the King and Queen of the country. Next Otoo stands Pomarre, uncovered before his own n, but still retaining the chief authority: behind him is the grandfather Happai. The High-priest Mannee Mannee, old and arly blind, is crouching in the attitude of address to Capt. Wilson, making a formal surrendor of the district. On his right hand the young wife of Pomarre. A rope was drawn round the place of audience to keep off the people. The Bread Fruit plant and coa Nut trees mark the most useful productions of the island.

THE LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

RISTIANITY is essentially missionary in its spirit, bracing in its benevolence the utmost longitude and itude of the habitable earth. Sincere and intelli- nt Christians, in every age, influenced by their sacred inciples, have regarded the Saviour's last command obligatory upon them: but it was not till the latter d of the last century, that evangelical Missions to e Heathen were determined upon, as they have since en carried on, upon a broad and extensive system.

This god-like spirit received a new impulse in 1795, en the "London Missionary Society" was formed: nsisting of several liberal-minded clergymen, and the incipal ministers of the Independent denomination, th several of the Scotch secession, and of the Calvinistic Methodists. At their first annual meeting in May, 1796, it was resolved, that, "to prevent, if possible, any cause of future dissension, it is declared to be a fundamental principle of the Missionary Society, that its design is not Presbyterianism, Independency, Episcopacy, or any other form of church order; but the glorious gospel of the blessed God to the heathen; leaving the converts to the Scriptures for church government." This Society originated in a great measure with Dr. E. Williams, an Independent minister of Birmingham, publishing an address to his brethren in the ministry, in the Evangelical Magazine, in 1794, which was established in that year. By this address, the servants of God were led to take measures for this institution. The Rev. Dr. Williams, Dr. Haweis, Dr. Bogue, Mr. Eyre, Mr. Rowland Hill, Mr. Matthew Wilks, were among its principal founders The South Sea Islands were chosen as the first field of operations. Captain Wilson offered himself to the Directors, to take charge of the voyage contemplated; the ship Duff was purchased; and thirty Missionaries, of whom six had wives and three children, embarked in the river Thames, August 10, 1796. They set sail from Portsmouth, September 23, and after a prosperous voyage, cast anchor in Matavai Bay, March 7, 1797. They were received by the natives of Otaheite (Tahiti) with every expression of delight; and having delivered their presents, and made known their intentions, by means of two resident Swedes who could speak English, Pomarre yielded to their wishes, and on the 16th of March, 1797, granted them the district of Matavai, in the presence of a grand assembly, as represented in our Engraving. Many years these devoted missionaries laboured with but little success; but at length, the Divine blessing descended, the whole population renounced idolatry, destroyed their idols, and embraced Christianity; many of them with sincere affection, "in spirit and in truth."

The work of God's grace continued to spread, and native teachers have been raised up as missionaries to other islands: but to give a detailed account of the instruction and civilization of these once barbarous islanders, the translation of the Scriptures, and other valuable books for their use, is impossible within our limits.

The African islands (but especially South Africa) have been marvellously blessed by means of the London Missionary Society; and the benefits of the British constitution have been extended to the enslaved Hottentots, and other natives of Africa, by the zealous exertions of Dr. Philip. The East Indies have many successful labourers of this Society; and an Anglo-Chinese college has been founded by Dr. Morrison, the late Dr. Milne, and their colleagues at Malacca, destined to be an incalculable blessing to the East. China has been blessed with a translation of the whole Bible into its difficult language, by Dr. Morrison; which, with his Grammar and Dictionary, has been considered the noblest work of any uninspired writer, or of any agent in the church of God since the days of the apostles. This translation of the Holy Scriptures opens the treasures of eternal life through Christ to nearly one-third of the human population in China, and the regions around. Various other translations of the Scriptures have been made by the missionaries of this Society, the particulars of which we cannot here detail. The stations of the Society are eighty; having ninety European missionaries, besides twenty-one printers, schoolmasters, and artisans, and many native ministers and teachers, amounting to about four hundred. The schools of the missionaries are numerous, containing about twenty thousand scholars.

The average expenditure of the London Missionary Society is about 40,000*l.* The receipts for the year ending April 1832, are stated at 40,113*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*, which is contributed in principally small sums; though we rejoice to hear that on Monday, June 25, a Donation was paid to the Treasurer of 400*l.* from some unknown friend.—Contributors of a penny per week and upwards are entitled to the interesting Missionary Sketches.

MISSIONARY MUSEUM.

Our young readers in London, and those who may visit the metropolis from the country, will find an hour's most delightful and instructive occupation any Wednesday at the Missionary Museum, Austin Friars, Old Broad Street, London. No charge is made for admission: but tickets must be obtained from some of the Directors, many of whom are Ministers both in London and the country. The "Museum" contains a great variety of curiosities from all parts of the globe; more particularly of the Idols, which have been delivered up to the Missionaries, after the conversion of the once deluded and brutal heathen to the knowledge and enjoyment of the gospel of Christ.

A SABBATH IN THE SOUTH SEAS.

Confirmation the most ample of the regeneration of Tahiti and other islands in the South Seas, has been furnished by officers of ships, both French and English. They have given the most unqualified testimony of the prevalence of piety among the inhabitants, and of the success of the missionaries in their benevolent labours. Perhaps nothing could better illustrate the vast improvement of these once savage and barbarous people, than the account given by the Rev. Daniel Tyerman and George Bennett, Esq., of their first Sabbath in Tahiti. These gentlemen were a deputation from the London Missionary Society, to visit their different stations in the several parts of the world. Their "Journal" has been dedicated to his Majesty William IV. In that most interesting work, these gentlemen say:—"At sunrise, we went to the chapel on the beach, near Mr. Nott's house,—a neat structure, having bamboo walls, thatched with palm leaves, furnished with benches made of bread-fruit-tree planks, and capable of holding about four hundred persons. It is now used only as a school and prayer-meeting house. On our arrival, we found the place filled with natives of both sexes and various ages. They were all kneeling, while one of them was offering up prayer in the most fervent and devout manner. Scarcely a head was lifted up when we entered, and stepped as softly as might be to a place near the person who was officiating at the time. When he had finished his address to the Deity, he gave out a hymn, which was sung with much animation by the people. He then read a portion of St. John's Gospel, many of those who were present producing their Testaments, and following his voice, with their eyes on the words of the book. Another prayer was then offered up, and the assembly departed in the most quiet and becoming order to their houses, after having continued together about an hour in this spontaneous service; for none but natives were present except ourselves—two strangers, who, coming into their meeting under such circumstances, though we understood not a word that was sung or said, yet were constrained, by evidence which we could not mistake, to confess that God was in the midst of them; and so, falling down, we felt that we could with them worship Him who is 'no respecter of persons, but who accepteth those in every nation, that fear him and work righteousness.'

"After breakfast, at nine o'clock, we accompanied Mr. Nott to public service, in the greater chapel over the river. This we found filled with a silent, decorous, and neatly-clothed congregation, of nearly six hundred persons: many of the females wore bonnets of the English shape, and other parts of European dress. Mr. Nott preached from the words, 'Sanctify them through thy truth,' John xvii, 17. And what indeed but truth—the truth of God—could have sanctified such a people as they were within this generation,—yea, less than seven years ago? The audience was exceedingly attentive, and appeared to join heartily in songs of praise, and silently to engage in prayer with the minister. We dined at Mr. Wilson's, whose house is hard by; from whence, learning that some native teachers would catechise the children, we returned to the chapel; and there witnessed a scene at once exhilarating and affecting. About sixty young persons were on their knees when we entered, while a chief of the district was praying with them. During the catechism which followed, the questions and answers were repeated to us in English, when we were gratified to observe that the former were well adapted, and the latter, for the most part, intelligent and satisfactory. At four o'clock there was public worship again. Mr. Wilson preached from Heb. ii, 3, 'How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation.'"

Two services also in English blessed this day: on which they observe:—"We closed this first Sabbath among these Christians of the Gentiles with edifying conversation, in company with Mr. Nott, and Mr. Wilson, our host. What we have witnessed and recorded now, we believe to be a fair exemplification of what occurs every Sabbath here, and at all the missionary stations in these parts. Oh that every friend of this cause, at home, could see the things that we have seen, and hear what we have heard, and feel what we have felt, this day, of the presence and power of God to heal, revive, yea, new create the souls which sin hath fatally wounded, and exposed to the second death! How would their zeal, their faith, their hope, their love be increased, and their labours, their prayers, and their sacrifices multiplied in proportion!"

FORMER INFANTICIDE AT TAHITI.

Voyagers have successfully testified the brutality of the South Sea islanders towards their wives, and of their custom of murdering their children. Some particulars from the "Journal" of the Deputation will not fail to be affectingly interesting to our readers. They observe:—"We conversed with Mr. Nott, who has resided here from the commencement of the mission, on the subject of INFANTICIDE, and learned, with horror, that it had been practised to an extent incredible except on such testimony and evidence as he and the brethren on other stations have had the means of accumulating. He assured us, that three-fourths of the children were wont to be murdered as soon as they were born, by one or other of their unnatural parents, or by some person employed for that purpose—wretches being found who might be called infant assassins by trade. He mentioned having met a woman, soon after the abolition of the diabolical practice, to whom he said, 'How many children have you?' 'This one in my arms,' was her answer. 'And how many did you kill?' She replied, 'EIGHT!' Another woman, to whom the same questions were put, confessed that she had destroyed SEVENTEEN! Nor were these solitary cases. Sin was so effectually doing its work in these dark places of the earth, that, full as they were of the habitations of cruelty and wickedness, war, profligacy, and murder were literally exterminating a people unworthy to live; and soon would the 'cities have been wasted without inhabitant, the houses without a man, and the land been utterly desolate.' But the Gospel stepped in, and the plague was stayed. Now the married, among this Christianized population, are exceedingly anxious to have offspring; and those who have them, nurse their infants with the tenderest affection."

ABOLITION OF INFANTICIDE IN OTHER ISLANDS.

Similar barbarities to those of Tahiti, characterized all the islands of the Pacific; and, by the power of the Gospel, the like transformations were produced as those which we have noticed. A few extracts from the "Journal," relating to Raiatea will confirm this:—

"Dec. 22. On this Sabbath, a hundred and fifty-one persons, of both sexes, and various ages, including parents and children, in families, were baptized by the missionaries, Williams and Threlkeld. The services on this occasion were very solemn; and a deep sense of the power of Christ rested upon the church here, while so goodly a company was added to its members. In the evening we took an affectionate leave of our Christian brethren and sisters gathered from among the heathen, as well as their excellent teachers, by whom we have been so hospitably entertained.

"Feb. 9. Having been detained here (Tahaa) by contrary winds during the past week, after we had taken leave previously to embarking for Borabora, we have had the privilege, this day, to witness the baptism of a hundred and ninety-eight candidates, of whom eighty-four were adults, and a hundred and fourteen children Of the latter, sixty-five were boys, and forty-nine girls; and of these, ten or twelve only appeared to be upwards of seven years old. It was an affecting consideration, as we looked upon the lovely and innocent countenances of these little ones, to reflect, that a large majority of them owed their lives to the Gospel. These ought indeed to be children of God; for previously two-thirds of the infants that came into existence were put out of it as soon as they breathed the atmosphere of a region under the dominion of the prince of the power of the air, who wrought in the hearts of the parents, without natural affection, to destroy their own flesh and blood."

SCENERY AND FERTILITY OF JUDEA.

Professor Millman, in his History of the Jews, speaking of that land "flowing with milk and honey," says, "no part of it was waste, very little was occupied by wood, the more fertile hills were cultivated in artificial terraces; others were hung with orchards of fruit trees; the more rocky and barren districts were covered with vineyards. Even in the present day, the wars and misgovernment of ages have not exhausted the natural richness of the soil." "Galilee," says a traveller, "would be a Paradise were it inhabited by an industrious people, under an enlightened government. The climate was healthy, the seasons regular; the former rains, which fell about October, after the vintage, prepared the ground for the seed; the latter rains, which prevailed during March and the beginning of April, made it grow rapidly. Directly the rains ceased, the grain ripened with still greater rapidity, and was gathered in before the end of May. The summer months were dry and very hot, but the nights cool and refreshed by copious dews. In September, the vintage was gathered. Grain of all kinds grew in great abundance—the wheat commonly yielded thirty for one. Besides the vine and the olive, the almond, the date, figs of many kinds, the orange, the pomegranate, and many other fruit trees, flourished in the greatest luxuriance. Great quantity of honey was collected. The balm-tree which produced the balsam, a great object of trade, flourished about Jericho and in Gilead—hence the passage, 'Is there no balm in Gilead?'"

THE WIND SAMIEL.

"A friend of mine, who had been bathing in the Tigris, not far from the ancient city Ctesiphon, and within five days' journey of Bagdad, having on a pair of Turkish drawers, one of these hot winds, called by the natives Samiel, passing rapidly across the river just as he had got out of the water, so effectually dried him in a moment, that not one particle of moisture was left, either on his body, or in his bathing dress!"—Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ADAM.

DIED A. M. 930. B. C. 3074 YEARS.

The Holy Scriptures, containing the Oracles of God, above all things demand, as they deserve our study. They were given by inspiration of God, written for our admonition, and mercifully designed to make us wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus. The manner in which they present to us the lessons of eternal wisdom, is not the least remarkable: it is not a tedious detail of uninstructive facts, or a dry systematic code of severe laws—but chiefly by exhibiting to us in the liveliest simplicity, the lives, principles, and practices of mankind, of every description of character.

As believers in Divine Revelation, and candidates for immortal blessedness, no study can be so profitable to us, as the recorded lives and actions of those holy men of God, who are commended to us as the "great cloud of witnesses" of the faithfulness of God, by whose faith we are encouraged, whose examples we are to follow, and with whom we hope to sit down and dwell for ever, in the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour.

Sect. I.—The Creation of Adam.

Adam was the first man that God made, and the father of all mankind. As our universal ancestor, our acquaintance with his life and character ought to be familiar and perfect. The wondrous history of his creation,—his original dignity in the image of God,—his fatal disobedience and fall from innocence and happiness,—the nature of his religion,—and the circumstances of his family, cannot fail to be interesting to us his reflecting children, especially to intelligent young persons. We will, therefore, endeavour to collect his brief memorials, as they have been preserved by the inspired writers.

Adam, in the Hebrew language, is a word which signifies red earth; and this name was given to the first of human beings, because he was fashioned by his Creator from a fragment of common clay. By divine inspiration Moses says, "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground," Gen. ii, 7. "In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him: male and female created he them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day wherein they were created." Gen. v, 1, 2.

In this passage we are informed, that our first parents were both called Adam by their Maker: yet afterwards, this name was limited to the man only, the woman having another name given to her by her husband. "And Adam called his wife's name Eve: because she was the mother of all living." Gen. ii, 20.

When the Almighty Creator had fitted up the vast fabric of this lower world,—when he had formed and arranged the innumerable and various tribes of animal and vegetable existences, and by his divine benediction had prepared them for fruitfulness, he fashioned his lovely work, the master-piece of the terrestrial creation, Man, in the sacred likeness of Himself.

The Scriptures, in their own peculiar and striking simplicity, record the history of man's creation. "So God created man in his own image, in the likeness of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." Gen. i, 27, 28.

That Adam was a person of very exalted worth and dignity, is clearly evident from the account which is given of his creation. The manner of it was far different from that of all the other works of God. When the Almighty created the heavens and the earth, the sun and the moon, and the host of stars, he only said, "Let there be light: and there was light," Gen. i, 3. "Let there be a firmament—and it was so. And God called the firmament Heaven," ver. 6—8. "And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle and creeping things, and beasts of the earth after his kind, and it was so," ver. 24.

But Adam was not called into existence simply with a word, like the other natural and inanimate things of the earth and heaven; nor yet like the irrational animals. To represent to us the superior excellency of Adam, the Scriptures speak of God as making a serious pause, and as looking for a model, after which to frame this exquisite piece of workmanship.

The adorable Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, consulted and deliberated on the momentous subject. It is observed by the inspired writer, "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth," ver. 26.

How fair must have been the body of Adam, that wonderful and ingenious machine, framed immediately by the finger of God! It was the contrivance and execution of the infinitely wise and powerful Creator of the universe. He moulded it into form, as a potter models his clay according to his will, and produced from the dust of the ground the most curious and beautiful figure of the human frame.

A careless, irreligious observer may not notice or understand its complicated wonders: nor consider, as the pious Psalmist reflected upon his own body, saying, "I am fearfully and wonderfully made." Psalm cxxxix, 14. But serious physicians, whose profession has led them minutely to examine the different parts of the human body, have always been struck with astonishment at the admirable skill with which the whole has been contrived. Galen, an ancient physician of the greatest fame for his knowledge, was affected even to tears, on contemplating the wisdom of God as seen in the human frame; and challenged any one, after the study of a hundred years, to show how the smallest sinew, or vein, or artery, could have been more commodiously placed, either for use or beauty.

But the soul of Adam was still more wonderful: it was the immediate breath of God. The body was fashioned supremely beautiful: but it was yet only a senseless lump of clay, until "God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." Gen. ii, 7. The "living soul" of Adam, how capacious! qualifying him for all the exercises and actions of a rational, social, intelligent being, far elevated above the beasts of the field—to think and reflect, to remember and discourse, and even to contemplate the wondrous works and the infinite perfections of his ever-blessed and glorious Creator!

Adam, no doubt, in reflecting upon himself, felt the pious sentiments which we sometimes utter, as expressed by Dr. Watts, in his version of Psalm cxxxix.

> "When I with pleasing wonder stand,
> And all my frame survey,
> Lord, 'tis thy work, I own thy hand
> Thus built my humble clay.
> Heaven, earth, and sea, and fire, and wind,
> Show me thy wondrous skill;
> But I review myself, and find > Diviner wonders still."

The exalted piety of Adam would assuredly lead hi to cherish such devout exercises of mind: and unde this conviction, Milton, the great poet, with equal el gance and sublimity, represents Adam as describing, in striking language, the first operations of his own mind, immediately after his creation.

"Myself I then perus'd, and limb by limb Survey'd, and sometimes went, and sometimes ran
With supple joints, as lively vigour led:
But who I was, or where, or from what cause
Knew not: to speak I try'd, and forthwith spake;
My tongue obey'd, and readily could name
Whate'er I saw. 'Thou sun,' said I, 'fair light,
And thou enlighten'd earth, so fresh and gay,
Ye hills, and dales, ye rivers, woods, and plains,
And ye that live and move, fair creatures, tell,
Tell, if ye saw, how came I thus, how here?
Not of myself; by some great Maker then,
In goodness and in pow'r pre-eminent;
Tell me, how I may know him, how adore,
From whom I have that thus I move and live,
And feel that I am happier than I know.'"

PARADISE LOST.

THE EFFECTS OF INFIDELITY.

MR. EDITOR,

Having in a previous paper traced Infidelity to its true source, viz. the Devil, I think it is but right that I should set forth some few of its consequences: adequately to describe all the horrors of this awful crime is not in the power of man; imagination fails to delineate, and human reason shrinks abashed from the task. It will however, I think, need but little argument to convince every reasonable man, that the effects which spring from so dreadful a cause as I have described, must be most appalling, "for men cannot gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles:" the prince of evil cannot be the author of good.

Let us look then for a moment at the national consequences of Infidelity. What would become of justice or truth, if it were possible for atheists to prove that there is no God? Does not by far the most important part of the distribution of the laws, rest upon the solemnity of an oath? Is it not by this that our properties are protected, that criminals are brought to justice, and such as are in need and necessity have right? Nay, do not our very lives depend upon it? Remove then the idea, that God is the witness of what we say and do — take away all considerations of eternal punishment, allotted to the liar and the perjurer, and what will be the result? To satisfy private revenge, men will dare to stand up and accuse him who is the object of their hatred, of some crime which he in truth never committed; for the sake of gain and money, the widow will be robbed of her portion, the fatherless of his right; injustice, treachery, cruelty, malice, and all that awful catalogue of crimes, the very mention of which makes the blood run cold in our veins, will fill every portion of our land. Order and happiness will have fled for ever, and our coasts will resound with the fell cry of the midnight robber and murderer, the shriek of the destitute, and the groan of the forsaken. Let it not be thought that this is visionary, that such results would not ensue, for experience has taught us that more, much more is the effect of this awful crime. Remember Robespierre, and remember France, and then let the Infidel stand forward if he dare, and recommend a system written with the iron pen of tyranny on the broken hearts of the destitute in characters of human blood.

But I must not stop here, for the half even of this awful tale has not been told. What is it that renders Britain so truly great, — what is it that ennobles her, and exalts her to the top of the nations? Is it not because she is a Christian country? Is it not because her land is full of charity and benevolence? Turn on what side you please, enter any street almost throughout her coasts, and institutions, whose object is to ameliorate human sufferings, and ease the weight of human woe, will meet your view. Who established all these? we may justly ask. Christians, is the reply. Never has Atheism or Deism done one action for the good of society. They have endeavoured to shake the principles of our people, to rob the destitute of their only consolation, to double the weight of human cares, and increase the horrors of a yawning grave. They have undone the hopes and destroyed the soul of many a poor and ignorant sinner. They have done all that could be done, to injure and oppress the pilgrim of earth, to increase his woe and augment his misery, and then — they have deserted him. In sickness he has found no deistical physician, in sorrow he has been attended by no deistical comforter, in death he has found no benefit from deistical principles. What, then! are these the men to whom we are to yield the principles and doctrines of a religion, which has established every honourable and praiseworthy society in existence? Can men be so blind as to think, that bloodshed is better than peace, misery than happiness, the caverns of hell than the mansions of blessedness?

It always affords me a degree of satisfaction when I hear that the death-bed of an Infidel has been a scene of woe. Not, believe me, because I rejoice in the sufferings of my fellow-creatures, but because I am certain such an event has a great influence on society. Suppose a young man to be very much entertained by the writings of Voltaire or Thomas Paine, and to admire the principles urged by those celebrated men; he would of course be disposed to adopt their sentiments and act accordingly. But if it should so happen that the account of the death of either of these men should be laid before him, what would be the result? Is it to be supposed, that as a reasonable being he would follow a system which produced only the most awful misery and dreadful despair? The best cure for Infidelity would be to publish the death-bed scenes of its supporters. Christianity does this, and is always benefited by so doing — let then our opponents do so likewise, and we should soon see that there is an immortal difference between these two religions. But I must draw to a close, lamenting much the necessity which calls upon Christians to recommend their religion by arguments, when, if we had common sense to deal with, facts would be sufficient. Nay, as it is, facts go a great way towards subverting Infidelity, and would, I think, be quite successful were it in the power of human language to describe the horrors of hell. Here is a subject which never can be exhausted; here is an argument which shall last for ever; and when eternity has swallowed up all the workers of wickedness, and time is no more, dreadful will be the testimony borne to the folly of atheism in the groans of the undying, and the curses of the lost. While yet then such awful misery may be averted, let us "be wise and consider these things, let us remember our latter end." I remain, Sir,

Yours most sincerely,
B. Z.

TO A PROFESSED INFIDEL.

You slight "the faith" — on solid ground, you say;
And while you stand on solid ground you may.
But when your limbs beneath Death's withering hand,
Shall find the solid ground as shifting sand;
No solid ground will then for mirth appear,
Your smiling confidence transform'd to fear;
While dread conviction starting into birth,
Proves — all your solid ground was sinking earth!

THE GYMNOTUS, OR ELECTRICAL EEL.

These electrical eels inhabit the Rio Colorado, the Guarapiche, and several small streams which cross the Chayma missions, as well as the Orinoco, the Meta, and the Maranham; and in the llanos, particularly in the environs of Calaboza, the pools of stagnant water, and the streams which fall into the Orinoco, are filled with them. They are at once dreaded and detested by the natives. The muscular part of the flesh is tolerably good eating, but the electric organ, which fills more than two-thirds of the body, is slimy and disagreeable, and is, accordingly, carefully separated from the rest. The presence of the gymnoti is considered as the principal cause of the want of fish in the ponds and pools of the llanos. They kill many more than they devour; and all the inhabitants of the waters, lizards, frogs, and tortoises, dread and endeavour to escape from their society. The Indians sometimes take young alligators and gymnoti in the same net, and the latter are never found in that case to display the slightest wound, having evidently disabled the alligators before they could attack them. It was found necessary to change the direction of a road near Uritucu, because these electrical eels were so numerous in one river, that they killed a great number of mules every year as they forded the water.

Desirious of making some experiments on these remarkable fish, M. Humboldt repaired to a stream in which they abound, and where the Indians offered their services in fishing for them with horses. Having caught about thirty wild horses and mules, they forced them to enter the pool.

"The extraordinary noise caused by the horses' hoofs, makes the fish issue from the mud, and excites them to combat. These yellowish and livid eels, resembling large aquatic serpents, swim on the surface of the water, and crowd under the bellies of the horses and mules. A contest between animals of so different an organization, furnishes a very striking spectacle. The Indians, provided with harpoons and long slender reeds, surround the pool closely; and some climb upon the trees, the branches of which extend horizontally over the surface of the water. By their wild cries and the length of their reeds, they prevent the horses from running away and reaching the bank of the pool. The eels, stunned by the noise, defend themselves by the repeated discharge of their electric batteries. During a long time they seem to prove victorious. Several horses sink beneath the violence of the invisible strokes which they receive from all sides in organs the most essential to life; and, stunned by the force and frequency of the shocks, they disappear under the water. Others, panting, with mane erect, and haggard eyes, expressing anguish, raise themselves, and endeavour to flee from the storm by which they are overtaken. They are driven back by the Indians into the water: but a small number succeed in eluding the active vigilance of the fishermen. These regain the shore, stumbling at every step, and stretch themselves on the sand exhausted with fatigue, and their limbs benumbed by the electric shock of the gymnoti.

"In less than five minutes, two horses were drowned. The eel, being five feet long, and pressing itself against the belly of the horses, makes a discharge along the whole extent of its electric organ. It attacks at once the heart, the intestines, and the plexus cœliacus of the abdominal nerves. It is natural that the effect felt by the horses should be more powerful than that produced upon man, by the touch of the same fish at only one of his extremities. The horses are probably not killed, but only stunned. They are drowned from the impossibility of rising amid the prolonged struggle between the other horses and the eels.

"We had little doubt that the fishing would terminate by killing successively all the animals engaged; but, by degrees, the impetuosity of this unequal combat diminished, and the wearied gymnoti dispersed. They require a long rest and abundant nourishment, to repair what they have lost of galvanic force. The mules and horses appear less frightened; their manes are no longer bristled, and their eyes express less dread. The gymnoti approach timidly the edge of the marsh, where they are taken by means of small harpoons fastened to long cords. When the cords are very dry, the Indians feel no shock in raising the fish into the air. In a few minutes, we had five large eels, the greater part of which were but slightly wounded.

"It would be temerity to expose ourselves to the first shocks of a very large and strongly irritated gymnotus. If by chance you receive a stroke before the fish is wounded, or wearied by a long pursuit, the pain and numbness are so violent, that it is impossible to describe the nature of the feeling they excite. I do not remember having ever received from the discharge of a large Leyden jar a more dreadful shock, than that which I experienced by imprudently placing both my feet on a gymnotus just taken out the water. I was affected the rest of the day with a violent pain in the knees, and in almost every joint.

"Gymnoti are neither charged conductors, nor batteries, nor electro-motive apparatuses, the shock of which is received every time they are touched with one hand, or when both hands are applied to form a conducting circle between two heterogeneous poles. The electric action of the fish depends entirely on its will; whether because it does not keep its electric organs always charged, or by the secretion of some fluid, or by any other means alike mysterious to us, it is capable of directing the action of its organs to an external object. We often tried, both insulated and uninsulated, to touch the fish, without feeling the least shock. When M. Bompland held it by the head, or by the middle of the body, while I held it by the tail, and standing on the moist ground did not take each other's hand, one of us received shocks, which the other did not feel. It depends upon the gymnotus to act toward the point where it finds itself the most strongly irritated. The discharge is then made at one point only, and not at the neighbouring points. If two persons touch the belly of the fish with their fingers, at an inch distance, and press it simultaneously, sometimes one, sometimes the other, will receive the shock."—Modern Traveller, Colombia.

PSALM XCIII.

The following is taken from a version of the Psalms by Sir Philip Sydney and the Countess of Pembroke.

Clothed with state, and girt with might,
Monarck-like Jehova raignes;
He who Earthes foundations pight[*],
Pight at first, and yet sustaines.
He whose stable throne disdaines
Motions shock and ages flight,
He who endless one remaines,
One, the same, in changelesse plight.

Rivers, yea, though rivers rore,
Roring though sea-billowes rise;
Vex the deepe, and break the shore,
Stronger are thou, Lord of Skies.
Firme and true thy promise lies,
Now and still as heretofore;
Holy worshipp never dies
In thy Howse, where we adore.

THE FOLLY OF ATHEISM SEEN IN THE WONDERS OF NATURE.

When I survey the works of nature with a more attentive eye, I am surprised to find with what marvellous exactness every creature draws its own picture, or propagates its own likeness; though in different manners of operation. The fox produces a living fox; the goose drops her egg, and hatches the young goose; and the tulip lets fall its seed into the earth, which ferments and swells, and labours long in the ground, till at last it brings forth a tulip.

Is it the natural sagacity of foxes that enables them to form their own image so accurately? By no means; for the goose and the flower do the like. The sprightly and the stupid, the sensible and the senseless, work this wonder with equal regularity and perfection; and the plant performs as well as the animal.

'Tis not possible that any of them should effect this by any peculiar rules of art and contrivance, for neither the one nor the other are at all acquainted with the composition or progress of their work. The bird is entirely ignorant of the wondrous vital ferment of her own egg; either in the formation of it, or the incubation: and the mother-plant knows as much of the parts of the young plant, as the mother-animal knows of the inward springs and movements of the young little animal. There could be no contrivance here, for not any of them had any thought or design of the final production: they were all moved—the beast, bird, and flower—by the material and mechanical springs of their own nature to continue their own species, but without any such intent or purpose.

Give souls to all the animal race, and make those souls as immaterial and as intelligent as you can: attribute to them what good sense you please in other affairs of their puny life: allow the brutes to be as rational and as cunning as you could wish or fancy, and to perform a thousand tricks by their own sagacity; yet in this matter those intellectual powers must all stand by as useless. The senseless vegetable has as much skill here as the animal; the goose is completely as wise as the fox or the greyhound: they draw their own portraits with as exquisite art and accuracy, and leave as perfect images behind them to perpetuate their kind.

Amazing proof, and incontestible argument of some superior wisdom! Some transcendant contriving mind, some Divine artificer, that made all these wondrous machines, and set them at work! The animal and the vegetable in these productions are but mere instruments under His supreme ruling power; like artless pencils in a painter's hand, to form the images that his thought had before designed. And 'tis that God alone who, before all worlds, contrived these models of every species in His own original idea, that appoints what under-agents He will employ to copy them.

Ever since the week of the creation, God has ordered all these creatures to fill the world with inhabitants of their own kind; and they have obeyed Him in a long succession of almost six thousand years. He has granted (shall I say) a divine patent to each creature for the sole production of its own likeness, with an utter prohibition to all the rest. Without His immediate commission not one creature can invade the province of another, nor perform any thing of this work but within its own peculiar tribe. Even Man, the glory of this lower creation, and the wisest thing on earth, would in vain attempt to make one of these common vegetables, or these curious, animated, moving machines. Not all the united powers of human nature, nor a council or club of the nicest artificers, with all their enginery and skill can form the least part of these works; can compose a fox's tail, a goose quill, or a tulip leaf. Nature is the art of God, and it must for ever be unrivalled by the sons of men.

Yet man can produce a man!—Admirable effect, but artless cause! A poor, limited, inferior agent! The plant and the brute in this matter are his rivals, and his equals too. The human parent and the parent-bird form their own images with equal skill, and are confined each to its own work. So the iron seal transfers its own figure to the clay with as much exactness and curiosity as the golden one: both can transfer only their own figure.

This appears to me a glorious instance wherein the wisdom and power of God maintain their own supremacy, and triumph over all the boasted reason and intellectual skill of men; that the wisest son of Adam in this noblest work of nature, can do no more than a flower or a fly; and if he would go out of his own species, and the appointed order of things, he is not able to make a fly nor a flower; no, not a worm nor a simple bulrush. In those productions wherein mankind are merely the instruments of the God of nature, their work is vital and divine; but if they would set up for prime artificers, they can do nothing. A dead statue, a painted shadow on a canvass, or perhaps a little brazen clock-work, is the supreme pride of their art, their highest excellence and perfection.

Let the atheist then exert his utmost stretch of understanding; let him try the force of all his mechanical powers, to compose the wing of a butterfly, or the meanest feather of a sparrow; let him labour, and sweat, and faint, and acknowledge his own weakness: then let him turn his eye, and look at those wondrous composures, his son or his little daughter; and when their infant tongues shall inquire of him, and say, Father, who made us? let him not dare assume the honour of that work to himself, but teach the young creatures that There is a GOD! and fall down on his face, and repent and worship.—Dr. Watts.

MUNIFICENCE OF AN AMERICAN CHRISTIAN.

Religion is believed to flourish in the United States of America, more than in any other country upon earth. An evidence of the intelligent, discriminating piety of a wealthy Christian lately deceased in that country, cannot but command the admiration of our Readers. He was a Christian Patriot, a "Friend of the People," and his works have brought him immortal honour, while they testify his cordidial belief in the doctrines of eternal salvation by grace, through the atonement of Christ.

Joseph Burr, Esq., was a member of an independent church, at Manchester, in the State of Vermont, New England; and we copy a list of his bequests, extracted from a paper of that city.

THE SUMMER MORNING.

By Clare.

The cocks have now the morn foretold,
The sun again begins to peep,
The shepherd, whistling to his fold,
Unpens and frees the captive sheep.
O'er pathless plains at early hours
The sleepy rustic sloomy goes;
The dews, brush'd off from grass and flowers,
Bemoistening sop his hardened shoes.

While every leaf that forms a shade,
And every floweret's silken top,
And every shivering bent and blade,
Stoops, bowing with a diamond drop.
But soon shall fly those diamond drops—
The red round sun advances higher,
And, stretching o'er the mountain tops,
Is gilding sweet the village spire.

'Tis sweet to meet the morning breeze,
Or list the giggling of the brook;
Or, stretched beneath the shade of trees,
Peruse and pause on Nature's book.
When Nature every sweet prepares,
To entertain our wish'd delay,—
The images which morning wears,
The wakening charms of early day!

Now let me tread the meadow paths
While glittering dew the ground illumes,
As, sprinkled o'er the withering swaths,
Their moisture shrinks in sweet perfumes;
And hear the beetle sound his horn;
And hear the skylark whistling nigh,
Sprung from his bed of tufted corn,
A hailing minstrel in the sky.

SUMMER TWILIGHT.

By D. M. Moir.

The clouds pass away, and are leaving the sky,
A region of azure unclouded and bright;
And the star of the twilight, with tremulous eye,
Comes forth like an angel that heralds the night.

Not a zephyr is curling the breast of the stream,
Not a zephyr is stirring the leaves on the tree;
And low hollow sounds, like the hum of a dream,
Steal over the vale from the voluble sea.

All is tranquil and still, save the spirit of man;
All is peaceful and pure, save the dream of his breast;
And the fanciful hopes that illumine his span,
Draw him on like a spell from the mansions of rest.

When around there is joy, then within there is strife;
On his cheek is a smile, on his bosom is care;
And daily and hourly the waves of his life
Dash, breaking in foam, on the rocks of despair.

SALT.

"The use of salt, as it is generally grateful, appears almost necessary to health. The appetite for salt is shared by many of the higher animals. The beasts of prey, that inhabit the central parts of the African and American continents, are known to travel immense tracts for the purpose of visiting the salt springs that are occasionally met with; and it is said that these springs have been in some instances discovered by means of their footsteps, and the hovering of birds over them."—Bostock's Physiology.

JEWISH TRADITION.

Amongst the many traditions possessed by the Jews concerning their great progenitor, the father of the faithful, is one to the following effect:—whether founded in fact or not, it contains a profitable lesson on the Divine forbearance, contrasted with the impatient spirit too often manifested by the most devoted servants of God.

As Abraham was one day sitting at the door of his tent, an aged traveller passed by, apparently fatigued with his journey, and standing in need of refreshment and repose. With the characteristic hospitality of those primitive times, the good patriarch invited him in, to rest his limbs and refresh his wearied spirits. The offer was thankfully accepted by the old man, who, entering the tent, was furnished with water to cleanse his feet, and left awhile to that repose which his exhausted frame required. Thus far fitted to resume his journey, his benevolent host set before him an abundant supply of provision, and bade him a hearty welcome. But with pious grief he beheld the stranger take his food without first presenting a thank-offering to the Most High; and in the warmth of his excited feelings, after reproaching the man with his ingratitude, he rudely drove him from his dwelling. When the irritation of the patriarch had subsided, and his mind had become sufficiently calm to receive instruction, the voice of the Lord was heard calling to him, to demand why he had thus driven the traveller from his door. "Because, Lord," said the venerable Hebrew, "he feared not thee, nor was grateful for the bounties of thy hand." "Abraham! Abraham!" said the Divine voice, "fourscore years have I borne with the ingratitude of that sinner, and couldst not thou have patience with him for one day?"

PERSIAN PUNISHMENT.

A terrible mode of punishment among the ancient Persians was, to shut the malefactor between two boats of equal size, except that the head and feet were left bare. These parts were moistened with honey, and on being exposed to the sun, the honey attracted the insects. The unhappy victim was obliged to take food, so that he lived often for many days. One is mentioned who lived seventeen days, and on taking off the upper boat, his flesh was found to be full of worms!

DAMORY'S OAK,

In Dorsetshire, was the largest of which mention is made. Its circumference was sixty-eight feet; and the cavity of it, which was sixteen feet long and twenty feet high, was, about the time of the Commonwealth, used by an old man for the entertainment of travellers as an ale-house. The dreadful storm in 1703, shattered this majestic tree; and in 1755 the last vestiges of it were sold as firewood.

CENTRAL SCHOOL OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY, BOROUGH ROAD, SOUTHWARK.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY.

ıııs most noble national Institution, under the pa-onage of His Majesty William IV with an annual ıbscription of one hundred pounds, seems destined to e a blessing not only to Great Britain, but to every ation of the world. Its design is "the education of e labouring and manufacturing classes of society, of ery religious denomination;" and it arose out of the ealous exertions of Joseph Lancaster, an ingenious hoolmaster, who is generally considered the inventor f the system of mutual instruction. His own exertions ere surprising; and he soon enjoyed the patronage of is Majesty George III, and of the Royal Dukes of ent and Sussex. A society was formed in 1805, and noble building for a model school was erected in outhwark, and schools were soon established in dif-rent parts of the kingdom upon the same plan. It is law of this society, that the schools in connection with , "shall be open to the children of parents of all de-ominations: the lessons for reading shall consist of ex-racts from the Holy Scriptures; no catechism or pecu-ar religious tenets shall be taught in the schools, but ery child shall be enjoined to attend regularly the lace of worship to which its parents belong." As no reference was given to the peculiarities of the church f England, and no provision made for the use of its techism, prejudices and opposition were excited nong the more zealous of its members. It was said be an engine for the multiplication of dissenters: but is prejudice was overruled for good, as churchmen ere roused to take part in the education of the poor, r the formation of what are called National or Paro-ial Schools. These were therefore established in ry many parishes through the kingdom, in which it is ported there are now about 280,000 scholars taught a similar plan, somewhat modified by Dr. Bell, ter his return from Madras.

The Reports of the British and Foreign School So-ety are among the most interesting documents of the nd ever published; exhibiting its various correspon-nce, and branch operations, not only in England, but many states of Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and e islands of the Great South Sea, with the general state of education in those countries. From this society have originated, not only the National Schools, but many others in different parts of the world, among which we must mention the "Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in Ireland," called the Dublin Kildare Street Society, which had, in 1829, 1553 schools on its list, containing 124,449 scholars. This society has received a grant of money annually from Parliament. The Irish Report states also — "the total number of schools assisted from your funds during the past year, including the new schools, is 1,222; the gross amount of grants is 6,830*l.* 9*s.* 6½*d.*, exclusive of gratuities to deserving teachers, and of the expense of the training department."

In the central schools of the Society in London, there are regularly above 500 boys on the books, and 18,850 have been received for instruction. There are 300 girls kept on the books, and 9,180 have been received since the commencement: total, 28,000. The various schools in London, now in connection with this Society, contain about 15,000 scholars. "During the past year, sixty-two candidates either for Boys' or Girls' Schools have been admitted; thirty-nine have been boarded and instructed wholly or in part at the expense of the Society; thirty-eight have been appointed to schools; three have sailed for foreign stations, and nineteen remain on the list. Eight Missionaries have also attended to learn the system."

The expenditure of the British and Foreign School Society, during the past year, was 4309*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.*, including 1736*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.*, specially contributed for the advancement of scriptural education in Greece.

Prejudice and ignorance have misrepresented this great Institution, which we believe adapted and designed to be the means of advancing a religious education through all nations.

ARAB YOUTHS EDUCATED IN ENGLAND.

"I beheld close in front of me," says a visitor to the Model School, "a number of the descendants of Ishmael, who had been brought to the school to receive instruction; nor has there been any want of success in the attempts to cultivate their minds, as will appear by the following statement. There are fourteen Arabian youths in this class, of various ages and shades of colour. They appeared to be from thirteen to seventeen years of age. When they first entered into the school, in December, 1829, they were very uncivilized. They all appeared to follow the old maxim of the Bedouins, 'Let him take who has the power.' This was exemplified in some striking instances among the boys, from whom they forcibly took several things, and it was with difficulty they were prevented from hurting some by their violent conduct.

"They were at first taught by motions and gestures. All of them can now read with tolerable correctness, and even with good emphasis. They attempted explanations of words and sentences, and succeeded in several, chiefly by employing their own methods of illustration, which, though often curious, appeared extremely natural. They have also received instruction in writing, arithmetic, geography, and map drawing, in all of which they are making satisfactory progress. They are now quite docile, having learned the necessity of refraining from violence, and of conducting themselves in an orderly and peaceable manner. The present state of the whole of this class, is perhaps one of the most important and indubitable instances of the beneficial effects of education, as proving its irresistible tendency to soften the manners, by enlightening the mind."

Who can conceive the benefits which will result to Egypt, "the basest of kingdoms," and to the whole north of Africa, by the sound scriptural and scientific education of these fourteen Arab youths?

PRESENTATION OF THE BIBLE TO QUEEN ELIZABETH.

Queen Elizabeth succeeded to the crown of England in 1558, on the death of her sanguinary sister Mary. Elizabeth was a Protestant; and she restored the profession of the doctrines of the Reformation. On this account, the citizens of London made her a suitable present on the day of her coronation. As she rode in state through Cheapside, they contrived to let down a child dressed in white, having a splendid copy of the English Bible, to present to her Majesty. Elizabeth received the present, kissing the hands of the child; and having kissed the sacred volume, she pressed it to her bosom, thanking her good citizens of London for their valuable gift, at the same time declaring that she esteemed it of more value than her crown, and that she would make it her study and the rule of her life.

ON SELF-EXAMINATION.

The serious and impartial retrospect of our conduct is indisputably necessary to the confirmation or recovery of virtue, and is therefore recommended under the name of self-examination, by divines, as the first act previous to repentance.

It is indeed, of so great use, that without it, we should always be to begin life, be seduced for ever by the same allurements, and misled by the same fallacies.

"Let not sleep," says Pythagoras, "fall upon thine eyes, till thou hast thrice reviewed the transactions of the past day; that thou mayest know where thou hast turned aside from rectitude, and what thou hast left undone, which ought to have been done."—Dr. Johnson.

THE EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY.

For a well-educated young person to be unable to give an intelligent reason why the Bible is received as the word of God, is exceedingly to be regretted. Such, however, is the case in very numerous instances. Nor is this ignorance to be found solely among those, whose friends are regardless of religion. It is not peculiar to those who are strangers to evangelical truth. It is common, even among those who have been brought up to attend the ordinances of divine worship, and whose parents are members of Christian churches; and it is presumed that every intelligent observer of the mode in which the young are educated, and the comparatively little attention which is paid to their establishment, in very many congregrations, in the demonstrative evidences of the divinity of Christianity, will be convinced of the lamentable fact. It is admitted that much attention has lately been paid to this momentous subject; but still, far too much is taken for granted, as to the knowledge of our young people on these points.

The writer has been led to these remarks, from a case recently mentioned to him, by a respectable minister in one of the midland counties. It was in substance as follows:—A young lady, who attended his ministry, and who appeared to be serious in "pressing towards the mark, for the prize of her high calling of God in Christ Jesus," and active in "every good word and work," in a little time manifested a disinclination to submit her mind to the inspired dictates of the gospel of Christ. Previously to her entering upon the duties of her station, as governess in the family of a nobleman, she paid a visit to a distant friend, who had imbibed the sceptical notions of modern infidelity. The authenticity and inspiration of the Scriptures were doubted; the necessity of a propitiatory sacrifice for sin, and the regenerating influences of the Holy Spirit, were disregarded or disbelieved; and the mind of this intelligent, accomplished young person, became subverted. Her manner towards her affectionate pastor, when he sought an interview with her, was cold, reserved, self-sufficient, and haughty; and in this state of mind she entered the family of one of our nobles, to take the charge of educating his children. Unspeakably painful must such a case be to a sincere minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ: but what may be the consequences to her young charge, who can tell?

The primary cause of such an apostacy, whether it prove final, or only temporary, must be sought in the depravity of the heart. "The carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." (Rom. viii, 7.) But it is highly probable, that had the young lady been well instructed in the Evidences of Christianity, her intelligent mind would have rejected the profane and ignorant insinuations against the divinity of our most holy faith.

Blame does not appear to attach to her late pastor, as her attendance on his ministry had been but for an inconsiderable time. Culpability must, however, attach to her parents or teachers, or both, for having her mind unfurnished with that knowledge, which is so nearly connected with salvation. Criminality, as well as loss, must be hers: for had she devoted a tenth part of the time to the search of divine truth, which either of her elegant accomplishments had required, she would not have "been led away with the error of the wicked, nor fallen from her own steadfastness." (2 Pet. iii, 17.)

The impressions produced by the affecting case above stated, were deepened by reading the following passage in the Essay of the Ecclesiastical Knowledge society, "On the Present State of Religion in England, and the Impediments to its Advancement." "It is to be feared, however, that many young persons are suffered to grow up into life, without ever being taught to direct their minds to the foundations of the Christian faith. While great attention is often laudably paid in families to catechetical instruction, the Evidences of Christianity, on which so many small and easy treatises are extant, and which might be rendered interesting to many young minds, are sadly neglected. It is extremely probable, that to this neglect of inculcating intelligent views of Christianity and its evidences, are, in a great measure, to be attributed the numerous instances which have occurred of the children of Christian parents becoming infidels. 'I cannot,' says the late eminent Mr. Ryland, of Northampton, 'forbear declaring, with a degree of warmth that borders upon bitterness, grief, and indignation, that out of above five hundred persons, of all ages, who have come under my care, I have never had one youth, who had been instructed in the solid evidences of the Christian religion, by his parents or former tutors.' This passage, which is in the author's 'Contemplations,' was written about half a century ago; but it is to be feared, that the evil complained of is as yet but very partially remedied in Christian families."

It must be doing a service to the heads of Christian families, to invite their consideration of this momentous subject; and it may not be unseasonable, at least with respect to many, to point out to them some of the most valuable treatises on the Evidences of Christianity. Among the most valuable of modern works, the following may be recommended:—Grotius on the Truth of the Christian Religion; Addison's Evidences of Christianity; Doddridge's Evidences, Three Discourses; Paley's Evidences; Gregory's Letters, 2 vols.; Bishop Porteus's Evidences; A Father's Reasons for Christianity; Companion to the Bible.

May the imperative obligation upon parents, tutors, and pastors, be deeply felt, so as to lead them to give the proper and necessary attention to the rising generation; that their minds may be instructed, and established against all the profane and pernicious sophistry of modern infidels.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ADAM.

Sect. II.—The Dignity of Adam.

ADAM, as a being of reason and intelligence, created in the image of his Maker, must have been truly noble! But the full import of that expression, "the image of God," includes something far beyond intellectual dignity; or else evil spirits, who are "held in chains of darkness" would be like God. What can be said more of a creature, than that he is made in the likeness of his Creator? "God is a spirit," John iv, 2; his image, therefore, in Adam must have been spiritual; yet it consisted not merely in his intellectual powers, but "in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness." Eph. iv, 24; Col. iii, 10.

Adam was like God in his knowledge; possessing an understanding capacious, comprehensive, and richly furnished: he resembled his Maker in holiness, delighting only in that which was right and just: and his happiness was spiritual and divine; for he partook, without interruption, of the overflowing felicity of his Creator. Adam bore some small degree of resemblance to his Maker, also, in his dominion and sovereignty, which the inspired Psalmist has instructively celebrated. Referring to the dominion of Adam, he says concerning man, "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands, thou hast put all things under his feet: all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field, the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea; and whatever passeth through the paths of the sea." Psalm viii, 5—8. This testimony of David is in exact accordance with the record of Moses in Genesis; and thus was Adam constituted the representative of the Almighty on the earth, as the Apostle Paul calls him, "The image and glory of God." 1 Cor. xi, 7.

The knowledge of Adam must have been surprisingly great, as is evident from his giving different and suitable names to all the various living creatures. The account of this procedure, as written by Moses, is equally instructive and beautiful, affording a remarkable illustration of his constituted and rightful sovereignty. "And the LORD God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air, and brought them to Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field." Gen. ii, 18, 19.

The LORD himself brought the tribes of living creatures to Adam, to call forth his powers of reason and speech. The terrible and majestic lion, the fierce tiger, the huge elephant, and the noble horse, were equally led by their Creator and presented to Adam to do him homage, as their appointed ruler and lord.

An old tradition is said to have been heard in Egypt by the philosopher Plato, that "the first man was the greatest philosopher." There seems abundantly sufficient reason to regard that tradition as founded in truth, especially when we remember, that the God of nature himself was the instructor of Adam in the formation and use of language; and by his inspiration, the different natures of the beasts were perceived, so that Adam would be able to appropriate names to them all, corresponding to their several qualities. It is probable, that in these things Adam was far superior in knowledge to Solomon, the wise king of Israel; though it is said concerning that prodigy of wisdom, that "he spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes." 1 Kings iv, 33.

The wise king of Israel attained his vast knowledge by the Divine blessing on his observations and studies: but Adam was created perfect at once. The moment he came into being, he existed in all the dignity and strength of reason and intelligence. The whole volume of nature was open to his capacious and comprehensive understanding, and a small measure of experience would be sufficient to develop his amazing powers of understanding.

> "With him his noblest sons might not compare,
> In godlike feature, and majestic air;
> And as in form excelling, so in mind
> The sire of men transcended all mankind."
> WORLD BEFORE THE FLOOD.

In the delightful place which was prepared for the habitation of Adam, the riches of divine benevolence were largely seen. Moses observes, "And the LORD God planted a garden eastward of Eden: and there he put the man whom he had formed. And out of the ground made the LORD God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food; and the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. And a river went out of Eden to water the garden." Gen. ii, 8—10.

Eden is believed to have been situated on the Euphrates, near to the Persian Gulf. It is still possessed of the richest soil in the Turkish empire; and if cultivated, would be one of the most lovely places in nature. When we think of Paradise, our minds are filled with the idea of the seat of overflowing delight. The very name of its situation, Eden, which signifies pleasure, warrants the thought of perfect felicity. But the enjoyment of Adam did not consist in doing nothing. Occupation was necessary, both for the preservation of his health, and for the continuance of the sweetness of his satisfaction. As we read in the sacred history, "the LORD took the man, and put him in the garden to dress and to keep it," we are taught to regard it as a place in which Adam was to be exercised in beneficial employment. He was to be nourished by feeding upon the delicious fruits of Paradise: he received his food by a particular grant from God, that he might be continually reminded of Jehovah being in all things his only and sovereign Lord. He was farther instructed, that his present condition in Paradise was not a state of established bliss, nor yet the limit of his happiness: but that after a course of perfect obedience to the holy will of his Maker, he might expect to be confirmed in the enjoyment of unutterable felicity in a superior and eternal world.

Adam, still, amidst all this luxuriant munificence of his Creator, and reigning as sovereign of the whole earth, filled with delight, in which the brute creation was not able to participate, was alone. "But for Adam," on the wide and spacious globe, "there was not found an help for him." Infinite goodness supplied the desirable blessing, and perfected the felicity of Paradise. "And the LORD God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept; and He took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof: and the rib, which the LORD God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man." Gen. ii, 21, 22.

> "Grace was in all her steps, heav'n in her eye,
> In every gesture dignity and love."

The intelligent and penetrating mind of Adam manifested itself on this occasion. He received this last gift of divine bounty, in a manner expressive of his lively gratitude to the beneficent Author, of affection to his lovely partner, and of his sense of the intimacy and equality of their inseparable union. Marriage was instituted and blessed by the great Creator himself. "And Adam said, This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh," ver. 23, 24.

What additional satisfaction would Adam now experience in contemplating the frame and course of nature, possessing the most exalted and pure of human joys, that of imparting knowledge to a beloved object! How would the spirit of devotion be heightened in the holy man, now that he could join in the elevating exercise of social worship! How would he delight to instruct his beloved Eve in the wonders of creation, and unfold to her the nature, perfections, and commandments of their adorable Creator! Even the luscious fruits of Paradise would acquire a new and more delicious flavour, when gathered by the hand of conjugal affection, and recommended by the smile of complacency and love.

HUMILITY AND UPRIGHTNESS THE WAY TO HONOUR.

IN the evening of the day Sir Eardly Wilmot kissed his Majesty's hand, on being appointed chief justice, one of his sons, a youth of seventeen, attended him to his bed-side. "Now," said he, "my son, I will tell you a secret worth your knowing and remembering. The elevation I have met with in life, particularly this last instance of it, has not been owing to any superior merit or abilities, but to my humility; to my not having set up myself above others, and to a uniform endeavour to pass through life void of offence towards God and man."

SACRED ANTIQUITIES.

THE MIRACULOUS ROCK.—EXOD. XVII, 6.

THE celebrated rock which Moses struck, is near the middle of the valley of Raphidin, about a hundred paces from Mount Horeb. In travelling through a long and pretty open road, we observe a high rock among several small ones, which has by a long succession of time been detached from the neighbouring mountains. This rock is a huge mass of red granite, and its figure is almost round on one side, but it is flat on the side that looks towards Horeb; it is twelve feet broad, and as many thick; its breadth is greater than its height; it is about fifty feet in circumference, and pierced with twenty-four holes, which are easily counted; each hole is a foot long, and an inch broad; the flat surface of the rock contains twelve of these holes, and the round side opposite as many, which are placed horizontally about two feet from the superior edge of the rock, are only some inches distant from each other, and also ranged very nearly in the same line.

The holes on one side are so far from communicating with those of the other, that they are not so much as opposite to each other. It is to be observed, that this and the other rocks are in a very dry and barren ground, and that no spring, nor any other kind of water, is to be found near them. The traveller relates,

1. We easily observe a perfect smoothness from the inferior lip of each hole to the ground.
2. This smoothness is only observed in a small trench or groove made in the surface of the rock, and runs along the whole of this groove from one end to the other.
3. The edges of the holes and grooves are lined with a fine slender green moss, though not the smallest herb appears on any other part of the rock, the whole surface of which, except the edges of the holes and grooves, is pure stone.

Now what is signified by this smoothness of the inferior lips of the holes—these grooves equally polished from top to bottom—this fine moss, which only covers the edges of the holes and grooves, without any change happening for three thousand years past? What signify all these appearances, so sensible, if not that they are so many incontestible proofs, that formerly a copious and miraculous water flowed from these holes?

MOUNT ARARAT,

ON which the ark of Noah rested when the waters of the deluge subsided, is ten or twelve leagues from Erivan to the south-east. The Armenians have so great a veneration for it, that as soon as they perceive it they fall prostrate to the ground and kiss it. They call this mountain Mesesoufat, that is, "the mountain of the ark." It is supposed to be the Gordian mountain of the ancient geographers; and its summit is divided into two points always covered with snow, and almost continually surrounded with clouds and fogs, which render them invisible. At the foot of the mountain are moving sands, interrupted by some barren downs. A littl higher are dreadful black rocks, piled upon each other which, on account of the steepness of the mountain the abundance of the sands, and the defect of water are very difficult of access.

GYPSIES.

our earliest years we have heard many strange said concerning that singular class of wandering , the Gypsies. By some writers they are called ptians," from a belief that they originally emi- from among that people, and from which appel- they are called Gypsies.

people are said to swarm as banditti in several ean nations, in Asia, and in Africa. Europe is d to contain 700,000 of them. Spain is said to shelter for 40,000 or 60,000: some say for twice amber. They abound in Italy, and are scattered h France, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and . In Spain they are called Gitanos, in France ians. Writers of the greatest authority say that ave wandered through the earth ever since the 517, having at that period refused to submit to rkish yoke under Sultan Selim, the conqueror of . They revolted under Zinganeus their leader, whom the Turks call them Zinganees. Being nded in their revolt, they were banished from . They agreed to unite in small parties, and to se all over the earth, professing an acquaintance ome secret and mysterious science, by which they sed a knowledge of the future destinies of men.

hat age of superstition and credulity, they ac- a surprising measure of influence over the minds ignorant; and in a few years they gained such a er of proselytes, who assumed their language, y art imitated their complexion, that through nal-practices they became troublesome and even lable to most of the states of Europe.

n act of parliament so early as 1530, they are de- d, by stat. 22 Henry VIII, chap. 10, as "an out- h people, calling themselves Egyptians, using no ior feat of merchandise, who have come into this , and gone from shire to shire, and place to place, at companies, and used great, subtile, and crafty to deceive the people; bearing them in hand that y palmistry could tell men's and women's for- ; and so many times by craft and subtilty have ed the people of their money, and also have com- many heinous felonies and robberies." On this at they are directed to avoid the realm, and not rn under pain of imprisonment, and forfeiture of oods and chattels; and upon their trials for any which they may have committed, they shall not itled to a jury de me dictate linguæ.

Thus for about three hundred years the Gypsies have wandered through the world, assuming disguises and strange habits, speaking a cant language, and pretending to tell the fortunes of the ignorant and vain. As knowledge has advanced and civilization has increased in England, the Gypsies have decreased, settling in large towns, learning mechanic trades, and so becoming lost in the mass of the people. Still there are many scattered throughout our country, retaining many of the peculiar habits, but far less remarkable than fifty years ago. Many of them have gained considerable knowledge of letters, and some are believed to live in the fear of God.

The Home Missionary Society has instructed its agents to direct their attention to these wanderers, and much good has already resulted from their benevolent labours to serve them. Many of their children have been received into Sunday Schools, while they have continued in particular neighbourhoods. Tracts and the blessed word of God have been delivered to them, and many of them, we have no doubt, have been reclaimed from their vagrant habits, and brought to a knowledge of salvation by Jesus Christ. "I lately met," says one of their agents, "with three camps of Gypsies, containing twenty persons, and not one of them could read. I spent nearly an hour with them in reading tracts, conversation, exhortation, and prayer. The behaviour of these pitiable outcasts of society was very becoming, interesting, and praiseworthy. They seemed in no small measure sensible of the attention manifested to them, and returned many thanks for what they heard, and promised to do and observe the important things which I had unfolded and recommended to them. As I was leaving this group, expressing their deeply felt gratitude, one of the company solicited one of the tracts which I read, which was 'Poor Joseph.' I asked why he desired a tract, when neither he nor any one belonging to the three camps were able to read. He replied, 'If you will be so kind as to give me one, I will in my travels easily get some one to read it to me:' so I supplied him with a few tracts."

CHILD-STEALING BY GYPSIES.

"CHILD-STEALING," half a century ago, we believe was not uncommon among gypsies, and many an unhappy parent was deeply afflicted with the heaviest calamities by their means. Rather more than a century ago, "as the Trekschuyt, or Hackney boat, which carries passengers from Leyden to Amsterdam, was putting off, a boy running along the side of the canal desired to be taken in; which the master of the boat refused, because the lad had not quite money enough to pay the usual fare. An eminent merchant being pleased with the looks of the boy, and secretly touched with compassion towards him, paid the money for him, and ordered him to be taken on board. Upon talking with him afterwards, he found that he could speak readily in three or four languages, and learned upon further examination, that he had been stolen away when a child by a gypsy, and had rambled ever since with a gang of these strollers up and down several parts of Europe. It happened that the merchant, whose heart seems to have inclined towards the boy by a secret kind of instinct, had himself lost a child some years before. The parents, after a long search for him, gave him up for drowned in one of the canals with which the country abounds; and the mother was so afflicted at the loss of a fine boy, who was her eldest son, that she died for grief of him. Upon laying together all particulars, and examining the several moles and marks by which the mother used to describe the child when he was first missing, the boy proved to be the son of the merchant, whose heart had so unaccountably melted at the sight of him. The lad was very well pleased to find a father who was so rich, and likely to leave him a good estate; the father, on the other hand, was not a little delighted to see a son return to him, whom he had given up for lost, with such a sharpness of understanding and skill in language. He was afterwards trained as a gentleman; and it is even said, that he was afterwards employed in foreign courts upon national business, with great reputation and honour to those who sent him, and that he visited several countries as a public minister, in which he formerly wandered as a gypsy."

ILLUSTRATION OF GEN. XXIX, 25.

It appears almost impossible to Europeans, that a deception like that of Laban's could be practised. But the following extract, from a Journal which I kept at Smyrna, presents a parallel case.

"The Armenian brides are veiled during the marriage ceremony; and hence deceptions have occurred, in regard to the person chosen for wife. I am informed, that, on one occasion, a young Armenian at Smyrna solicited in marriage a younger daughter, whom he admired. The parents of the girl consented to the request, and every previous arrangement was made. When the time for solemnizing the marriage arrived, the elder daughter, who was not so beautiful, was conducted by the parents to the altar, and the young man was unconsciously married to her. 'And it came to pass, that, in the morning, behold, it was' the elder daughter. The deceit was not discovered till it could not be rectified; and the manner in which the parents justified themselves was precisely that of Laban: 'It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born.' It is really the rule amongst the Armenians, that neither a younger son nor daughter be married, till their elder brother or sister have preceded them."

It was in conversation with an Armenian of Smyrna that this fact was related to me. I naturally exclaimed, "Why, that is just the deception which was practised upon Jacob!" "What deception?" he asked.—As the Old Testament is not yet translated into any language with which the Armenians are familiar, he was ignorant of the story. Upon giving him a narration of Jacob's marriage, as it is related Gen. xxix, he assented to it at once, as a circumstance in no respect improbable.

I was once present at the solemnization of matrimony amongst the Armenians; and some recollections of it may tend to throw light on this and other passages of Scripture. The various festivities attendant on these occasions continue for three days, and during the last night the marriage is celebrated. I was conducted to the house of the bride, where I found a very large assemblage of persons. The company was dispersed through various rooms; reminding me of the directions of our Saviour, in regard to the choice of the lowermost rooms at feasts. On the ground floor, I actually observed that the persons convened were of an inferior order of the community, whilst in the upper rooms were assembled those of higher rank.

The large number of young females who were present, naturally reminded me of the wise and foolish virgins in our Saviour's parable. These being friends of the bride, "the virgins, her companions" (Ps. xlv, 14), had come "to meet the bridegroom."

It is usual for the bridegroom to come at midnight; so that, literally, "at midnight the cry is made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh! go ye out to meet him" (Matt. xxv, 6). But, on this occasion, "the bridegroom tarried:" it was two o'clock before he arrived.

The whole party then proceeded to the Armenian church, where the bishop was waiting to receive them, and there the ceremony was completed.—Hartley's Researches.

THE TALIPOT LEAF.

All the books of importance in Pali and Cingalese, relative to the religion of Buddhoo, in Ceylon, are written in laminæ of the leaves of the talipot, or corypha umbraculifera. The Pali and Cingalese character is engraved upon them with either a brass or an iron style. There are some of these books in Sir Alexander Johnstone's collection, which are supposed to be between five and six hundred years old, and which are still perfect. This leaf is used in the maritime provinces of Ceylon as a mark of distinction, each person being allowed to have a certain number of them folded up as fans, carried with him by his servants; and also, in the Kandian country, in the shape of a round flat umbrella on a long stick. It is used likewise in making tents. Sir Alexander Johnstone gave to the late Sir Joseph Banks, in 1818, a very fine specimen of a tent made of these leaves, large enough to hold a party of ten persons at table. The leaves are also used by the common people to shelter themselves from the rain, one leaf affording sufficient shelter for seven or eight persons.

ON THE INDIAN JASMINE FLOWER.

How lovelily the Jasmine flower
Blooms far from man's observing eyes,
And having liv'd its little hour,
There withers, there sequester'd dies.
Though faded, yet 'tis not forgot;
A rich perfume, that time can't sever,
Lingers in that unfriended spot,
And decks the Jasmine's grave for ever.

Thus, thus should man, who seeks to soar
On learning's wing to fame's bright sky,
Far from his fellows seek that lore,
Unheeded live, sequester'd die.
Thus, like the Jasmine, when he's fled,
Fame's rich perfume will ever keep Ling'ring around the faded dead,
As saints that watch some infant's sleep.

Richard Ryan.

SIR MATTHEW HALE,

ON THE MOSAIC ACCOUNT OF THE CREATION.

No apology is necessary for laying before our Readers the sentiments of this great man on the "Origination of Mankind,"—we are sure they will agree with his Biographer in the opinion, that it contains "a rare and very agreeable mixture, both of fine wit, and solid learning and judgment."

"That which may illustrate my meaning, in this preference of the revealed light of the Holy Scriptures touching this matter, above the essays of a philosophical imagination, may be this. Suppose that Greece, being unacquainted with the curiosity of mechanical engines, though known in some remote region of the world; and that an excellent artist had secretly brought and deposited in some field or forest some excellent watch or clock, which had been so formed, that the original of its motion were hidden, and involved in some close contrived piece of mechanism; that this watch was so framed, that the motion thereof might have lasted a year, or some such time as might give a reasonable period for their philosophical descanting concerning it; and that in the plain table there had been not only the description and indication of hours, but the configurations and indications of the various phases of the moon, the motion and place of the sun in the ecliptic, and divers other curious indications of celestial motions; and that the scholars of the several schools of Epicurus, of Aristotle, of Plato, and the rest of those philosophical sects, had casually in their walk found this admirable automaton;—what kind of work would there have been made by every sect, in giving an account of this phenomenon? We should have the Epicurean sect have told the by-standers, according to their preconceived hypothesis, 'That this was nothing else but an accidental concretion of atoms, that, happily fallen together, had made up the index, the wheels, and the balance; and that being happily fallen into this posture, they were put into motion.' Then the Cartesian falls in with him, as to the main of their supposition; but tells him, 'That he does not sufficiently explicate how the engine is put into motion; and therefore, to furnish this motion, there is a certain materia subtilis that pervades this engine and the moveable parts, consisting of certain globular atoms apt for motion: they are thereby and by the mobility of the globular atoms put into motion.' A third finds fault with the two former, because 'those motions are so regular, and do express the various phenomena of the distribution of time, and the heavenly motions;' therefore it seems to him, that 'this engine and motion also, so analogical to the motion of the heavens, was wrought by some admirable conjunction of the heavenly bodies, which formed this instrument and its motions, in such an admirable correspondency to its own existence.' A fourth, disliking the suppositions of the three former, tells the rest, 'That he hath a more plain and evident solution of the phenomenon, namely, the Universal Soul of the World, or Spirit of Nature, that formed so many sorts of insects with so many organs, faculties, and such congruity of their whole composition, and such curious and various motions, as we may observe in them, hath formed and set into motion this admirable automaton, and regulated and ordered it, with all these congruities we see in it.' Then steps in an Aristotelian, and being dissatisfied with all the former solutions, tells them, 'Gentlemen, you are all mistaken; your solutions are inexplicable and unsatisfactory; you have taken up certain precarious hypotheses, and being prepossessed with these creatures of your own fancies, and in love with them, right or wrong you form all your conceptions of things according to those fancied and preconceived imaginations. The short of the business is, this machine is eternal, and so are all the motions; and inasmuch as a circular motion hath no beginning or end, this motion that you see both in the wheels and index, and the successive indications of the celestial motions, is eternal, and without beginning. And this is a ready and expedite way of solving the phenomena, without so much ado as you have made about it.'

"And whilst all the masters were thus contriving the solution of the phenomenon, in the hearing of the artist that made it, and when they had all spent their philosophizing upon it, the artist that made this engine, and all this while listened to their admirable fancies, tells them, 'Gentlemen, you have discovered very much excellency of invention, touching this piece of work that is before you; but you are all miserably mistaken; for it was I that made this watch, and brought it hither; and I will show you how I made it. First I wrought the spring, and the fusee, and the wheels, and the balance, and the case and table; I fitted them one to another, and placed these several axes that are to direct the motions, of the index to discover the hour of the day, of the figure that discovers the phases of the moon, and the other various motions that you see; and then I put it together, and wound up the spring, which hath given all these motions that you see in this curious piece of work; and that you may be sure I tell you true, I will tell you the whole order and progress of my making, disposing, and ordering of this piece of work, the several materials of it, the manner of the forming of every individual part of it, and how long I was about it.'

"This plain and evident discovery renders all these excogitated hypotheses of those philosophical enthusiasts vain and ridiculous, without any great help of rhetorical flourishes, or logical confutations. And much of the same nature is that disparity of the hypotheses of the learned philosophers, in relation to the origination of the world and man, after a great deal of dust raised, and fancied explications, and unintelligible hypotheses. The plain, but divine narrative by the hand of Moses, full of sense and congruity, and clearness and reasonableness in itself, does at the same moment give us a true and clear discovery of this great mystery, and renders all the essays of the generality of the heathen philosophers to be vain, inevident, and indeed inexplicable theories, the creatures of fantasy and imagination, and nothing else."

INFLUENCE OF PRAYER ON THE CHARACTER.

(Extracted from Advice to a Young Christian, by the Religious Tract Society, which we earnestly recommend to our Young Friends.)

THERE is nothing which so elevates a character, and especially a female character, as deep and intimate communion with God. She seems then to be allied to angelic natures. A sort of mellow radiance is poured into her character, as if some particles of heaven's glory had been let fall upon her. She moves in a higher sphere than the generality of her sex. She is another being than those idle, sickly daughters of pleasure, who waste their lives in dreaming fanciful visions of happiness, sporting awhile amid life's tumultuous joys, and then sinking unblessed into a wretched eternity. She converses with God. At a throne of grace she acquires a benevolence, a dignity, a humility, which throw around her an attractive lustre, put sweetness into every action and expression, make her contented in every condition of life, patient under every affliction, faithful in the discharge of every duty, and which even grace her dying hours, and make her 'death-bed privileged beyond the common walks of life.' LINES ON THE VIOLET.

Fairest of all earth's gay parterre,
In nature's choicest vest array'd,
I love to view thee mildly rear
Thy form beneath the sheltering shade.

'Tis sweet thy loveliness to trace
Within thy leaflet's fold conceal'd,
'Tis sweet to mark thy modest grace
In richest radiancy reveal'd.

What though the proud carnation's hue
Bedeck thee not with deepest dye;
Yet, lowly flower, thy beaming blue
Heeds not its scornful rivalry.

Thou boastest not the rose-bud's bloom,
Or the gay tulip's gorgeous show;
But sweeter breathes thy mild perfume,
And fairer tints thy beauty's glow.

Emblem of innocence and truth,
Thou courtest not th' intrusive gaze,
But like the bashfulness of youth
Retirest from the sun-beam's blaze.

Thine is the flower I fondly prize,
Symbol of love and constancy;
For brightest gleams in light-blue eyes,
Affection's noblest fervency.

DR. FRANKLIN'S LESSON FROM DR. MATHER.

The celebrated Dr. Franklin once received a very useful lesson from the excellent Dr. Cotton Mather, which he thus relates in a letter to his son, Dr. Samuel Mather, dated Passy, May 12, 1781: —"The last time I saw your father, was in 1724. On taking my leave, he showed me a shorter way out of the house, through a narrow passage, which was crossed by a beam over head. We were still talking as I withdrew, he accompanying me behind, and I turning towards him; when he said hastily, 'Stoop! stoop!' I did not understand him till I felt my head hit against the beam. He was a man who never missed an occasion of giving instruction; and upon this he said to me, —'You are young, and have the world before you. Stoop as you go through it, and you will miss many hard thumps.' This advice, thus beat into my head, has frequently been of use to me: and I often think of it, when I see pride mortified, and misfortunes brought upon people by carrying their heads too high."

THE REFORMED AMERICAN PLANTER.

A wealthy planter in Virginia, who had a great number of slaves, found one of them reading a Bible, and reproved him for neglect of his work, saying there was time enough on Sundays for reading the Bible, and that on other days he ought to be in the tobacco-house. The slave repeated the offence, and he ordered him to be whipped. Going near the place of punishment soon after its infliction, curiosity led him to listen to a voice engaged in prayer; and he heard the poor black implore the Almighty to forgive the injustice of his master, to touch his heart with a sense of his sin, and to make him a good Christian. Struck with remorse, he made an immediate change in his life, which had been careless and dissipated; burnt his profane books and cards, liberated all his slaves, and appeared now to study how to render his wealth and talents useful to others.

THE CRUCIFIXION.

I ask'd the heav'ns, "What foe to God hath done
This unexampled deed?" The heav'ns exclaim'd,
"'Twas man; and we in horror snatch'd the sun
From such a spectacle of guilt and shame."
I ask'd the sea. The sea in fury boil'd,
And answer'd with his voice of storms, "'Twas man;
My waves in panic at his crime recoil'd,
Disclosed th' abyss, and from the centre ran."
I ask'd the earth, the earth replied, aghast,
"'Twas man; and such strange pangs my bosom rent,
That still I groan and shudder at the past."
To man, gay, smiling, thoughtless man, I went,
And ask'd him next. He turn'd a scornful eye,
Shook his proud head, and deign'd me no reply.

Montgomery.

PETER THE GREAT AND THE GOVERNOR OF OLOUEZ.

Peter the Great of Russia frequently surprised the magistrates by his unexpected presence in the cities of the empire. Having arrived without previous notice at Olouez, he went first to the regency, and inquired of the governor how many suits there were depending in the court of chancery. "None, Sire," replied the governor. "How happens that?" "I endeavour to prevent law suits, and conciliate the parties; I act in such a manner, that no traces of difference remain on the archives: if I am wrong, your indulgence will excuse me." "I wish," replied the Czar, that all governors would act upon your principles. Go on: God and your Sovereign are equally satisfied."

DONATIONS OF SIXTEEN HUNDRED POUNDS.

We are delighted to record the liberality of some anonymous Christian friend; who, in addition to the four hundred pounds given to the Home Missionary Society on June 25, gave on the same day the same sum to each of the following: the British and Foreign Bible Society; the Religious Tract Society; and the London Missionary Society.

At the Monthly Lecture, delivered by Dr. Smith, at Dr. Collyer's chapel, Peckham, on Thursday, July 4, our humble work was noticed in terms of high approbation. The subject of the admirable Lecture was, "Moral Reform essential to National Prosperity;" and, as a means of promoting that great object, the Christian's Penny Magazine was recommended. To have the commendation of such a man as the Theological tutor of Homerton College, and author of the "Scripture Testimony to the Messiah," we consider no mean praise.

The Christian's Penny Magazine may be delivered weekl in the Towns of the United Kingdom, by those Booksellers an Newsmen to whom Subscribers address their orders. Being un stamped, it cannot be transmitted by post as a newspape But for the convenience of our country friends and others, wh cannot obtain the publication weekly, it will be published ever four weeks in parts, each including four numbers; excepting i June and December, in each of which a part will be publishe containing six numbers. No extra charge will be made for th wrapper: so that the whole annual expense of the twelve part will be 4*s.* 4*d.*

CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION SOCIETY.

The metropolis of Great Britain is the "Fountain of Intelligence to the World." No one who is possessed of information which renders him capable of passing a judgment, will dispute the accuracy of this position; and men of literature the most erudite, of science the most profound, and of art the most improved, are to be found among its accomplished sons. Knowledge, however, is not limited in its possession to London: Manchester, Glasgow, Liverpool, Birmingham, Bristol, Leeds, Sheffield, and other populous towns of Great Britain, if not possessed of the most learned bodies, have been distinguished by their elegant artists, their ingenious mechanics, and their skilful engineers.

Knowledge, and science, and art, are considered by many the glory of London, and of our great provincial cities; and we may reasonably make our boast of them, as they contribute to the greatness of our country: they bring prosperity and security to the empire. But Christian patriots contemplate our vast metropolis and our populous towns with deep commiseration, beholding the prodigious increase of their inhabitants, and the inadequate provision for their religious instruction. London, it is computed, contained about 500,000 inhabitants two centuries ago, while it numbered almost 200 places of worship belonging to the established church, and no dissenters were allowed. Eighty-nine churches were destroyed in the conflagration of 1666: many of them were rebuilt, and 50 new churches were erected in the reign of Queen Anne. While the population has been so rapidly increasing, a correspondent attention has not been paid to the religious necessities of the inhabitants, including the generous efforts of the dissenters. From the "Picture of London" in 1803, we learn there were at the beginning of the century, 344 places of worship in the metropolis, of which 116 were episcopal churches, and 62 chapels of ease. Since that period the places of worship belonging to the established church have been increased to about 200, and those of other denominations, including Roman Catholics and Jews, to rather more. But the population has arisen to 1,500,000! What an affecting disproportion between the multitudes of immortal beings, and the accommodation for religious instruction! Believers in the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures cannot but be deeply affected with the consideration, that more than a MILLION of the inhabitants of our metropolis, are destitute of the public means of Christian instruction!

Under this affecting conviction of the danger of the community from infidelity and immorality, in 1825, "THE CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION SOCIETY" was formed. It originated with some benevolent dissenting ministers in London, who deeply felt the degradation of thousands of its inhabitants. This society, therefore, was formed by the principal dissenters, to carry forward an organized system of visiting the lanes, and courts, and wretched districts of the metropolis, to establish prayer meetings, Sunday schools, and preaching places, and especially to distribute religious tracts by weekly loans. Many of the congregations in London have adopted the plans of this society, and the most signal tokens of the Divine blessing have attended these labours of love and visits of mercy. The report for the year ending May 1831, states, that "at the present time there are sixty-five associations, which engage the benevolent attention of 1,173 gratuitous visitors, who have during the past year visited 31,591 families. So that by your voluntary agency alone, religious tracts and books are now placed within the reach of at least 150,000 individuals" "Immediately connected with the numerous associations are to be found 93 stations for reading the Scriptures and prayer." Besides a "City Missionary," whose labours are directed to the preservation of the whole system in operation, many of the most eminent ministers in the metropolis have co-operated in "Lectures to Mechanics," on the most important subjects. Drs. Bennett and J. P. Smith, deserve the thanks of the nation for their popular and excellent publications against Infidelity, with its ignorance, impudence, and immorality.

"Tent Preaching" is an important branch of this Society's operations. The Tents formerly used by the Home Missionary Society have been transferred to the Christian Instruction Society, by which means thousands of wandering violators of the sabbath have heard the gospel of Christ, in the several vicinities of London: many, we have reason to believe, to the salvation of their souls.

Valuable tracts, &c., are published by this Society, whose plans have been adopted in many cities and towns, not only in England, but in Ireland and Scotland. Its expenditure for the year ending May, 1832, was 1,187*l*. 12*s*. 4*d*.

Similar institutions have been formed by several worthy clergymen of the church of England: some in unison with the dissenters, and others in their own connections: but their canon laws will not allow "prayer meetings" and "lay preachings." Still the most beneficial results have followed their operations in their "District Visiting Society," formed in 1829, and adopted in many of our large towns and vicinities.

Surely the time is come when sectarian bigotry and party interests should be destroyed, or overlooked, in the adoption of those simple, broad, protestant, and scriptural principles, which are indispensable to the evangelization of our countrymen, and the salvation of our nation from the prevalence of intemperance, immorality, and crime. Magistrates and judges of the land are interested in the progress and influence of Christian Instruction Societies; and we cannot but rejoice that Lord Henley expressed himself honoured in being the chairman of the last anniversary of the Christian Instruction Society in London.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ADAM.

Sect. III.—The Piety of Adam.

We are not indulged with any inspired record of the rational, pious, and edifying conversations between our first parents. The sabbath was sanctified for their rest and happiness; and Adam and Eve observed it in special exercises of sacred worship. Every day, doubtless, as the evening drew near, they would give expression to their sentiments of habitual piety, and offer up their sincere acknowledgments to the gracious Author of their being and blessedness, in heartfelt thanksgiving and prayer. Milton has attempted a description of their devotional approaches to the throne of the heavenly grace. He represents Adam addressing his lovely Eve thus:—

" ———————— 'Fair consort, th' hour
Of night, and all things now retir'd to rest,
Mind us of like repose ————————
—— ———— other creatures all day long
Rove idle, unemploy'd, and less need rest;
Man hath his daily work of body or mind
Appointed, which declares his dignity,
And the regard of Heav'n on all his ways;
Meanwhile, as nature wills, night bids us rest.'
To whom thus Eve, with perfect beauty adorn'd.
'My author and disposer, what thou bidst
Unargu'd I obey: so God ordains.'
Thus talking, hand in hand alone they pass'd
On to their blissful bow'r: ————————
———————————— both stood,
Both turn'd, and under open sky ador'd
The God that made both sky, air, earth, and heav'n,
Which they beheld, the moon's resplendent globe,
And starry pole: 'Thou also mad'st the night,
Maker Omnipotent! and thou the day,
Which we in our appointed work employ'd
Have finish'd, happy in our mutual help,
And mutual love, the crown of all our bliss
Ordain'd by Thee; and this delicious place,
For us too large, where thy abundance wants
Partakers, and uncropt falls to the ground.
But thou hast promis'd from us two a race
To fill the earth, who shall with us extol
Thy goodness infinite, both when we wake,
And when we seek, as now, thy gift of sleep.'"

Paradise Lost.

In this rational, devout, and elevated temper of mind, our first parents, in blissful innocence, worshipped their Creator, in the evening of the well-spent day. Refreshing sleep having been enjoyed by them, they awake, and rise with the early dawn, to pay their grateful homage to the Lord their God, the bounteous giver of all their blessings.

"Lowly they bow'd adoring, and began
Their orisons, each morning duly paid
In various style; ————————
———————— they thus began:
'These are thy glorious works, Parent of good
Almighty, thine this universal frame,
Thus wondrous fair; Thyself how wondrous then!
Unspeakable, who sitt'st above these heav'ns,
To us invisible, or dimly seen
In these thy lowest works; yet these declare
Thy goodness beyond thought, and pow'r divine.
Speak ye who best can tell, ye sons of light,
Angels; for ye behold Him, and with songs
And choral symphonies, day without night,
Circling his throne rejoicing; ye in heaven,
On earth join all ye creatures to extol
Him first, Him last, Him midst, and without end.
Ye that in waters glide, and ye that walk
The earth, and stately tread, or lowly creep,
Witness if I be silent morn or even,
To hill, or valley, fountain, or fresh shade,
Made vocal by my song, and taught his praise.
Hail, universal Lord! be bounteous still
To give us only good!'"

Paradise Lost.

This, indeed, is the language of our great poet: but in such terms most certainly was the elevated piety of Adam expressed, on the ordinary days of the week, in Paradise. But in what sublime and lofty strains of devotion the sabbath was celebrated, we shall not know, until we shall hear him describe it to his redeemed descendants in the Paradise of God in heaven.

PEDESTRIAN EXPLOITS OF THE AMERICAN INDIANS.

The Indians are very strong-limbed, and capable of enduring great fatigue. Their every-day pedestrian feats are truly astonishing. Guides perform a long journey at the rate of twenty or twenty-five leagues a day. Their usual pace is a jog trot. They take short steps, and carry their feet close to the ground. They go up and down mountain-sides quicker than a mule; and horsemen, whom they accompany as guides, have frequently occasion to call after them, to request them to slacken their pace. A battalion, eight hundred strong, has been known to march thirteen or fourteen leagues in one day, without leaving more than ten or a dozen stragglers on the road. The Indian subsists on a very small quantity of the simplest food. A leathern pouch containing coca, suspended from his neck, is worn next the breast. A handful or two of roasted maize is tied up in one corner of his poncho, and, in general, these are the only provisions for a very long day's journey.

ON LOCAL ATTACHMENTS.

The instinct with which man is pre-eminently endued, the most beautiful, the most moral of instincts, is the love of country.. If this law were not maintained by a never-ceasing miracle, all mankind would crowd together into the temperate zones, leaving the rest of the globe deserted. To prevent this calamity, Providence has affixed the feet of each individual to his native soil by an invincible magnet, so that neither the ices of Greenland nor the burning sands of Africa are destitute of inhabitants. Nay, farther, it is worthy of remark, that the more sterile the soil, and the more rude the climate of the country, or what is nearly analogous, the greater the injustice, and the more severe the persecution we have suffered in that country, the more strongly we are attached to it. Oh! strange and sublime effect, that misery should create attachment, and that those who have lost but a cottage should most feelingly regret the paternal habitation: every thing tends to confirm the truth of this. A savage is more powerfully attached to his hut than to the palace of a prince; and the mountaineer is more delighted with his native rocks than with the golden corn-fields of the plain. Ask a Scotch highlander if he would exchange his lot with the first potentate of the earth. When far removed from his beloved mountains, he carries with him their remembrance wherever he goes, he sighs for his flocks, his torrents, and his clouds. It is a mountain-plant which must be rooted among rocks; it cannot thrive unless it is battered by the winds and the rain; in the soil, the shelter, and the sunshine of the plain, it soon droops and dies. And who can be more happy than the Esquimaux in his inhospitable country? What to him are all the flowers of our climates, compared to the snows of Labrador, and all our palaces to his smoky cabin: he embarks in spring with his wife and family on a fragment of floating ice—hurried along by the currents he advances into the open sea on this throne of the god of tempests, amid tempestuous whirlwinds and driving snows he presses to his heart the wife whom God has given him, and finds with her unknown joys in this mixture of perils and of pleasures. Thus, in attaching us to our native land, Providence justifies its dealings towards us, and we have a thousand and a thousand reasons for loving our country. The Arab never forgets the well of the camels, the antelope, and the horse, the companion of his journeys in his native deserts. The Negro never ceases to remember his cottage, his banana, and the track of the tiger and of the elephant in his native lands.

It is related that an English sailor boy had conceived such an attachment to the ship in which he was born, that he could never be induced to leave her for a single moment: the greatest punishment the captain could inflict, was to threaten to send him ashore; on these occasions he would run with loud cries and conceal himself in the hold. What inspired the little mariner with so extraordinary an affection for a plank?—was it a certain moral conformity between the destinies of man and those of a ship? or perhaps he found a pleasure in concentrating his joys and his sorrows in what we may justly denominate his cradle? An unknown passenger on the ocean of life, he beheld whole seas placed between him and our afflictions, happy in only viewing from a distance the melancholy shores of the world.

Among civilized nations the love of country has performed prodigies. In the plans of God there is always an end; he has grounded upon nature this affection for the place of our nativity; the animal partakes in a certain degree of this instinct with man; but man carries it farther, and transforms into a virtue what was only a sentiment of universal conformity: thus the physical and moral laws of the universe are linked together in an admirable chain. We even doubt whether it be possible to possess one genuine virtue, one real talent, without the love of country. In war, this passion performs prodigies; in literature it produced a Homer and a Virgil.

But it is the Christian religion which has imparted to the love of country its proper measure and its real beauty. This sentiment produced armies among the ancients, because it was carried to excess. Christianity has made it a principal love, and not an exclusive love; it enjoins us above all things to be just; it commands us to cherish the whole family of Adam, since we ourselves belong to it, though our countrymen have the first claim to our attachment. This morality was unknown before the mission of the Christian Legislator, who has been unjustly accused of attempting to extirpate the passions. God destroys not his own work: the gospel is not the death of the heart, but its rule. It is to our sentiments, what taste is to the fine arts—it retrenches all that is exaggerated and false, it leaves us all that is fair, good, and true.

It is when we are at a distance from our country, that we feel the full force of the affection which attaches us to it—a confirmation of which is, the great value in which we estimate an object of perhaps little intrinsic worth, but which comes from our native land and has accompanied us into exile. The soul seems to cherish even the inanimate things which have shared our destiny—the wounds of the soul leave their impression upon whatever they touch. If it were to be asked, what are then those powerful ties by which we are bound to the place of our nativity—those ties which are such a strong proof of the goodness of God, and consequently of his existence? we confess we should be at a loss for a reply. It is perhaps the smile of a mother, of a father, of a sister—it is perhaps the recollection of the old preceptor who instructed us, and of the young companions of our childhood—it is circumstances the most simple—the village clock which appeared above the trees—the churchyard yew—the Gothic tomb.

Yet the insignificance of these means demonstrates so much more clearly the reality of a Providence, as they could not possibly be the source of great patriotic virtues, unless by the ordination of the Almighty himself.—Chateaubriand.

THE KENTISH HUSBANDMAN.

Mr. Editor,

If the following sketch of a character, not, I trust, very uncommon amongst our peasantry, should suit your Magazine, it is at your service, with my best wishes.

The Kentish Husbandman, for so I shall call him, is one of the most truly distinguished individuals amongst us. Not indeed for wealth, for he possesses neither houses, nor land, nor funded property: nor for honorary title or rank, for he is a daily labourer: nor yet for literary acquirements, for he can neither write nor read! He is not poor, for "contentment is wealth;" and he evidently possesses that which infinite wisdom commends in saying, "Godliness with contentment is great gain." (1 Tim. vi, 6.) He is indeed to be considered, according to the inspired decision, "poor in this world, rich in faith, and an heir of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him." (James ii, 5.)

The Kentish Husbandman is not an ignorant, though an unlearned man; for he is an acute observer of men and things, and would bear a comparison with the character of the wise peasant, as drawn by Mr. Gay, the poet, in his celebrated fiction of the Shepherd and the Philosopher. But this is the inferior portion of his experimental knowledge: he has "known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make him wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. iii, 15), and the word of the Lord appears to "dwell in him richly in all wisdom." (Col. iii.)

In person, the Kentish Husbandman is rather above the ordinary size, athletic and robust: of habits the most temperate and industrious; and of manners the most modest, simple, and obliging. He appears to be nearly seventy years of age, more than forty of which he has lived in our village; he is well known to our most ancient and respectable families; and in no single instance, as I have yet learnt, has any one been able, for many years, to make a single reflection to the disadvantage of his moral character. I never had a lengthened interview with him till a short time ago, on his gradual recovery from an illness, by an attack of fever, of which I had not at first heard. Being solicitous to ascertain the state of his mind during his illness, in this respect, I was somewhat particular in my inquiries. His statements were instructive, rational, and scriptural; equally remote from fanatical enthusiasm, and from licentious presumption. Among other things, he observed, that at one period of his illness, he thought he should soon die; and, reflecting upon his past life, a long black catalogue of sins appeared, rising to his condemnation before a just and holy God. For a while, his spirit sunk within him: but, recollecting the words of the apostle John, the peaceful influence of heaven tranquillized his inmost soul. He repeated the words,—"If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins: the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." (1 John i, 7, 21, 22.) Realizing the encouraging doctrine of these passages, he remarked, "I have not the least fear or care, either for life or death."

The good opinion, which I had been led to entertain of this advanced believer, was not a little strengthened by our familiar intercourse. From his many judicious observations, I could not but reflect with admiration upon our Lord's assurance, in reference to the gracious promise in Isaiah, "And they shall be taught of God." (John vi.) Though unable to read, which, as he informed me, for a short time he attempted to correct, about ten years ago, yet he exercises his memory, in "comparing spiritual things with spiritual," and his improvement in divine knowledge corresponds with such an employment of his mind. The case supposed by Bishop Horsley is not exactly the same, it refers to one able to read: yet his understanding of the word of God reminded me of some passages in a volume of that Prelate's sermons. He says, "It is incredible to any one, who has not in some degree made the experiment, what a proficiency may be made in that knowledge, which maketh wise unto salvation, by studying the Scriptures in this manner*, without any other commentary or exposition than what the different parts of the sacred volume mutually furnish for each other. Let him† study them in the manner I recommend; and let him never cease to pray for the illumination of that Spirit, by which these books were dictated; and the whole compass of abstruse philosophy, and recondite history, shall furnish no argument with which the perverse will of man shall be able to shake this learned Christian's faith‡."

Scarcely any language could be more judicious, or theologically accurate, than the remarks which this learned Christian made, upon several of the mos portant and peculiar doctrines of the gospel.

THOUGHTS OF HOME, IN INDIA.

BY THE REV. J. LAWSON, MISSIONARY.

O let them go, fair golden dreams
Of woodland trees and hanging streams,
And fields to memory dear!
O let them go—blest thoughts, away!
Ye visions of an infant's day,
Impress'd so bright and clear!

I call you not, O long lov'd sweets!
Fresh-budding in your mild retreats,
Where once I saw ye smile:
I call you not; but ye have power
To steal upon the midnight hour,
My sadness to beguile.

No more intrude, ye fairest forms
Of England's fields without her storms,
My dreams no more enchant;
Nor let pale cowslips beam to view,
Knotted with bells of tenderest blue,
And the wan primrose plant.

Yet stay awhile, though but in dreams,
Ye bowing trees, ye splashing streams,
Through fields to memory dear:
Yet stay awhile, and with your smile
At midnight hour my thoughts beguile,
And charm my musings here.

For if in dreams ye charm the sense,
And bless with simplest recompense
One who hath left his HOME;
Then stay awhile, ye fairy flowers,
Come with my childhood's loveliest hours,
And with your sunshine come!

profound research, in a volume of the "Lie grossest part, 25 or 26 feet; the tail is t long, and 2½ feet in circumference. The nce of the legs is about 6 feet. The trunk hant is about 8 feet long and 5½ feet in cir-near the mouth. These are of the largest of that majestic animal: but he differs in erent countries. At first view, this creature the spectator an enormous mass of flesh that ely animated. Its eyes are small in proporsize of the head, and the muzzle is very dif-

o that of any other quadruped: it is nothing gin of a long trunk which hangs between the usks: the mouth appears behind the trunk, s in place of an upper lip, and the undertes in a point, which from its flexibility and ominated a finger. The feet are short, msy, and distinguishable only by the toes.
The trunk is, properly speaking, the nose extended, and terminated by a couple of nostrils. The elephant can move the trunk in all directions: he can extend or shorten it at pleasure, without altering the diameters of the two canals within. By this means respiration is not interrupted, whatever be the situation of the trunk, and the water is allowed to remain till the animal chooses to throw it out by an expiration. It is by this organ that the animal lays hold of food or other substances; which he manages with as much dexterity as a man does his hand, taking up grains of corn, or the smallest piles of grass, and conveying them to his mouth.

"The East India Company's standard, for serviceable elephants, is 7 feet and upwards, measured at the shoulder, in the same manner that horses are measured. The height of a living elephant is exceedingly deceptive, even to those who are most accustomed to the animal. Mr. Corn measured a celebrated elephant of the Nabob of Dacca, which was generally stated to be 14 feet high, and which he considered to be 12; it was found not to exceed 10 feet. The elephants of Hindostan are however the smallest of the Asiatic species. Those from Pegu and Ava are much larger; and the skeleton of the elephant at the Museum at Petersburgh, which was sent to the Czar Peter by the King of Persia, measures 16¼ feet in height." "The African species is generally larger than the Indian. Mr. Pringle informs us, that he met with an enormous bull elephant, (the Hottentots called him 'a big terrible fellow, plenty, plenty big') which two engineer officers agreed was 14 feet high. Major Denham, on his expedition to the (lake) Tchad, fell in with elephants which he guessed to be 16 feet in height; but one which was killed in his presence, and which he describes as an immense fellow, measured 9 feet 6 inches from the foot to the hip-bone, and 3 feet from the hip-bone to the back, making a height of 12 feet 6 inches." Such are some of the notices of this enormous creature.

2. Where found. The Indian Elephant is found in all the countries of Southern Asia; that is, in Cochin China; in the kingdoms of Siam, Pegu, and Ava; in Hindostan, and the adjacent islands, particularly in Ceylon. The African Elephant inhabits the south and west of Africa, from the rivers Niger and Senegal to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence through the centre of the country by Lake Tchad eastward to Ethiopia.

3. Number of Elephants. From the immense quantity of food consumed and destroyed by a single elephant, we might imagine that there could be but few in existence; and probably there are but few compared with their number in former ages. Still they are said to swarm in some parts of Central Africa, in the luxuriant swamps and prairies near to the celebrated rivers above mentioned, so that the negroes are obliged to make their habitations under ground. On the banks of those rivers, as Mr. Southey beautifully describes,

> "Trampling his path through wood and brake,
> And canes, which crackling, fall before his way,
> And tassel-grass, whose silvery feathers play
> O'ertopping the young trees,
> On comes the ELEPHANT, to slake
> His thirst at noon, in yon pellucid springs.
> Lo! from his trunk upturn'd, aloft he flings
> The grateful shower: and now
> Plucking the broad-leav'd bough
> Of yonder plume, with waving motion slow,
> Fanning the languid air,
> He waves it to and fro.
> CURSE OF KEHAMA.

The entertaining volume before mentioned observes, "immense numbers still ranging over the uncultivated portions of India and Africa, offer one of the many wonderful examples of the care with which the maintenance of every living thing is provided for. Destroying as much vegetable food as he consumes, by the broad feet which sustain his prodigious weight, and unfitted to endure any long privations, as the camel does, the elephant is the natural inhabitant of those regions, where there is a wild luxuriousness of vegetation. Civilization, partial as it is in Africa, is driving the elephant farther and farther from the haunts of men; but they are still seen by travellers in great numbers. In his journey from Mourzouk to Kouka, in Bornou, Major Denham came upon elephants' footmarks, of an immense size, and only a few hours old. 'Whole trees were broken down where they had fed; and where they had reposed their ponderous bodies, young trees, shrubs, and underwood had been crushed beneath their weight.' Four days after, he saw a herd in grounds annually overflowed by the waters of a lake, where the coarse grass is twice the height of a man. 'They seemed to cover the face of the country.'"

Mr. Rose, an officer of engineers, who recently accompanied some elephant hunters in South Africa, was told by an experienced hunter, that he had seen as many as 3,000 in a troop, on the bank of the Fish river; and that he and his Hottentots had killed eight hundred in twenty months.

Mr. Pringle has favoured us with a description of a herd of wild elephants, presenting a vivid picture of a scene, which must be one of the most remarkable that can be presented to the eye in the deep solitudes of a tropical wilderness:—

"A herd of elephants, browsing in majestic tranquillity amidst the wild magnificence of an African landscape, is a very noble sight, and one of which I shall never forget the impression. It is difficult to convey in a brief notice an adequate idea of such a scene. During my residence on the eastern frontier of the Cape Colony, I accompanied a party of English officers on a little exploratory excursion, into a tract of country then termed the Neutral Territory, immediately joining to the location of the Scottish settlers at Bavian's river. This territory, which comprises an irregular area of about 2,000,000 of acres, had remained for several years entirely without inhabitants; for its native possessors, the Caffres and Ghonaquas, had been expelled from it in 1819 by the colonial forces, and no other permanent inhabitants had yet been allowed to occupy it. The colonists were even forbidden to hunt in it under severe penalties; and, in consequence of this, the wild animals had resorted thither in considerable numbers. During our first day's journey, although we saw many herds of large game, such as quaghas, gnoos, hartebeests, koodoos, with a variety of the smaller antelopes, there was no appearance of elephants: but in the course of the second day, as we pursued our route down the valley of the Koonap river, we became aware that a numerous troop of these gigantic animals had recently preceded us. Foot prints of all dimensions, from eight to fifteen inches in diameter, were everywhere visible. Among the groves of mimosa trees, which were thinly sprinkled over the grassy meadows along the river margins, the traces of elephants were not less apparent. Immense numbers of these trees had been torn out of the ground, to enable the animals to browse at their ease on the soft and juicy roots, which form a favourite part of their food. While we were admiring these and other indications of the elephant's strength and sagacity, we suddenly found ourselves in the midst of a numerous herd of these animals. None of them, however, were very close upon us; but they were seen scattered in little clumps over the bottom and sides of a valley two or three miles in length; some browsing on the succulent spekboom (Postulacaria afra) which clothed the skirts of the hills on either side; others at work among the mimosa trees sprinkled over the low and grassy savannah. As we proceeded cautiously onward, and some of these parties came more distinctly into view (consisting, apparently, in many instances, of separate families, the males, the females, and the young of different sizes), the gigantic magnitude of the leaders became more and more striking. The calm and stately tranquillity of their deportment, too, was remarkable: though we were a band of about a dozen horsemen, including our Hottentot attendants, they seemed either not to observe, or altogether to disregard our march down the valley."

Mahmood of Ghinzi, who invaded Hindostan in A. D. 1024, had 1,300 elephants in his army. When Timour, or Tamerlane, about A. D. 1400, built his great mosque at Samarcand, ninety-five elephants were engaged in drawing the stones. As recently as A D. 1794, the Nabob of Oude went upon a hunting expedition with 1,000 elephants. At Vizier Ally's wedding, in 1795, the procession was grand beyond conception; it consisted of about 1,200 elephants, richly caparisoned, drawn up in a regular line like a regiment of soldiers. In 1827, there were imported 364,784 lbs. of ivory, equal to 6,080 tusks at 60 lbs. each; to procure which, assuming that every elephant slain had tusks, there must have been slaughtered at least 3,040 of these gigantic animals: but the actual slaughter was probably double, or treble, as all have not tusks, and some of them but small ones.

"William Clarke, which served the Mogul divers years in his wars, saith, that he hath seen in one army 20,000 elephants, whereof 4,000 for war; the rest, females for burthens, young, &c." "Captain Hawkins, who was at Agra in 1607, says that Jehanghir had 12,000 elephants."

4. The Age of Elephants. In general Providence has ordained that animals should live to an age corresponding to the magnitude of their bodies; the elephant therefore must be long-lived. The Romans, in the time of Gordian, in the spirit of poetical exaggeration, chose an elephant for the symbol of eternity. Elephants have been known in India which have been in captivity one hundred and fifty years; and it is believed that this creature will live at least four hundred years.

We pass over the prodigious tusks of the elephant, as we purpose devoting an article in our next to the subject of IVORY.

THE PROGRESS OF AMERICA

DURING THE LAST CENTURY.

No country upon earth ever made advances in population, wealth, and religion, in a degree equal to America. Its people are our brethren; of the same kindred, language, and Protestant Christianity: we cannot but rejoice therefore in their prosperity.

We have received a copy of the most eloquent "Oration delivered before the Legislature of Massachusetts at their request, on the hundreth anniversary of the birth of George Washington," by the Hon. Francis C. Gray, Feb. 22, 1832.

From this instructive oration we transcribe the following paragraphs, exhibiting the amazing progress of that wonderful country during the last century.

"From the elevated position we now occupy, let us turn our eyes back on the history of the past century, to observe the progress of America since the birth of Washington, and the influence of his life and character on the destinies of his country and of mankind. What was his country? Eleven small British colonies (for Georgia had then no existence, and Delaware no separate name), were scattered along the shores of the Atlantic, within the present limits of the United States. They extended inland only to a short distance, their remotest outposts hardly reaching the foot of the Alleghany Mountains. Behind them was an unexplored wilderness, from the recesses of which, savage tribes, trained to war and plunder, were ever ready, at the instigation of an ambitious chief, or the temptation of a favourable opportunity, to spring forth on their inhabitants, without warning and without mercy. On the north and on the south were the colonies of France and Spain, both ancient rivals of Great Britain, and, according to the universal opinion of that age, its natural as well as hereditary enemies; so that every contest between those nations brought war home to the doors of the colonists, who thus suffered from all the intrigue of European policy." From a "Report of the Lords of Trade," to which the eloquent orator refers, he says, "it is dated exactly one week before the event we commemorate. From this it appears that wool, flax, and hemp were raised in small quantities by the farmers, and wrought into coarse cloth and ropes, in their own dwellings, for their own use. Besides these household manufactures, and a number of establishments for refining sugar, for distilling, and for tanning, there were several forges and furnaces for making iron, and in all America, one slitting mill, one nail mill, and one paper mill, the last of which produced paper enough to sell for nearly a thousand dollars a year. The inhabitants of the northern colonies also had recently began to make hats, and had even exported some, of which great complaints were made by the hatters of London, as interfering with their business. Parliament 'diverting the thoughts of the colonists' from manufacturing and exporting the produce of their soil, enacted under severe penalties, that neither hats nor wool, nor any manufactures of wool produced in America, should be water-borne, or laden in any vehicle or on any animal for transportation, even within the colonies themselves; and that every slitting mill and nail mill should be abated as a common nuisance.

"Only two of the colonies had the right of choosing their own chief magistrates. The others had governors appointed in England, either by the crown or by the proprietors of the colony, who possessed also respectively the right to annul, within a limited time, any laws passed by the Colonial Assemblies. The colonies were not bound together by any other tie than their common allegiance to the British crown.

"Such was America; a number of feeble, scattered colonies, surrounded by enemies, disunited, dependent. Possessing, indeed, in its habits of industry and enterprize, in its domestic, civil, literary, and religious institutions, the germs of its subsequent greatness, but faintly developed; crushed beneath the oppressions of the colonial system, and in this part of the country still languishing under the influence of that connection of civil with ecclesiastical power, which is everywhere degrading to religion, and dangerous to liberty. Such was America! Look on it now. What do you behold? One great, united, powerful, prosperous, free people, without a master, without an enemy, without a rival. The Alleghanies, which were then your utmost limits, are now in the midst of your population; the vast region beyond them, at that time a wilderness, is crowded with villages, and towns, and cities, swarming with inhabitants, burthened with plenty; the Mississippi, whose origin and course were not then known, is now a common highway; and the still more remote territory, then unexplored, may I not say undiscovered, is now entirely subjected to your laws. Your manufactures, relieved from the monopoly of the colonial system, have extended with inconceivable rapidity; your commerce peoples the ocean; enterprize and industry in every pursuit are all unshackled; and under the protection of a free government and equal laws, the institutions then so feebly developed, have shot up, and spread abroad, and covered the whole land, and blossomed and brought forth fruit abundantly—the fruit of knowledge and virtue.

"But general expressions can give no idea of our progress. Fancy itself flags, and lingers, and halts behind the truth. Look only at our population. A hundred years ago, it did not exceed 700,000. At this day, it is more than 13,000,000. Consider, too, the difference between our progress in this respect, during the first half and the last half of the century just ended. The first fifty years added to the existing population 2,000,000, making in all nearly 3,000,000 of inhabitants in 1782. The last fifty years have added to that number more than 10,000,000. The whole shipping of America a century ago, was not 100,000 tons. At present, though the revolutionary war almost swept it from the ocean, and it suffered greatly in the last, it approaches 2,000,000 tons. In the whale fishery alone, 1,300 tons only of shipping were then employed, and it now gives occupation to 90,000 tons. Our whole exports and imports, which did not exceed one million sterling, have increased twenty-fold. There are no sufficient data for estimating our progress in other respects; but who can look around him without perceiving, that in domestic comfort, in internal improvements, in wealth, in knowledge, and in all the arts of life, it has been far more rapid even than in population or in trade; and that we have advanced with constantly accelerated speed during the whole period. It began with achieving the work of a century in a generation, and it seems to end with crowding the work of generations into single years."

REMARKABLE STREAM.

At the bottom of a wood belonging to W. Turton, Esq. of Knowlton in Flintshire, is a rill of water which empties itself into the river Dee; and when a person strides across it, he is in the kingdom of England, the principality of Wales, in the provinces of Canterbury and York, and the dioceses of Chester, Litchfield and Coventry, in the counties of Flint and Salop, in two townships, and in the ground of Mr. Turton and his neighbour.

OF STUDIES, BY LORD BACON.

Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability. The chief use for delight, is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in the judgment and disposition of business, for expert men can execute, and perhaps judge of particulars one by one; but the general counsels, and the plots and marshalling of affairs come best from those that are learned. To spend too much time in studies, is sloth; to use them too much for ornament, is affectation; to make judgment wholly by their rules, is the humour of a scholar: they perfect nature, and are perfected by experience: for natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study; and studies themselves do give forth directions too much at large, except they be bounded in by experience. Crafty men contemn studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them; for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them, and above them, won by observation. Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested; that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read, but not curiously; and some few to be read wholly and with diligence and attention. Some books also may be read by deputy, and extracts made of them by others; but that would only be in the less important arguments, and the meaner sort of books; else distilled books are, like common distilled waters, flashy things. Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man; and, therefore, if a man write little, he had need have a great memory: if he confer little, he had need have a present wit: and if he read little, he had need have much cunning to seem to know that he doth not. Histories make men wise: poets, witty: the mathematics, subtle: natural philosophy, deep: moral, grave: logic and rhetoric, able to contend: 'Abeunt studia in mores,' 'Studies pass into laws:' nay there is no stand or impediment in the wit, but may be wrought out by fit studies: like as diseases of the body may have appropriate exercises: bowling is good for the stone; shooting for the lungs and breast; gentle walking for the stomach; riding for the head, and the like: so if a man's wits be wandering, let him study the mathematics; for in demonstration, if his wit be called away never so little, he must begin again: if his wit be not apt to distinguish or find differences, let him study the schoolmen: if he be not apt to beat over matters, and to call upon one thing to prove and illustrate another, let him study the lawyers' cases: so every defect of the mind may have a special receipt.

HAIL.

To "rain hail," may appear to some superficial observers as an unphilosophical mode of expression; but nothing can be more correct. Drops of rain falling through a cold region of the atmosphere, are frozen and converted into hail; and thus the hail is produced by rain. The farther a hailstone falls, the larger it generally is; because, in its descent, meeting with innumerable particles of water, they become attached to it, are also frozen, and thus its bulk is continually increasing till it reaches the earth. When it begins to fall, it is rain; when it is falling it is converted into hail; thus it is literally true, that it rains hail.

A storm of hail fell near Liverpool, in Lancashire, in the year 1795, which greatly damaged the vegetation, broke windows, &c. &c. Many of the stones were five inches in circumference. Dr. Halley mentions a similar storm of hail in Lancashire, Cheshire, &c. in 1697, April 29, that for sixty miles in length and two miles in breadth did immense damage by splitting trees, killing fowls and all small animals, knocking down men and horses, &c. &c. Mezeray, in his history of France, says, that in Italy, in 1510, there was for some time a horrible darkness, thicker than that of night; after which the clouds broke into thunder and lightning, and there fell a shower of hail-stones, which destroyed all the beasts, birds, and even fish of the country. It was attended with a strong smell of sulphur, and the stones were of a bluish colour, some of them weighing one hundred pounds weight.—Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary.

A SAILOR'S ESCAPE FROM AN ALLIGATOR.

A sailor, named Campbell, on board a Guinea-man on the Congo, bathed in that river while in a state of intoxication. When he had swimmed some distance from the ship, some of the sailors on board discovered an alligator making towards him. His escape appeared impossible: but two shots were fired at the frightful monster, which however did not take effect. The report of the piece, and the noise on board the vessel, intimated to Campbell his perilous condition; and turning, he saw his enemy advancing with open jaws, which impelled him with his utmost strength and skill towards the shore. On approaching some canes and shrubs which covered the bank, closely pursued by the alligator, a ferocious tiger sprang towards him, at the instant the jaws of his first enemy were extended to seize him. At this awful moment Campbell was preserved: for the too eager tiger, by overleaping him, encountered the gripe of the amphibious monster. A conflict ensued between them, and the water was coloured with the blood of the tiger, whose efforts to tear the scaly covering of the alligator were unavailing; while the latter had also the advantage of keeping his adversary under water, by which the victory was soon obtained, and the tiger fell the victim. They both sank to the bottom, and the alligator was no more seen. Campbell was recovered, and instantly conveyed on board. His danger had made him sober, and the moment he leaped on deck, he fell on his knees, and returned thanks to Providence for his most remarkable preservation; and what is most worthy of observation, "from that moment to the time I am writing," says the narrator, "he has never been seen the least intoxicated, nor has he been heard to utter a single oath. If there ever was a reformed being in the universe, Campbell is the man."

The Christian's Penny Magazine may be delivered weekly in the Towns of the United Kingdom, by those Booksellers and Newsmen to whom Subscribers address their orders. Being unstamped, it cannot be transmitted by post as a newspaper. But for the convenience of our country friends and others, who cannot obtain the publication weekly, it will be published every four weeks in parts, each including four numbers; excepting in June and December, in each of which a part will be published containing six numbers. No extra charge will be made for the wrapper: so that the whole annual expense of the twelve parts will be 4s. 4*d*.

STATION OF THE CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY AT KERIKERÍ (FORMERLY CALLED KIDDEEKIDDEE) NEW ZEALAND.

THE CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

UNDER the title of a "Society for Missions to Africa and the East," the present CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY was first formed in the year 1800, by members of the Church of England, for the purpose of sending the Gospel to heathen lands. Since that time it has pleased God so to enlarge the means and bless the labours of the Society, that, under a more general name, it is now spreading eastward and westward, to bring Heathens, Mahomedans, and fallen, corrupted, misnamed Christians to a saving knowledge of the Redeemer. It is not so much the glory of this evangelical body, that mitres and coronets glitter on the brows of some of its distinguished supporters, as that it numbers on its list of friends, ministers of Christ the most distinguished for truly spiritual and practical piety; but its greatest commendation is its object—not to gain proselytes to a party—but, under God, the conversion of a ruined world!

The Society has now NINE different missions:—in Western Africa—in the Mediterranean—in Bengal—Madras—Bombay—and Ceylon—in Australasia—in the West Indies—and in North-West America.

It was in the year 1804 the first missionaries of the Church Missionary Society set foot in Western Africa. They began their labours in the Susoo country. This place they were compelled afterwards to abandon in consequence of the revival of the Slave Trade; and the Society now confines itself to the liberated Africans in the colony of Sierra Leone. The Directors of the Society find in Freetown and the surrounding districts a larger field than they have labourers to cultivate. The debilitating influence of the climate, as well as the state of the people, present great discouragements, and call for great self-denial, in carrying on the West Africa mission. About ten years ago, a powerful effect seemed to have been produced on the minds of many of the natives by the preaching of the Gospel, and though the hopes which were then excited, have in the event proved to have been too sanguine, there is still encouragement to be derived from it.

The islands of the Mediterranean and the countries surrounding it, present a very different but no less important missionary sphere. Malta, Greece, Asia Minor, Egypt, and Abyssinia, are occupied by the Society as their leading Mediterranean stations. In the head station at Malta, the work of translation is principally carried on, and from the Malta Church-mission Press numerous religious and useful works are issued in the Maltese, Italian, Modern Greek, and Arabic languages. At Syra the missionary has been enabled to continue the schools in the midst of the changes and desolations of distracted Greece. Smyrna has only recently been entered on as a missionary station. The accounts of the schools are encouraging. The only surviving missionary in Abyssinia—his fellow labourer having suddenly been cut off—has been surrounded by trials and dangers of no ordinary kind, while yet only entering on his arduous undertaking. Even here, however, there has been one token for good in Sebagadis the Prince of Tigrè, who, in the war which terminated his life, gave the enemy an advantage, by decidedly refusing to fight on a Sunday.

The Calcutta mission, in the Bengal presidency, was commenced in 1807. It must ever be considered a great blessing to India that missionaries have been sent there. The deeply-rooted superstitions of the people, the cruel and obscene character of their idolatries, and their generally licentious habits, while they are formidable obstacles to the spread of the simple truths of the Gospel among them, form a strong claim on the pity, the prayers, and the exertions of British Christians. It appears from the accounts received that the strongholds of idolatry have been much shaken, and a general preparatory work has begun among the people; while instances are not wanting of a real change produced on the heart and life of the benighted Hindoo.

In the Madras Presidency, or the South India Mission, particularly in the district of Tinnevelly, a considerable work has been carried on among the natives. It is not indeed safe to affirm that whole villages have become true converts to Christianity, but multitudes are brought to attend regularly the preaching of the Gospel. Two native clergymen are now actively engaged under the Society in this part of India:—some of the natives have died in the faith of Christ, and some are living as consistent Christians: lights, indeed, amidst a dark and degraded people.

In the West of India there are two clergymen, stationed at Bombay and Basseen, and a third is on his return thither. Schools, preaching, and translating, occupy the attention of the missionaries here. It does not appear that in this quarter the Society has hitherto been enabled to enlarge its operations. It is however in contemplation to put this mission on a more effective footing, and Ahmednuggur, containing a considerable Mahomedan as well as heathen population, has been fixed on as the head-quarters.

The island of Ceylon has afforded considerable encouragement to the Society. Here they have four principal stations, at Cotta, Kandy, Baddagame, and Nellore; and two presses employed in printing the Scriptures and religious and elementary works in Cingalese. Sir R. W. Horton has lately paid a visit to the Christian institution at Cotta, when the seminarists underwent an examination in his presence. His Excellency expressed himself highly gratified with the progress which the youths had made, as equally creditable to the teachers and the taught.

The mission to the aborigines of New Holland, of which his Majesty's government bears the main expense, has hardly yet been entered on. Two clergymen have gone out to seek the spiritual welfare of these people, who are described as some of the most degraded and brutalized on the face of the whole earth. We wish them God-speed, and think, when we turn to what is doing among the cannibal New Zealanders, that there is no reason to despair. New Zealand, which forms the chief scene of the Society's Australasian mission, appears indeed amply to repay the servants of God for all their toils and trials. The first settlers sent out by the Society, arrived in the Bay of Islands in 1814, and for some considerable time were without any great hopes of success: but now the published accounts (contrary to what is falsely stated in a work on New Zealand, lately reviewed in the Literary Gazette) give the most satisfactory statements of the effects of the Gospel on the wild New Zealander. The missionaries have gained a very general influence over the natives—war in more instances than one has been prevented—native converts have lived to maintain a Christian walk—some have begun to go among the tribes as missionaries to their own countrymen—and some have died, whose end has been peace. An interesting account of Betty, a New Zealand convert, has been lately published by the Tract Society; and in the Monthly Record published by the Society, there are some curious and striking letters from native candidates for baptism. There are now four stations of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand, viz. Rangihoua, Kerikerí, Paihía, and Waimate. The Kerikerí settlement, of which an engraving is given, was formed in 1819, on a river of that name which falls into the Bay of Islands on the west side of the northern island of New Zealand.

The West Indies Mission, in the dark regions of slavery, is carried on chiefly by schools for the Negroes. Schoolmasters are stationed on several of the Jamaica plantations, and in British Guiana.

North-West America is the last of the Society's missions. Two clergymen with their wives are settled on the Red River, in the Hudson's Bay Company's territories: three churches have been erected and filled with attentive hearers; and a youth from the Rocky Mountains has filled the hearts of the missionaries with gladness by his dying testimony.

In the NINE Missions of the Society are 48 stations, besides a considerable number of out-stations. These are supplied by 55 European, 2 country-born, and 2 native clergymen; 43 European lay-agents, employed as catechists, schoolmasters, and artisans, besides the wives of missionaries, and 477 native or country-born assistants. Many congregations are regularly brought together for public worship: in connection with these there are more than 1,270 communicants. The Society has 375 schools, containing 16,881 scholars. The missionaries who were first sent out, received their education in the Mission seminary at Berlin, which institution has since furnished several others: afterwards, when our own countrymen came forward to offer themselves as missionaries, they were placed for preparation under the care of pious clergymen in various parts of the country. At the present time, missionary students are received into the Islington Institution, which has been erected at the expense of the Society for that purpose: here they pass through a course of study, adapted to the country for which they are destined. The missionary institution at Bâsle in Switzerland has been, and still is, a valuable means of adding to the number of the Society's labourers. While, however, many have from time to time been raised up, who have devoted themselves to the work of the Lord; the number of labourers is still very disproportionate to the vast harvest. The Directors of the Society consider it a point of great importance to train up in the different countries a body of native teachers, to tell to their own people, under their own climate, and in their own tongue, "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" for this purpose seminaries have been established in Africa, India, and Ceylon, in which many hopeful youths are training: some are already in the field.

The income of the Church Missionary Society during the first year (1800-1) was 911*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*: last year (1831-2) it was 40,751*l.* 18*s.* Large as this last sum appears, it fell short of that received during the preceding year by 5800*l.*; and the expenditure of 1831-2 being 47,173*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*, the Society's income is not adequate efficiently to support its unavoidably increasing expenses. We doubt not that British Christians whose hearts are in this great undertaking will use every effort to prevent what will only be resorted to from absolute necessity—the abandonment or curtailment of any of the Society's missions.

The Scriptural doctrine of the need of Divine influence to render any means, or any efforts, effectual to the conversion of sinners, has always been held by the Committee. Hence, they not only make a point of imploring the Divine blessing whenever they meet to transact the business of the Society, but a prayer-meeting, open to any friends, is held every Saturday evening, at half-past six o'clock, at the Society's House, 14, Salisbury Square, on which occasion a portion of Scripture is expounded by one of the secretaries, or by some clerical friend.

It is gratifying to add, that the secretaries of this and other kindred institutions, of different denominations, hold a monthly meeting for the purpose of prayer and conversation in furtherance of their common object. Thus laying aside the little differences which now unhappily divide the Christian church, serving the same Master, and seeking the same end, they seem to breathe something of the atmosphere of that heavenly world,

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ADAM.

Sect. IV.—The Covenant of God with Adam, and his Fall by Transgression.

From the inspired record by Moses, we learn, that in the Paradise of Eden, there were two remarkable trees —" the Tree of Life, in the midst of the garden," and " the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil," Gen. ii, 9. The tree of life yielded the most delightful fruit of which Adam was permitted freely to eat; and it appears to have been as a kind of sacrament—a special symbol of the friendship of God, and an ordained pledge of present and future happiness, a promissory memorial of a glorious immortality. This favour he possessed as long as he continued innocent. The tree of knowledge of good and evil, was appointed as a test of Adam's obedience, to prove the reality of his dutiful affection to his Maker. It was accompanied with a positive prohibition: " thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Gen. ii, 17.

This trial of Adam was wisely adapted to serve as a means of proving, whether he would continue in a spirit of virtuous loyalty to the will of his Creator and Sovereign. And such obedient resignation is the true spirit of real and acceptable religion. The safety, the honour, and the happiness of our first parents, depended on their affectionate observance of the law of God, in which also were involved the interests of their posterity through all generations. But reasonable as was this command of God, and easy as was the service which he required, yet Adam wickedly transgressed. Eve was beguiled by the subtlety of the envious tempter, "that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan." Rev. xx, 2. "The woman being deceived, was in the transgression." 1 Tim. ii, 14. Adam was not deceived; he sinned with his eyes open to the guilt and danger, daringly violating the righteous commands of his bountiful Maker. Adam transgressed, as it is thought most probable, out of natural affection to his wife. Resolving that he would be a sharer of her fate, he plunged headlong into her dreadful ruin.

The account of this melancholy revolt is given by Moses, in a manner deeply affecting and instructive. "Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made. And he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden; but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die, for God doth know, that in the day ye eat thereof ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil. And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof and did eat." Gen. iii, 1—6.

In accomplishing his accursed object, the tempter first addressed himself to the principle of curiosity in the mind of Eve. This useful principle, curiosity, has been called, " the investigator of truth, the mother of invention, the prompter to rashness, the parent of danger, and the guide to ruin."

> " Forth reaching to the fruit, she pluck'd, she ate:
> Earth felt the wound; and nature from her seat,
> Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe,
> That all was lost."

The immediate effects of this criminal act, in the conduct of Eve, we cannot ascertain: but "she gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat" (Ver. 6.)

> " Against his better knowledge; not deceiv'd,
> But fondly overcome with female charm.
> Earth trembled from her entrails, as again
> In pangs; and nature gave a second groan;
> Sky lowr'd, and muttering thunder, some sad drops
> Wept, at completing of the mortal sin > Original."

"And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons." Gen. iii, 7.

That the serpent was only the instrument of some vile and malignant spirit is manifest; and by various intimations in the Holy Scriptures, we learn his hateful character, and part of his wicked history. It is supposed, that Eve was powerfully attracted by the resplendent beauty of the serpent, and that she imagined it was a ministering angel, when the creature addressed her in human language. An angel was indeed present, but it was an angel of darkness. It is evident that the evil spirit in the serpent was originally one of those glorious beings, who surround the throne of God their Creator: probably the chief of those "angels who kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation," and are now " reserved under chains of darkness unto the judgment of the great day." Jude 6.

There had been " war in heaven," and " the devil and his angels" were overcome, and driven from their lofty abode. Rev. xii, 7. The chief of these apostate spirits seems to have possessed the largest measure of malignity and subtlety, which led him to seek the ruin of the new, the beloved creature man. He was permitted, by Infinite Wisdom, to become his tempter, and partly to prevail with his deceitful wiles. Our Saviour refers to the temptation of Eve, in reproving the hypocritical Pharisees; and characterises their wickedness, as being acted under the influence of this evil spirit. " Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own; for he is a liar, and the father of it." John viii, 44.

As " a liar," and " the father of lies," he succeeded with Eve at first only by insinuating a doubt. " Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?" Nothing can be conceived more artful than this wily suggestion; it being effectual to excite her curiosity, and to lead her admiring eyes towards the forbidden fruit. With diabolical audacity the evil one asserts, " Ye shall not surely die." To gain more credit, he added an awful oath, and swears even by the Almighty! " For God doth know, that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened." O let the young especially beware of the subtle tempter influencing them by even a suggestion to disbelieve or question the truth of God's most holy word. Let them be suspicious of themselves, in departing from obedience to the divine precepts in the Bible.

By the same course it is in our times, by suggestions to disbelieve or disregard the Scriptures, that Satan "the god of this world blinds the minds of them who believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." 2 Cor. iv, 4. In this manner it is, by infidel delusion, that the devil, "the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience," secures ungodly men walking "in the lusts of the flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, the children of wrath." Eph. ii, 2, 3.

A life of sin or a life of holiness, makes men either the children of God or the children of the devil. "He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil." John iii, 8—10.

Adam and Eve soon began to be sensible of the sad effect of their transgression. Having lost their innocence, their peace of conscience perished, and shame, guilt, and terror took possession of their guilty minds. They eyes were indeed opened, as the evil spirit in the serpent had declared, but it was not to know any good: it was only to discover their present misery, their impending danger, and their merited eternal ruin. In confusion, they beheld their naked bodies. "They knew that they were naked." The nakedness of their bodies was emblematical of their souls stripped by sin of the robe of innocence, security, and honour.

"They sat them down to weep: not only tears
Rain'd at their eyes, but high winds worse within Began to rise, high passions, anger, hate,
Mistrust, suspicion, discord, and shook sore
Their inward state of mind; calm region once,
And full of peace, now tost and turbulent."

Thus we affectingly learn how "sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Rom. v, 12. From the declaration of the apostle in the fifth chapter to the Romans, we learn that all the miseries of mankind have been occasioned by the disobedience of Adam: like as children, in all ordinary cases of this life, are necessarily affected by the evil deeds of their parents. How cautious, therefore, ought we to be in all our proceedings, lest we involve others in calamities by our individual improprieties and sins. Let the young remember, that

"Sin has a thousand treacherous arts
To practise on the mind;
With flattering looks she tempts our hearts,
But leaves a sting behind.

She pleads for all the joy she brings,
And gives a fair pretence;
But cheats the soul of heavenly things,
And chains it down to sense.

So on a tree divinely fair
Grew the forbidden food;
Our mother took the poison there
And tainted all her blood."

Happy, however, for us, that the apostle was inspired to teach us, in the same chapter, the glorious method of deliverance from the guilt and misery of sin, by our Lord Jesus Christ, "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven." 1 Cor. xv, 45—47. "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." Rom. v, 19.

YOUTH.

How beautiful the scenes of youth
Awaken to the mind!
Scenes, like the summer ocean smooth,
Serener, fairer far, than truth
On earth shall ever find!

Time is a tyrant— months and years
Pass onward like the sea, that leaves
A solitary isle, which rears
Its passive bosom, and appears
Between the rolling waves.

In life there is no second spring—
The past is gone,—for ever gone!
We cannot check a moment's wing;
Pierce thro' futurity; or bring
The heart its vanish'd tone!

Resplendent as a summer sky,
When day-light lingers in the west,
To retrospection's loving eye
The blooming fields of childhood lie,
By fancy's finger drest.

A greener foliage decks the grove;
A brighter tint pervades the flower;
More azure seems the heaven above;
The earth a very bower of love,
And man within that bower!

And ever, when the storms of fate
Come darkening o'er the star of life,
We backward turn to renovate
Our thoughts with freshness, and create
An antidote to strife.

Thus dead and silent are the strings,
As legends say, of Memnon's lyre;
Till from the orient, Phœbus flings
His smile of golden light, and brings
Life, harmony, and fire!

RED SNOW.

In Captain Parry's narrative of an attempt to reach the Pole, there is mention made of a peculiar description of red snow which was occasionally met with during the progress of the expedition, and similar appearances have been observed by Captain Ross and others. Mr. Scoresby considers this phenomenon to be occasioned by the presence of a number of animalculæ, as the water in many places was tinged of a reddish brown colour, which was found to contain many active molecules. The length of the animalcules was about $\frac{1}{2160}$ of an inch, and their diameter $\frac{1}{3260}$. Their form was paraboloidal, and the motion of some was direct but unsteady, and others moved in a small circle, with one extremity of the animalculæ in the centre. The general speed of the progressive animalcules was $\frac{1}{210}$ of an inch in a second, or an inch in three minutes and a half. The number in a single drop of water was calculated by the aid of the micrometer glass at 12,960, which was probably rather below the truth. Yet numerous as they were they had ample room. Their finny fringes being transparent could not be discovered. When a drop of the water was examined in the sun, it was most brilliantly speckled with the animalcules; some became luminous and iridescent like the fire fly. All were in rapid motion, being disturbed or inconvenienced perhaps by the strong action of the sun's rays profusely reflected from the mirror.

NEGRO SLAVERY.

Slavery cannot possibly be made to agree with Christianity. Our holy religion is divine: it is founded upon the eternal rule of righteousness—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength:" this is the first and great commandment. And the second is like to it, worthy of its ever-blessed Author, who enjoins upon each of us—"Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Can any man, a Briton—professing to be a believer in Christianity, which is admitted as "part and parcel of the law of England,"—can any man, with that divine precept in his mind, dare to claim property in man—to hold him in bondage—to live upon the fruit of his forced labour—or to sell him for his own pecuniary advantage? That man must labour under "strong delusion to believe a lie" (2 Thess. ii, 11), who can justify his holding his fellow man in slavery in defiance of the law of God! What an insult to the Majesty of heaven! What an affront to his holiness! What an outrage upon our sacred Christianity! How can such persons presume to anticipate their meeting the wretched victims of oppression at the righteous tribunal of God? Do they not know, that "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness and ungodliness of men?" Rom. i, 18. Have they not read in that awful and gracious volume, that "God will render to every man according to his deeds?—indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil; for there is no respect of persons with God." Rom. ii, 6—8, 9, 11.

We will not enter into the question of compensation for the emancipation of the Negro Slaves in our colonies; but we are confident, that, independently of moral and religious considerations, it would be for the interests of the colonists and of the nation, to enter seriously into the appalling question, with a view to the early and the utter extinction of slavery. Nor do we believe that the community would be backward in the least degree to satisfy every reasonable claim for loss, which any party might sustain in that indispensable procedure. Righteousness, Christianity, and policy demand it; nor can it be delayed without fearful aggravation of guilt to individuals, and to Britain.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

From the Sierra Leone Royal Gazette of the 20th of November, 1824, we make the following extracts, to show the horrible nature of the slave trade, which is even now carried on to a fearful extent: but we trust that the recent arrangements between the French and English governments, and the American Colonization Society, will in a great measure check that worse than diabolical traffic.

"We regret never having before inspected the numerous slave ships which have arrived here, in order to ascertain whether they answer the description set forth in their papers. The following particulars relative to three vessels taken by our squadron for being engaged in this horrible commerce, and lately brought into our harbour for adjudication in the British and Portuguese mixed commission, will, we feel assured, astonish even our readers, who have unhappily had too many opportunities of witnessing the misery which this traffic imposes upon its defenceless and unfortunate victims.

"The Diana.—This vessel is stated, in the royal passport, to be 120 tons burthen; and permitted, by this passport, in accordance with the Alvara of his most faithful Majesty, under the date of the 24th of November, 1813, to carry 300 slaves, being at the rate of five to every two tons. On being inspected, she is found to admeasure only 66 tons 52-94 English measurement, and therefore, authorized to take at the rate of five to each ton. The surface of the men's slave room is only 486 feet, and two feet seven inches in height; and that of the women, 103 feet surface, and three feet eleven inches high; yet, on board this vessel, there were actually shipped at Badagry, for passage to the Brazils, 156 human victims besides her crew, 18 in number.

"The Two Brazilian Friends.—This vessel is also stated, by a like document, to be 146 tons, and, being similarly licensed, might carry 365 slaves. On inspection, she is found to be only 95 tons 54-94, and consequently in like manner, authorized to carry at the rate of four to each ton. The surface of the platform for the men is 615 feet, and the height two feet six inches; that of the women, 148 feet eight inches surface, and three feet ten inches in height. On board this vessel there were actually shipped at Badagry, for passage to the Brazils, 200 unfortunate Africans, besides her crew, 18 in number.

"The Avizo.—This vessel is, by a similar document, asserted to be 231 tons, and by her licence might carry 580 slaves. On examining her, it is ascertained that she is only 165 tons 28-94, and therefore might carry at the rate of more than five to a ton. The surface of the men's room is 361 feet, height of ditto three feet two inches; that of the women is 215 feet surface, and the same height as the men's. Four hundred and sixty-five wretched beings were stowed on board this vessel, at the same port, for passage to the Brazils, besides her crew, 33 in number.

"We have here 328 tons of shipping, licensed to carry 1,245, and actually conveying from the coast 881 slaves, being (in these three vessels) at the rate of 11 to every four tons, besides the men navigating them, and the water and provisions necessary for so great a number of people for the voyage, together with their boats and ship's stores. As the men and women thus embarked were 712 in number, and supposing the children, both boys and girls, to be either always kept on deck, or confined to the long boat (as is the practice), still only a little more than 3 square feet was allowed for each adult African thus shipped—a space in which, we should suppose, no human being could long exist; and, indeed, the number of deaths, and the emaciated state of the survivors, too fully prove this to be the case! From the crowded state of these vessels, we do not hesitate to say, that it would be impossible to cram the number on board which the authorities of the Brazils—by sanctioning these false descriptions of the vessels—give the masters permission to take; it is, therefore, to a certain extent useless, although proving to the world that this government, not content with allowing their subjects to carry on the odious traffic, sanction such means of doing so as aggravate the misery of the unfortunate victims thus forced away from their families and country. We shall make no further remarks on this painful subject, satisfied that such cruel deception as is clearly shown to be sanctioned by this power, which is thus adding further horrors to the already detestable slave trade, will not be overlooked by our government, who are, no doubt, in possession of the facts from our gallant commodore and his officers.

"The French slave trade has lately most considerably increased in the rivers Bonny and Old Calabar. Several new vessels have arrived, and many laden with full cargoes of human victims have left under the white flag, and manned by Frenchmen, although the capital embarked is ostensibly Spanish. In order that our readers may judge of the barbarity and want of feeling evinced by these subjects of an enlightened nation, which publicly disavows such horrible and infamous conduct, we desire to make known, that La Louis, commanded by one Oiseau, on completing her cargo of slaves in the Old Calabar, a few weeks since, without the slightest spark of humanity in him, thrust the whole of these unfortunate beings between decks (a height of only three feet), and closed the hatches for the night!—When morning made its appearance, fifty of the poor sufferers had paid the debt of nature, owing to the confined, diseased, and putrid atmosphere they were condemned to respire!! The wretch coolly ordered the bodies of these miserable victims of his total want of human feeling to be thrown into the river, and immediately proceeded on shore to complete his execrable cargo by fresh purchases of his fellow-creatures. To detail all the information we have received relative to the enormities committed by these dealers in human flesh, who feel they are protected by the nation they claim and flag they hoist, would horrify any but slave-dealers, who seem naturally callous to every feeling which ennobles mankind; suffice it to say, they are heart-rending, and would disgrace the most unenlightened savage."

Our readers will remember with horror that by such means our own West India islands were originally supplied with slaves: and part of the same abhorred system is necessarily in operation, to compel the wretched Negroes to perform their daily tasks. Who that possesses a human soul, does not burn with indignation at these enormities? and especially that Christian Britain should be involved in such crimson guilt?

THE GREAT LAND CRAB

OF THE BAHAMA ISLANDS. (Cancer Ruricola.)

THESE animals regularly march from the mountains, their usual abode, to the sea-side, in the months of April and May. At that time the whole ground is covered with this band of adventurers; and they direct their march with the utmost precision, never turning to the right or left for any obstacles they can possibly pass over. They are said to be commonly divided into three battalions, of which the first consists of the strongest and boldest males; but the main body of the army is composed of females, which never leave the mountains till the rain is set in, and then descend in regular order, being formed into columns of fifty paces broad, and three miles deep. Three or four days after this, the rear guard follows, a straggling, undisciplined tribe, consisting of males and females, but neither so robust nor so vigorous as the former. The night is the chief time of proceeding, and if it rains by day they do not fail to profit by the occasion; but when the sun shines they halt. When they are terrified, they march back in a confused disorderly manner, holding up and clattering their nippers together, as if to threaten those that disturb them. They most commonly subsist on vegetables; but if any of them by accident are maimed in such a manner as to be incapable of proceeding, the rest fall upon them and devour them upon the spot, and then pursue their journey.

After a march of sometimes two or perhaps three months in this manner, they arrive at their destined spot on the sea-coast, on which they rush eagerly to the edge of the water, and let the waves wash over their bodies two or three times. This has been thought necessary by some to ripen the spawn in the ovaria, as the crab, appearing satisfied with this slight bathing, immediately retires and seeks a lodging on the land. Before the last time, the spawn may be seen under the tail in bunches the size of a hen's egg, which they shake off into the water, leaving them to the chance of fortune and accident to bring them to maturity. The eggs that escape the shoals of fishes gathered round the shore are hatched under the sand; and soon after the little crabs are seen slowly travelling up to the mountains. The old ones, however, have become so feeble and lean that they can hardly crawl along, and are obliged to continue in the flat parts of the country till they recover, making holes in the earth, which they cover at the mouth with leaves and dirt. They there throw off their old shells, and remain almost without motion, for six days together, when they become so fat as to be delicious food. It is said they have then under their stomachs four large white stones, which gradually decrease in proportion as the shell hardens, and when they come to perfection are not to be found. This animal when in the mountains, subsisting only on vegetables, seldom ventures out; and its habitation being in the most inaccessible places, it remains for a great part of the season in perfect security. But when they descend into the flat countries, the natives destroy thousands: disregarding their bodies, they only seek for the small spawn which lies on each side of the stomach, within the shell, of about the thickness of a man's thumb. They are much more valuable on their return, after they have cast their shells, for being covered with a skin resembling soft parchment, almost every part except the stomach may be eaten. They are taken in the holes, by feeling for them with an instrument, and are sought after by night, when on their journey, by flambeaux light. Sometimes also they are caught when they take refuge in the bottoms of holes in rocks by the sea side, by stopping up the mouth of the hole, and then the tide coming enters the hole, and the animal is drowned in its retreat. These crabs are of various colours; but those of a light colour are esteemed most, and when full in flesh are well tasted. In some of the sugar islands they form no inconsiderable part of the food of the poor Negroes.—London Encyclopedia.

MR. THOMAS GOUGE.

CHRISTIANS are the salt of the earth, and they should diffuse the savour of piety; the light of the world, and they should spread the enlivening rays of heavenly knowledge. Mr. Thomas Gouge was eminent for holiness and usefulness. Before the fire of London, he possessed a large estate, but lost so much in that calamity, that when his wife died, and he had provided for his child, he had but 150*l.* a year left: of this, however, he gave 100*l.* to the poor, and that with such judgment and discretion, that he produced more good from it than some could have done with three times the sum. For about the last ten years of his life he applied his charity to Wales, where it was much wanted. He urged the rich to lend him their assistance. He relieved persecuted ministers, and instituted three or four hundred schools for the children of the poor; and he also procured an edition of eight thousand of the Welch Bible.

WHAT IS DEVOTION?

'Tis not sweet music's thrilling power—
  The organ's tone—the tuneful voice—
Can consecrate devotion's hour,
  Or make the ear of Heaven rejoice.

But 'tis the melody of mind
  Inflam'd by zeal, inspir'd by love,
By grace enlighten'd and refin'd,
  And panting for the joys above.

'Tis fervour such as angels know
  When gloriously they sweep their lyres;
'Tis such as Christians feel below
  When Jesus their rapt song inspires.

DEVONIA.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE IN THE REIGNS OF ELIZABETH, AND GEORGE III.

advantage which the liberty of the subject has ed in modern times cannot, perhaps, be better il-rated, than by contrasting the situation of two induals charged with the crime of treason, at the two emes of a period of two hundred years. In the sted age of Elizabeth, the practice was to arrest suspected person, and to keep him in strict im-onment till it suited the purposes of the Crown to him. During this interval (which was quite with-limit in practice, however illegal, there being inces of imprisonment for many years without trial), prisoner was left to ruminate upon his misfortune olitude, no friend or adviser being admitted to him;
gaoler, perhaps, or some expert underling of state, occasionally introduced to examine him,—to ex-confessions from him; or, failing in this object, lo what Tacitus describes as the height of imperial anny at Rome, suspiria subscribere,—to write down register the sighs and groans of the captive, for the pose of making them the subject of criminal charges.
ming to his trial with his powers both of body and d wasted by confinement, he was literally brought to "fight without a weapon." He heard the charge inst him for the first time when the indictment was d upon his arraignment; he was left to puzzle out way to the meaning of the charge, involved, as it s, in technical jargon, and was compelled to plead tantly to it. If he denied it, evidence was produced inst him, consisting of written, or even verbal acunts of the examinations of persons, not brought o court, not cross-examined by him, nor confronted th him in any way; sometimes convicted traitors iting for execution; sometimes men charged with e same offence which was imputed to him, and hop-for, and even promised pardon for themselves, if ey succeeded in fixing guilt upon him. He was not owed to call witnesses to prove his innocence of the arge, or to impeach the testimony of the witnesses r the crown; counsel were not to assist him in mak-his defence; and, during the whole proceeding, the dges and king's counsel were accustomed to display eir ingenuity by perplexing the prisoner with quesons, and endeavouring to extract his condemnation om his own mouth. If the jury found him guilty, his e and property were in the king's hands; and the old servation which has been applied to princes, may with ual justice be applied to persons convicted of state ences in ancient times, namely, that "the interval etween their prisons and their graves was usually but short one;" if, on the other hand, he was acquitted, e jury were reprimanded or even punished, and the risoner was sent back to confinement till the materials r a new charge were compounded, or till it pleased e caprice of government to discharge him. Such as the law and practice in the time of Queen Elizaeth:—let us now look at the law and practice in the ime of George III.

In modern times, a person imprisoned on a charge of reason is entitled immediately to a copy of the war-ant of commitment, which the gaoler is bound to deiver to him under a very heavy penalty; friends and dvisers are admitted to consult with him at all reason-ble times. If upon the warrant of his commitment, r otherwise, he has reason to believe, or is advised, that is imprisonment is illegal, or that he is entitled to ail, he may demand to be brought personally before ome court of superior jurisdiction; and after being eard publicly and openly, he will be either bailed, reanded, or discharged; he must be brought to trial
ithin a reasonable time, and if not indicted in the course of the next term or sessions after his commitment, he is entitled to be bailed; and if not indicted and tried at the second term or sessions, he may be discharged. There must be an interval of fifteen days between his arraignment and trial. A copy of the indictment, together with a list of the witnesses to appear against him, and also of the jury by whom he is to be tried, with a full description of each person, in order that he may know how to direct his challenges, must be delivered to him ten days at least before his trial; counsel are assigned to him by the court upon his own nomination, who are permitted to assist him in every part of the trial by examining witnesses and addressing the jury in his behalf; there must be two witnesses to support every article of the treason charged against him; all the evidence is given in open court, and the prisoner or his counsel is allowed to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution; no questions are asked of the prisoner during the whole of the proceeding as to the facts of the case; he may call as many witnesses as he pleases, who are examined upon oath, and he has the same means of compelling their attendance as the crown; on a verdict of acquittal, he is instantly discharged, and the jury are never questioned for their conduct.

When the two cases are thus placed in opposition, it is manifest that a very great improvement has taken place in the administration of criminal justice and the liberty of the subject: and upon a nearer examination, the advantages which we possess in modern times will be found to consist, not so much in the declaration of abstract rights and liberties, as in the careful provision of means by which those rights and liberties may be rendered practically available to the individual, whenever the hand of unlawful power may lie heavily upon him.—Library of Entertaining Knowledge.

A WORD TO MECHANICS.

As artisans and mechanics, nothing can be more proper for you than scientific reading and studies. It is peculiarly your duty; and every wise man, every intelligent Christian, will sincerely rejoice that such abundant provision has been made for your instruction in every branch of science. But the utility of all mechanical and scientific studies is bounded by time, and limited to earth. Allow a friend to you, the happiness of recommending you the study of the science of religion; the utility of this relates indeed to earth; but this life does limit its advantages and blessings. Eternity, Immortality, and Heaven, it commends to you: with your other reading and studies, give at least a small portion of your attention to their inestimable claims. However scientific, ingenious, wealthy he may be, "what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Above many other books, there is one, in connection with the Holy Scriptures, which a sincere friend wishes you to read—"A Companion to the Bible," published by the Religious Tract Society. Read it as a help to the better understanding of the Bible, and you will be wise in the supreme science, in the science of Heaven and Immortality!

ON BOOKS.

The books we read ought to be chosen with the utmost care. An ancient Egyptian king had this inscription placed over his library—"The medicines of the soul." Too many libraries contain little else but poisons for the soul.

CLAIMS OF THE CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE.

THE most superficial observer of the "signs" of the stirring times in which we live, cannot fail to notice, that one of the most palpable is that insatiable thirst for knowledge which has seized upon all orders and ranks among us. Books have been multiplied to an extent of which ourselves a few years ago could have formed no conception—the almost magic powers of the Press have been taxed for their production to a degree of which till now we did not suppose them capable—and still the eager Public cries "Give! give!" the demand increases even faster than the supply, and the appearance of a new publication is but the signal to call into the field a new accession of readers, who with greedy eagerness consume the provision already set before them, and still with unabated appetite require a fresh supply.

Every enlightened lover of mankind will hail with delight this ardent desire in the public mind for knowledge, as tending in its own nature to improve our social institutions, by rendering each individual better acquainted with the duties devolving upon him, according to the station he occupies in the body politic. But the CHRISTIAN PATRIOT "rejoices with trembling:" he knows that to inform the head without amending the heart, will be only rendering mankind more acute to do evil. He looks around, to ascertain not merely the amount but the quality of the intellectual food that is set before his countrymen; and here indeed he finds more reason to tremble than to rejoice. The great literary feature of the present day is the creation of that vast quantity of cheap reading with which the bulk of our population is furnished; and how small a part of this important branch of our literature can the Christian regard as conducing either to the glory of God or the good of his fellow-creatures!

Views such as these were the origin of the "CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE." Its conductors, in surveying the numerous cheap periodicals in existence, saw the aim, or at least the tendency, of some of them to be the production of anarchy and confusion among us, by the abuse of that right, which as free Englishmen we justly claim, and will ever uphold—the right of expressing our opinions fearlessly on public men and measures. Their sole object appears to be to persuade the people that their governors are their enemies; that all things are going wrong in the state; and heaping every kind of slander and abuse upon those whom the good providence of God has set over the nation. Another class issue their weekly poison for a still more awful purpose—no less than to persuade man that he is not an accountable being; and thus at one stroke to cut up civil society by its roots, and deprive their besotted votaries of all hope of happiness beyond the grave! With these two classes shall we say that we have no feelings in common? That were indeed but feebly to express our feelings concerning them: rather let us express our unmingled detestation of their abominable schemes and doctrines, which can have been inspired by none but the author of all evil: and while we would pray for themselves, that "the thought of their heart may be forgiven them, and that they may be brought to repentance and an acknowledgment of the truth," we would warn our countrymen to shun their writings as they would shun the pestilence, and to walk not in the way of their advising, "for their feet go down to death, and their steps take hold on hell." Others there are, who provide weekly a supply of knowledge of a really useful kind, tending to make their readers respectable and useful members of society: but their views appear strictly bounded by the state of man upon earth; and therefore their labours must be unsatisfactory to the Christian, who considers the present state but as the threshold of life, and feels it to be of vastly more importance that a man should be instructed in "the things which make for his everlasting peace," than any thing he can be taught respecting his present well-being, how necessary soever that may be in its proper and subordinate place.

The conductors of the "CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE" resolved therefore to attempt the counteraction of bad principles, and to supply the deficiency of good, by establishing a cheap publication, which might be the vehicle of much rational entertainment, and a variety of useful information with respect to the things of the present life; but always in subserviency to the great design of promoting CHRISTIAN principles and the production of CHRISTIAN virtues. They have now been before the Public a sufficient time to challenge an examination, both of their plan and its execution. They claim the attention of those especially to whom the care of our youth is entrusted. Fathers of families may put this Magazine into the hands of their children without fearing to contaminate their minds. Teachers may circulate it amongst those under their care, in the confidence that it will contain nothing but what is conducive to pure religion and sound morality. And we would particularly urge upon our Readers the catholic nature of our plan. We write neither for Churchmen, nor for Dissenters, as such. Our simple aim is to promote true piety upon the principles of the Protestant Reformation. We seek to spread that pure system of truth which was promulgated by Christ and his Apostles, and which has been consecrated by the blood of Ridley, and Latimer, and other glories of our native land. Upon this broad ground we take our stand; and therefore may hope to meet the countenance and support of all, of whatever views in minor matters, "who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." We give our hearty thanks to our friends for the great and increasing support we have hitherto met with; and conclude this exposition of our claims on their continued patronage, by urging them to renewed efforts for the improvement and wider diffusion of the CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE.

IE BODLEIAN, OR UNIVERSITY LIBRARY, OXFORD.

THOMAS BODLEY, founder of the magnificient Uni-ity Library at Oxford, has immortalized his name hat great work. But to give an accurate account his noble edifice, and of its precious literary treas, or one worthy of its extent and excellent chaer, is altogether impossible within our limits, as it asses almost every institution of the kind.

he most celebrated libraries on the continent, are of the Vatican, at Rome; that of Cosmo de Me-
, at Florence; that of Bessarion, at Venice; that he Emperor of Austria, at Vienna, which is said to ist of more than 80,000 volumes, and of 15,940 ous medals; and that of Francis I, at Paris, aug-ted by Cardinal Richlieu, and completed by Colbert, now the National Library of France.

he Bodleian Library exceeds that of any University urope, and even those of all the sovereigns of ope, except the Emperor's and the French one, which are each older by a hundred years. The Vatican, the Medicean, that of Bessarion, and the others before mentioned, exceed the Bodleian in Greek MSS, but in Oriental MSS it excels them all. As to printed books, the Ambrosian at Milan, and that of Wolfenbuttle, are two of the most famous libraries; yet both are inferior to the Bodleian.

Sir Thomas Bodley was born at Exeter, March 2, 1544. On the ascension of Queen Mary, his father removed with his family to Geneva. The University of that city having been then recently erected, young Bodley, about twelve years of age, applied himself with diligence to the study of the learned languages, under the most celebrated professors. He attended the lectures of Chevalerius in the Hebrew language, of Beroaldus in the Greek, and of Calvin and Beza in Divinity. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth his father returned to England, and settled in London, when Thomas was sent to Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1563 he took the degree of B. A., and the year following was admitted fellow of Merton College. In 1565, he undertook the reading of a Greek Lecture in the hall of that college. In 1566, he took the degree of M. A., and the same year read natural philosophy in the public schools. In 1569, he was elected one of the proctors of the university; and, for a considerable time, supplied the place of university orator. In 1576, he went abroad, and spent four years in France, Germany, and Italy. Upon his return, he applied himself to the study of history and politics. In 1585 he was made gentleman usher to Queen Elizabeth; and from that time until 1597 he was employed in several embassies; when, disgusted with the intrigues of the court, he retired from public life, and, to use his own words, resolved to "set up his staff at the Library door."

Being in the prime of life, and eminently qualified both by his learning and experience, he engaged in an employment, which, as Camden justly remarks, would have added glory to the character of a crowned head,—the restoration of the Public Library. Having announced to the University his design, and receiving assurances of thankful acquiescence, and cordial co-operation, he began by presenting a collection of volumes which he had purchased abroad, and which were valued at 10,000*l*. His example and solicitations operated so powerfully, that contributions flowed in from various quarters, with a rapidity that rendered it speedily necessary to enlarge the building.

On the 8th of November, 1602, the Library was first opened; and in 1605, the bust of Sir Thomas Bodley was placed in the Library, by the Earl of Dorset, chancellor of the University.

On the 16th of July, 1610, the first stone was laid of an additional room at the eastern extremity of the Library, forming, with the original repository of Duke Humphrey, the figure of a Roman T; Sir Thomas himself largely contributing towards the expense. Other benefactions being afterwards added, the University was enabled to raise the entire quadrangle of the schools to its present height. But in process of time, the donations increasing to such a degree that the Library, even with the late additions, was insufficient to contain them, the University betook themselves to another expedient, and which appears to have formed part of the original plan of Sir Thomas himself; this was no other than to construct, at the western end, a room similar to the one added by Sir Thomas at the eastern, below which the University might be accommodated with a convocation house. A piece of ground was accordingly purchased of Exeter College, and on May 13, 1634, the first stone of the new building was laid by the Vice-Chancellor.

In this part of the Library were first deposited the Baroccian manuscripts, in number 249, the noble gift of William Earl of Pembroke, purchased from the library of Francis Baroccio, a Venetian. Adjoining these were placed 233 manuscripts, together with five rolls, and a catalogue, given by Sir Kenelm Digby. Also, towards the southern extremity, the MSS given by Archbishop Laud, Chancellor of the University, in number about 1,300, in nineteen different languages. But by far the greater part of it is occupied by the extensive collection of the learned John Selden, which was conveyed thither in the year 1659, under the direction of his executors.

In the year 1788 the Anatomy School, adjoining the south staircase of the Bodleian, was added to the Library, by the name of "Bibliothecæ Bodleianæ Auctarium." Hither were transferred from the general mass above-stairs, the Baroccian MSS; select portions of those of Laud, Cromwell, Roe, and Digby; also from the MSS of Sir T. Bodley, and those bequeathed by Dr. Rawlinson: to these have since been added the D'Orville collection, and those purchased from Dr. Clarke. Among these treasures perhaps it will be sufficient just to mention the Laudian MSS (in Uncial or capital characters) of the Acts of the Apostles, the Euclid of D'Orville, and the Plato of Clarke. In the remainder of the room are arranged the first editions of the Holy Scriptures, of the classic writers, and early fathers of the church; books printed by the family of the Aldi; editions of the classics and ecclesiastical writers of the fifteenth century, among which are some of the rarest specimens of early typography; not to mention the swarthy Caxtons of our own isle; printed editions collated with MSS; books printed on vellum; with some others, selected on account of their rarity and value.

Within this room is another of smaller dimensions, called "The Oriental Room:" in this are deposited the rich treasures of eastern literature, from the stores of Laud, Pococke, Huntington, Marsh, &c., together with others from different parts of the Library; to which have been lately added about forty thousand purchased from Dr. Clarke. This is considered the richest part of the whole Library.

On the opposite side of the quadrangle, in a room which was formerly the Law School, are deposited the MSS of Dodsworth, Carte, Tanner, Willis, Ballard, and selections from those of Dr. Rawlinson. The chief contents of this room are the magnificent donation of the late Richard Gough, Esq., consisting of his matchless collection of works on British Topography, accompanied by innumerable maps, plans, and drawings; a valuable selection of books on Saxon and Northern literature; with 206 Missals, &c. This part of the library is now, from him, called "Gough's Room."

Besides the noble founder, and those whose names have been already mentioned, this Library is indebted for rich contributions to Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex; Thomas Sackville, Earl of Dorset; Sir Henry Saville; King James I; Laurence and Josiah Bodley, younger brothers of Sir Thomas; Francis I, Duke of Parma; Charles III, King of Spain; Christian VII, King of Denmark; and his late Majesty George III.

Besides giving his books, which he had collected at a great expense, Sir Thomas Bodley left an estate, for salaries to officers, and to keep the Library in repair. For the government of it, he drew up some statutes, which were confirmed in convocation, and which are preserved in the archives of the Library. By these, the Vice-Chancellor, Proctors, and the Regius Professors of Divinity, Law, Medicine, Hebrew, and Greek, are appointed Visitors and Curators.

By the provisions of a statute, promulgated and confirmed in full convocation, Dec. 2, 1813, the officers of the Library are now increased to a librarian, two under librarians, with the degree of M. A. or B. C. L. at least, and two assistants, either B. A. or under graduates. The present librarian, elected 1813, is Bulkeney Baudinel, M. A., late fellow of New College.

How many volumes this inestimable collection contains is not exactly known, but it is immense; and the Library is continually increasing by donations, by copies of every work printed in this country (by Act 54 Geo. III, ch. 156), as well as by books purchased from the fund left by its founder, assisted by fees received at matriculation, and by an annual payment from all who have a right of admission to the Library.

A CHRISTIAN AND AN INFIDEL.

An infidel once asked his pious friend, "Is your God big or little."

Answer. Both. He is so big that the whole heaven and earth cannot contain him: and he is so little that he can dwell in my heart.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ADAM.

Sect. V.—The Trial and Sentence of Adam.

THE merciful manner in which God dealt with our first parents, in their guilty condition, must be particularly regarded in our review of the life of Adam. It appears from the representation of the Scriptures, that God was accustomed to manifest himself to them with peculiar condescension, when they were in a state of innocence; and that they were delighted to enjoy the distinguishing grace of their glorious Creator. How "the presence of the LORD God" amongst the trees of the garden could be made visible, and how the voice of the LORD God "walking in the garden in the cool of the day," could be perceived by mortal eye, we may be at a loss fully to understand: but God himself could be at no loss for means to hold communion with his beloved creature. The language of Moses is evidently accommodated to our weak capacities, and designed to impress us with the pleasing idea of the owner of the garden taking his evening walk in it, to see how the delicious fruits increased, and how the beautiful flowers flourished, and to converse with those to whom he had committed its care.

"The cool of the day" was the appropriate season of the accustomed worship of Adam and Eve; when they used to welcome the tokens of the Divine presence with that kind of exulting joy, with which a dutiful child meets the approbation of an indulgent father. But alas! to what a wretched state had sin reduced their minds! The echo of that voice, which hitherto had been as melody to their ears, filled their guilty souls with alarm and terrifying apprehensions. Instead of hastening to the spot whence the sound proceeded, they fly from the dreaded place. "And they heard the voice of the LORD God walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the LORD God amongst the trees of the garden. And the LORD God called unto Adam, and said, Where art thou?" Gen. iii, 8, 9.

They fled from the Divine presence, not desiring a reconciliation: and, having their understanding darkened, they foolishly endeavoured to hide themselves from omniscience! May we, with our young readers, never forget those lines, with which we have been familiar from our early years.

"Almighty God, thy piercing eye
Strikes through the shades of night;
And our most secret actions lie
All open to thy sight."

Attempts at concealment are all useless and vain, when God calls. Adam must appear before his Judge. Trembling and bowed down with the consciousness of sin, Adam stands before his offended Maker. "And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked; and I hid myself," ver. 10. The first sentence from the lips of Adam shows the dreadful effects of sin. He does not humble himself, nor implore mercy, in a single petition. He utters a daring falsehood—and that addressed to God, who searcheth the hearts! It was not because Adam was naked that he hid himself, but because his consciousness of disobedience filled his guilty spirit with dread. This his Maker knew; and in a serious interrogation, God directs him to reflect upon the cause of his fear. "And he said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast hou eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee that thou houldst not eat?" ver. 11. The reply of Adam further illustrates the hardening nature of sin. What pride! What impenitence! What impudent hardihood does t contain! He does not indeed deny the fact; but in-tead of a frank avowal of his crime, and a humble supplication for mercy, he proceeds in a circuitous way to excuse himself, by throwing the blame upon his wife; and, in an indirect manner, reflecting upon God himself, as the chief occasion of his fault. "And the man said, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." Ver. 12.

How great must be the deceitfulness of sin, to allow Adam to attempt his own justification in a manner so culpable! But such a way of proceeding we too often observe in offenders among us. Self-justification, alas! how common: it is an evil, which we still see, forms a prominent feature of the human character, discernible from tender infancy to hoary hairs.

Eve is next summoned. "And the LORD God said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done?" ver. 13. Like her husband, hardened by depravity of heart, Eve endeavours to throw off the blame from herself. "And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat." Ver. 13.

What grievous aggravations of their offence, in their impenitent, disingenuous excuses! What now remained for the self-convicted culprits, "but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries?" Heb. x, 27. "But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us," Eph. ii, 2, did not reply to the frivolous excuses of the unhumbled offenders. He first pronounced the awful sentence upon the serpent. "Cursed art thou because thou hast done this. I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee. And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it; cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat of the herb of the field: in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Ver. 14—19.

The exceeding sinfulness of sin, may in a considerable measure be discovered in the nature and extent of the curse pronounced upon our first transgressing parents. The woman was doomed to pain and sorrow in bearing children, and to a state of subjection to the will of her husband. Because Adam had hearkened to the persuasions of his wife, the ground was cursed; and with severe labour, and painful toil, his hard-earned sustenance was to be derived from its herbs, instead of his feeding upon the delicious fruits of Paradise. The earth itself, which had been fruitful as the garden of the Lord, now produced thorns and thistles and noisome weeds; and, in the sweat of his face, man was doomed to eat his bread with care, until worn with fatigue, and spent with age and infirmity, he returned in dishonour to his original clay. In all the fatigues of Adam, it would be sounding in his ears, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

Thus man apostatized; God was provoked; the Holy Spirit forsook his living temple, the human soul; the unclean spirit took possession of it; the Divine image was defaced; and, in its stead, was impressed in evil tempers, the likeness of Satan, the prince of devils!

Sect. VI.—The Promise of a Saviour to Adam.

"MERCY and truth met together," even in the sentence pronounced upon the first human transgressors. Their offended Creator did not utterly exclude them from his parental care. The unhappy apostates, to hide their discovered nakedness, and conceal their shame, "sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons." Gen. iii, 7. "But unto Adam also and to his wife did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them," ver. 21. By this act of sovereign benevolence, God not only furnished them with suitable clothing, but instructed them how to prepare the like for themselves in future, and to impart the same knowledge to their posterity.

But the Divine compassion was chiefly manifested in the intimation of a deliverer from their state of helpless misery—a Saviour from everlasting death. The stupendous plan of redemption had been formed in the counsels of divine mercy, before the foundation of the world was laid: and men in every age have been saved and called with a holy calling, "according to God's own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." 2 Tim. i, 9.

While standing before the Lord God, fearful and guilty, and the righteous sentence upon them as transgressors sounding in their ears, the minds of our first parents were preserved from hopeless despondency, by the promise, that the "seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head." Without a revelation of mercy, the conscious sinner would be hardened in despair. The promise itself was doubtless explained to Adam, especially when he was clothed with the skins of the beasts, which he appears to have offered in sacrifice under the Divine direction, as an expiatory atonement for sin. In Paradise, it is believed, the offering of solemn thanksgiving by Adam, was accompanied with the presentation before the Lord of the choicest fruits of the earth: but now satisfaction for sin is required, "and without shedding of blood is no remission." Heb. ix, 22.

"By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain." Heb. xi, 4. Being offered in faith, sacrifices must have been commanded by the Lord; and their meaning must have been explained in a great degree, directing the penitent offerer to look by faith to the promised seed, the deliverer, "the lamb slain," in this impressive figure, "from the foundation of the world."

An excellent commentator observes, "Innocent animals slain in sacrifice, furnishing garments to fallen Adam and Eve, would very aptly typify the promised seed, who suffered for our sins, that we might stand accepted before God in his righteousness; and the circumstance of the Lord God making the coats of skins, and clothing them, not only intimates the kind instructions and assistance which he afforded to them, but represents to us, that the Saviour and salvation are of his providing; and that faith which receives and puts on Christ is his gift."—Scott.

DR. HAWEIS AND CAPTAIN WILSON.

Captain Wilson, of the missionary ship Duff, on his return from his expedition for evangelizing the heathen, was complimented with a diamond ring of considerable value by Dr. Haweis, a zealous promoter of the Missionary Society, accompanied with the following note:—"Anxious for your arrival, I had prepared the following token. I wish to couple my name with yours. The circle is an emblem of the eternity I hope to spend with you. The brilliant is not brighter than my affection, nor the gold purer than my friendship. Wear me on your heart; while mine beats, it will remember you, and bless God for you."

INFANT SLAVERY IN ENGLAND.

We rejoice to learn that so many petitions, and so numerously signed, have been presented to parliament against the oppressive arrangements of the present "Factory System," in Yorkshire and Lancashire. "At a mill near Huddersfield, where little children are worked night and day, and where the internal arrangements are revolting to morality, and disgusting to human nature, a clergyman of the church of England, minister of the township, was wishful to see with his own eyes what this system was, but the factory master absolutely refused to let him visit his flock." Boys of eight, ten, and twelve years of age, are worked from twelve to fourteen, sixteen, and even eighteen hours per day. Surely our national greatness does not depend upon such cruelties, and we trust some legislative relief will be afforded!

"These boys" (two mentioned by a Huddersfield gentleman) "began work at the mill at six o'clock on the Friday morning, and absolutely worked till five o'clock on Saturday evening, say thirty-five hours, with only the following time for meals. At half-past eight o'clock half an hour; at twelve an hour; at five half an hour; at twelve o'clock at night an hour; at half-past four on Saturday morning half an hour; at half-past eight half an hour; at twelve o'clock at noon an hour; and then they work till five on Saturday evening, and walk home nearly three miles. When they returned home last Saturday week, they were put to bed. On Sunday morning there was no school! no church!—no! poor things, they were sick and 'maisy,' and their parents were obliged to 'paddle' them out on Sunday; by degrees they recovered, and set off to their work on Monday morning. These boys, with about a dozen more, work regularly every day from six in the morning to eight in the evening, with two hours for meals; and on Fridays, Friday nights, and Saturdays, are worked as above described, and the former two have nearly six miles a day to walk.

"At the same mill last Friday morning, a boy fourteen years old, started at six o'clock in the morning, worked till half-past eight, then rested half an hour; worked till half-past twelve, and rested half an hour; worked till five, and rested half an hour; worked till nine, and rested a quarter of an hour; worked till twelve at night, and rested an hour; worked till four on Saturday morning, rested half an hour; worked till half-past eight, then rested half an hour; at half-past twelve rested half an hour; and worked till five, then left for home—thus working thirty hours and a quarter out of thirty-five. But mark! this boy, in consequence of pain in his wrist, occasioned by a boil produced by excessive labour, is frequently assisted by his partner—he must soon, poor fellow, after thus labouring in excruciating torture, be laid aside, and afterwards be kept by the town. About fourteen boys work with this lad: they work twelve hours per day the rest of the week, and on Fridays, Friday nights, and Saturdays, are engaged as herein described."

QUEEN ELIZABETH.

Lord Bacon relates of Queen Elizabeth, that once, when she could not be persuaded that a book, containing treasonable matter, was really written by the person whose name it bore, she said, with great indignation, that "she would have him racked, to produce his author." Bacon replied, "Nay, madam, he is a doctor: never rack his person, rack his style; let him have pen, ink, and paper, and help of books, and be enjoined to continue his story; and I will undertake, by collating his styles, to judge whether he were the author."—Criminal Trials.

IVORY.

"HORNS OF IVORY" (Ezek. xxvii, 15), the prodigious tusks of elephants, we omitted to mention as they deserve in our "Notices of the Elephant." (See p. 53.) Nor are our limits sufficient to contain an extended article on this subject. We do not read of elephants in the Holy Scriptures: but they are mentioned in the apocryphal books of Maccabees (1 Macc. vi, 34, 35, 46; viii, 6; 2 Macc. xi, 4; xiii, 2), from which we learn that these large quadrupeds were numerous in Syria.

The canonical books of Scripture contain various expressions which demonstrate the abundance of ivory, in ancient times, in Palestine, which, as our readers will recollect, lies in the North-West corner of Asia, near to Egypt, the North-East boundary of Africa. We read of a "Throne of Ivory," 1 Kings x, 18. "Ivory House," xxii, 39. "Ivory Palaces," Psalm xlv, 8. "Benches of Ivory," Ezek. xxvii, 6. "Houses of Ivory," Amos iii, 15; and "Beds of Ivory," vi, 4. From these passages it is manifest that elephants must have been destroyed in great numbers for the sake of their "precious teeth." "There were periods, indeed," says a modern writer, "in the history of refined nations of antiquity, when the destruction of the elephant was as great as in modern times: when Africa yielded her tribute of elephants' teeth to the kings of Persia; when the people of Judea built "ivory palaces;" when the galleys of Tyre had "benches of ivory;" when, contributing to the barbarous luxury of the early Grecian princes, when the Etruscan attributes of royalty were sceptres and thrones of ivory; when the ancient kings and magistrates of Rome sat on ivory seats; when colossal ivory statues of their gods, far exceeding, in their vast proportions and their splendid ornaments, all the magnificence of the moderns, were raised by the Greeks of the age of Pericles; and when immense stores of ivory, to be employed with similar prodigality, were collected in the temples. In the time of Pliny, the vast consumption of ivory for articles of luxury had compelled the Romans to seek for it in another hemisphere; Africa had ceased to furnish elephants' tusks, except of the smallest kind. A century or two earlier, according to Polybius, ivory was so plentiful in Africa, that the tribes on the confines of Ethiopia employed elephants' tusks as door-posts, and for the palisades that enclosed their fields. When the Roman power fell into decay, and the commerce of Europe with Africa was nearly suspended for centuries, the elephant was again unmolested in those regions. He was no longer slaughtered to administer to the pomp of temples, or to provide ornaments for palaces. The ivory tablets of the citizens of ancient Rome (libri elephantini) had fallen into disuse; and the toys of modern France were constructed of less splendid materials. At Angola, elephants' teeth had become so plentiful, because so useless as an article of trade, that in the beginning of the seventeenth century, according to Andrew Battell, an Englishman, who served in the Portuguese armies, the natives 'had their idols of wood in the midst of their towns, fashioned like a Negro, and at the foot thereof was a great heap of elephants' teeth, containing three or four tons of them: these were piled in the earth, and upon them were set the skulls of dead men, which they had slain in the wars, in monument of their victory.' The people of Angola and Congo, when the Portuguese first established themselves there, were found to have preserved an immense number of elephants' teeth for centuries, and had applied them to superstitious uses. As long as any part of the stock remained, the vessels of Portugal carried large quantities to Europe; and this traffic formed one of the most profitable branches of the early trade with Africa. About the middle of the seventeenth century the store was exhausted. But the demand for ivory, which had been thus renewed in Europe after the lapse of so many centuries, offered too great a temptation to the poor African to be allowed by him to remain without a supply. The destruction of elephants for their teeth was again unremittingly pursued throughout those extensive forests; and that havoc has gone on with little, if any, diminution to our own day."—Menageries, vol. ii.

'The spoils of elephants the roofs inlay;'

"Thrones" and "statues" of "ivory and gold" were common in Egypt, Persia, and Greece, in the ages of their glory. Ptolemy Philadelphus, in his triumph on account of a victory, had six hundred elephants' teeth carried by European slaves: and these were probably wrought up into statues of the Egyptian divinities, or into royal ornaments for the palace.

From the prodigious quantity of ivory which is still consumed in Europe only, we must infer the amazing number of elephants. Yet it is impossible to ascertain with accuracy the amount of that consumption. "We understand that at Dieppe there are at present eleven flourishing manufactories of articles in ivory, from which various specimens of art, from the commonest piece of turnery to the most elaborate carving, are dispersed throughout the continent. Much is employed for crucifixes, and other appendages of Roman Catholic worship. In our own country, in London, Birmingham, Sheffield, Liverpool, &c., the demand for elephants' teeth to be employed in the manufacture of musical instruments, plates for miniatures, boxes, chess-men, billiard-balls, mathematical rules, parasol and knife handles, must be much more considerable than might occur to a superficial observation. In 1827, the customs upon elephants' teeth, the duty being 20*s.* per cwt., amounted to 3,257*l.* exhibiting an importation of 364,784*lbs.* In eleven years, from 1788 to 1798, 18,914*cwt.* of ivory was imported, which shows an average annual importation of 192,579*lbs.* The consumption, therefore, is either increased in Great Britain, or, from our possession of the colony of the Cape of Good Hope, we are enabled to supply the demand of foreign nations.

"The average weight of an elephant's tusk is about 60*lbs.* To have produced, therefore, 364,784*lbs.* of ivory, the import of 1827, 6,080 tusks must have been procured. This fact assumes the annual slaughter of at least 3,040 elephants. But the real havoc is much greater. Mr. Burchell, in his travels in Africa, met with some elephant hunters, who had shot twelve elephants, which, however, produced no more than two hundred pounds weight of ivory, as all the animals, excepting one, happened to be females. If any thing like the same ill luck, or want of skill, attended all the elephant hunters, upwards of forty thousand of these animals would be annually slain to supply our demand for ivory baubles. But this circumstance is, of course, an extraordinary one; and we only mention it to show the necessary waste of elephant life, in the supply of our commercial wants."—Menageries, vol. ii.

THE LARGEST ELEPHANTS' TUSKS IN LONDON.

Messrs. H. Verinder and Co., cutlers, in St. Paul's Churchyard, have standing usually at their door, a large African elephant's tusk, measuring EIGHT FEET SIX INCHES in length; and ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-THREE pounds in weight.

Messrs. Nathanael Bowers and Son, comb makers and dealers in elephants' teeth and tortoise shell, No. 44, Cannon Street, London, have an African elephant's tusk usually standing at their door, measuring EIGHT FEET in length, and weighing ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY POUNDS, it being thicker than that of Mr. Verinder's.

The tusks of the Indian elephant rarely exceed seventy pounds each in weight, though tusks have been brought to the India house weighing one hundred and fifty pounds each. The largest tusk of an elephant on record was one sold at Amsterdam, and which, according to Klokner, weighed THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY POUNDS.

Our young readers especially will feel interested in endeavouring to form an adequate idea of these wonderful creatures, which are able to carry constantly, and with easy convenience, pairs of such massy and weighty tusks.

THOUGHTS ON FUTURE JUDGMENT.

If we must be judged, it becomes us to act with great consideration and advice; rashness, precipitancy, inadvertency, to do we know not what, in a heat and impetus, without considering whether it be good or evil, right or wrong, does not become those who must be judged. To be judged is to be called to an account, to give a reason for what we do; and therefore we ought to consider what reason to give before we do it. We must be judged by a rule, and therefore we ought to live by rule too; which no man can do, who does not consider well what he does, before he does it. It will be an ill plea at the day of judgment to say, that we did not consider what we did; that we lived without care, without thought, without observation; for this is not an allowable plea for a reasonable creature, much less for one who knows he must be judged. For why did you live without thought, without consideration? Had you not the power of thinking, of reasoning, of considering? And did not God give these powers and faculties to you, to direct and govern your lives? Did He not make you reasonable creatures, that you might consider and live by reason? and is it an excuse then for a reasonable creature, that he lived and acted without reason, and a wise consideration of things? This is the great degeneracy of human nature, the abuse and corruption of those natural powers which God hath given us, the source of all the evils that are in the world, and therefore can be no excuse; much less, when we know that God will judge us, and require a reason of our actions. For, not to consider our own ways, when we know God considers them, and will require an account of them, is a contempt of his judgment: for, did we reverence our Judge, we must consider. And yet how many mad, extravagant, wicked actions are there daily committed, which those who do them, never think why they do them; nor what reasonable account they can give of them either to God or man!

Some men are very fond of what they call a frolic; that is, to lay aside all thought and consideration, and to give themselves up to the government of every sudden and unaccountable fancy: and the more wild and extravagant it is, the more entertaining, without any regard to virtue or vice, to decency and honour. They drink themselves drunk in a frolic; blaspheme God, and His Son Jesus Christ, and His most holy religion; abuse wives and virgins, and affront all they meet in a frolic. But it is ridiculous to imagine, if we must be judged, that such frolics as these shall be allowed in the account, or pass for ciphers and empty scenes of life, to signify no more than they were intended for; that because we choose at such a time to act without reason and consideration, therefore God should demand no reason nor account of such actions.

And yet a very great part of the world, though they do not run into such outrageous frolics as these are, yet their lives are little better than a train of incoherent and independent fancies and humours. They live without thought, or any wise design; any extempore project has them, which starts up in their minds, or strikes their fancies. They scarce know what they have to do the next day, nor how they spent the last. But is this a life for men who are to be judged?

Others there are who give themselves up to the government of their passions, which are so vehement and impetuous, and always in so much haste, that they will neither hear reason, nor allow any time for it: and then no wonder if they do such things as they can give no good account of, when their passion is over.

Others are more fixed and resolved in their way. They have chosen such a course of life as they like best, and they are resolved to pursue it, and that nothing shall put them out of it; and therefore they too resolve against thinking, lest that should disturb them, and give check to their enjoyments. They will neither listen to their own consciences, nor hearken to the importunities of their friends, nor be persuaded to consider what the probable end of all their actions will be, both in this world, and in the next.

These are all unthinking, unconsidering sinners. But you will all confess, that these men do not live as if they were to be judged. And therefore, if we believe that we shall be judged, none of us ought to live thus: for all this will not prevent our being judged; but will make us very unable to give a good account of ourselves when we are.—Sherlock.

THE LOVE OF CHRIST.

Oh! never, never canst thou know
What then for thee the Saviour bore,
The pangs of that mysterious wo
That wrung his frame at every pore,
The weight that press'd upon his brow,
The fever of his bosom's core!
Yes! man for man perchance may brave
The horrors of the yawning grave;
And friend for friend, or child for sire,
Undaunted and unmov'd expire,
From love—or piety—or pride;—
But who can die as Jesus died?

A sweet but solitary beam,
An emanation from above,
Glimmers o'er life's uncertain dream,
We hail that beam, and call it love!
But fainter than the pale star's ray
Before the noontide blaze of day,
And lighter than the viewless sand
Beneath the wave that sweeps the strand,
Is all of love that man can know,—
All that in angel breasts can glow,—
Compar'd, O Lord of Hosts! with thine,
Eternal—fathomless—divine!

REV. T. DALE.

THE SOUL.

Oh how mysterious is the soul,
The conscious witness of a God;
Who sees the wide creation roll
Obedient to his nod.

Those who deny his power, as well
Their own existence may deny;
And—'tis an awful thing to tell—
The soul can never die!

DYING ACKNOWLEDGMENTS OF EMINENT MEN.

Dr. Priestley was the most distinguished minister among the Socinians of his day. He was born 1733, and died in 1804. From Mr. Joseph Priestley's Letter to Mr. Lindsey, quoted in Dr. Pye Smith's Letters to Mr. Belsham, we learn what miserable sources he looked to for dying consolations. We quote the following:—"He desired me to reach him a pamphlet which was at his bed's head; 'Simpson on the Duration of Future Punishment.' 'It will be a source of satisfaction to you to read that pamphlet,' said he 'giving it to me. 'It contains my sentiments, and a belief in them will be a support to you in the most trying circumstances, as it has been to me. We shall all meet finally: we only require different degrees of discipline, suited to our different tempers, to prepare us for final happiness.'"

Alas! who can but pity that great philosopher? Why should he reject the consolations of Christ? Why should he cherish his infidel opinions, and not rather have faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and say with Paul, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day?"

Dr. Price was the most eminent among the Arians of his time: he was born in 1723, and died in 1791. From the Rev. Mr. Newton's Posthumous Works, we learn the deplorable state of uncertainty in which that celebrated speculator's mind continued to his dying day. He said, "Now, in the evening of a life devoted to inquiries, and spent in endeavours (weak and feeble indeed) to serve the best interests, present and future, of mankind; I am waiting the great teacher, convinced that the order of Nature is perfect, that infinite wisdom and goodness governs all things, and that Christianity comes from God: but at the same time puzzled by many difficulties, anxious for more light, and resting with full and constant assurance only on this one truth;—That the practice of virtue is the duty and dignity of man, and in all events his wisest and safest course."

What believer in the gospel of Christ can but pity such a man in so gloomy a state of uncertainty? How unlike to scriptural Christianity, which teaches and enables the servant of Christ to rise above such chilling and semi-heathen sentiments! He can say, "For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better."

Dr. Gill was the most learned orthodox commentator on the Scriptures of his age: he was born 1697, and died in 1771. From a memoir of his life prefixed to his Commentary, we learn, that a short time before he died, he said, "I have nothing to make me uneasy;" and then repeated the following lines from Dr. Watts, in honour of the Redeemer,

> "He rais'd me from the deeps of sin,
> The gates of gaping hell;
> And fix'd my standing more secure
> Than 'twas before I fell."

In a letter to his relative, the Rev. John Gill of St. Alban's, he expressed himself in these terms:—"I depend wholly and alone upon the free, sovereign, eternal, unchangeable love of God, the firm and everlasting covenant of grace, and my interest in the Persons of the Trinity, for my whole salvation; and not upon any righteousness of my own, nor on any thing in me, or done by me under the influences of the Holy Spirit;" and then, as confirming what he had delivered, he added, "not upon any services of mine, which I have been assisted to perform for the good of the church, do I depend, but upon my interest in the Persons of the Trinity, the free grace of God, and the blessings of grace streaming to me through the blood and righteousness of Christ, as the ground of my hope. These are no new things to me, but what I have been long acquainted with—what I can live and die by. I apprehend I shall not be long here, but this you may tell to any of my friends."

This has been the dying experience of the true disciples of Christ in every age of the church; and the dying testimony of his servants affords much edification to those who are inquiring after the doctrines of Divine truth.

HUMAN SACRIFICES.

Among the multiplied enormities of which the ancient Canaanitish nations were guilty, that of immolating human victims at the shrine of superstition appears to have been at once the blackest and most revolting. From various passages in the sacred writings, we are led to infer, that it was the practice of this crime which filled the cup of their transgressions to overflowing, and drew down upon them that vengeance which was satiated only by their extermination. Horrid as was the custom, it appears to have been observed by the most polished nations of antiquity; the poets and historians, both of Greece and Rome, not unfrequently allude to it as a high act of adoration, and particularly efficacious in appeasing the wrath of an offended idol. Even the venerable rites of the Druids were stained with the same pollutions; and when we reflect that our own exalted island was at one time numbered among "the dark places of the earth and the habitations of blood," our deliverance from such gross blindness and delusion by the dissemination of Christian knowledge, is one of the brightest trophies of the triumph of the Cross, and must cause every heart to throb with genuine emotions of gratitude to that God, whose beneficence is unparalleled, and whose highest attribute is love.

REGARD TO DIVINE TRUTH.

As in the animal economy the action of the heart and of the lungs, though very different, are equally necessary for the maintenance of life, and we cannot say that either of them is more essentially requisite than the other; so in the truths of divine revelation, the knowledge and belief of which are essentially requisite with respect to the salvation of a sinner. And though they are distinct in themselves, we cannot determine which of them is of the most importance to us. We must understand what is our state in the sight of God, and we must be sensible of the enormity of our transgressions, or we cannot rightly understand a single chapter of the Bible.

GEORGE III AND LORD DARTMOUTH.

When Dr. Beattie was introduced to the king, at Kew, both their majesties and the doctor spoke highly of Lord Dartmouth; and the king added, "They say that Lord Dartmouth is an enthusiast; but surely he says nothing on the subject of religion, but what every Christian may and ought to say."—Forbes's Life of Beattie.

EPITAPH ON A CHILD.

What thou art now, our hopes would gladly tell;
What thou wert once, our tears declare too well.

ON THE INVENTION OF LETTERS.

In early times, the Press as yet unknown,
The artist carv'd his hieroglyphic stone,
The lasting pile ambition sought to raise,
To gratify his ardent thirst of praise:
While round him mouldering ruins mock'd his care,
And show'd th' oblivious fate his toil must share;
Whilst genius pensive sat in thought profound,
Mourning the spoils of ages scatter'd round!
Benighted reason slumber'd in the breast,
Lull'd by the gloom of ignorance to rest:
The trackless age with rapid pinion flew,
And dropp'd the veil that clos'd the distant view.
Muse! to my pensive hours for ever dear,
With brighter scenes my languid spirits cheer;
From man unletter'd as I willing turn,
Let me the guardian hand of Heaven discern.
Blest be his shade in endless realms of light,
Who bade the alphabet dispel our night;
Those wond'rous symbols, that can still retain
The phantom forms that pass along the brain;
O'er unsubstantial thought hold strong control,
And fix the essence of th' immortal soul.
Man unreluctant meets the general doom,
His mind embalm'd defies th' o'erwhelming tomb;
Lives in fresh vigour through succeeding years,
Nor yields its powers whilst nature guides the spheres.
Where swelling Nile his fertilizing stores
O'er thirsty Egypt unexhausted pours;
Where plenty, rising from the reeking soil,
Bends with the load that asks no human toil;
And every charm luxuriant nature brings,
Spontaneous from her teeming bosom springs;—
Industrious science form'd the great design,
To range in words the alphabetic sign;
On language, permanence and life bestow'd,
Of written thought the first rude effort show'd;
And as the rays of morning's golden eye
Streak with resplendent light the eastern sky,
So with mild beam the sun of learning rose,
That round us now a noontide lustre throws!

Immortal spirits! ye who first could feel
For learning's pure delights a holy zeal;
Who first the ever-wasting lamp renew'd,
Wrapt in the joys of thankful solitude;
And rais'd the temple on eternal base
To knowledge sacred, and the human race,
Through drear oblivion's boundless vortex lost,—
Sages! we mourn your great productions lost:
Yet be your worth in every distant clime
Acknowledg'd thro' the thickening mists of time!

VOLCANIC REMAINS IN MEXICO.

We gave in a former number (p. 32) an account of a large tract of country covered with lava, we now subjoin the following from the same work.

"If I was surprised in passing the crater of the volcano, in my way to Perote, I was astonished at here beholding the contents probably of that very crater before me, filling an extensive valley, many leagues in length, with an immense sea of lava, which, from the slope of the mountain that bounded it, I should judge in several places to be many hundred fathoms thick, converting what had been a deep valley into a vast plain of solid rock, on whose surface the marks of its progress and violent agitation, when in a state of fusion, are as fresh as if the event had taken place but yesterday, except that in some places a few stunted and scanty specimens of vegetation appeared in some of the fissures of the iron-like lava. We rode on for about a mile and a half with tolerable ease, when the route gradually became worse. It began to assume a wave-like appearance, and the cracks or fissures were so large that our horses were in momentary danger of falling into them, so that it was impossible to take them further.—We accordingly rested about half an hour, which gave me time to examine the place where we had halted, which certainly exhibits one of the most extraordinary and wonderful effects of the convulsions of nature that even came under my observation. The basaltic formation of the Giant's Causeway, of Staffa, or the more gigantic ones of the Shant Isles, falls very short of the wondrous appearance of this valley. On our first entrance upon it, the lava appeared to have cooled in almost a quiescent state, its surface being only marked by slight concentric circles: but in a short time these increased in size, and rose in sharp ridges of several feet high, and occasionally swelled in the bubble-like form seen in the crater: to these succeeded large waves, rising to a considerable height, and their tops rent into the most fantastic shapes. In other places, the lava exhibited the appearance of huge boiling cauldrons, which had burst and emptied themselves in violent torrents. On the left, near the edges, cataracts, several hundred yards wide, had swept down immense masses of broken rocks, some of them many hundred tons weight;—these, floating like corks on the melted lava, had met with some impediments in their way, and remain, piled upon each other by the impetuous burning stream, in the most extraordinary manner; leaving to distant ages these striking proofs of the horrid combustion of internal subterraneous fires, by which the higher mountain districts have been formed."

THE FURIA INFERNALIS.

Linnæus in describing this animal, of the existence of which many have expressed their incredulity, tells us it is to be met with in the vast marshy plains of Bothnia and Finland, where it crawls up shrubs and sedge grass, and being carried forward by the wind, penetrates suddenly into such exposed parts of men and horses as are not perpendicularly situated. It quickly buries itself under the skin, leaving a black point where it entered, which is soon succeeded by excruciating pain, inflammation and gangrene of the part, swooning and death. This all happens in a day or two, frequently within a few hours, unless the animal be extracted, which is done by carefully dissecting the muscles where it has entered. The statement of this eminent naturalist has been fully confirmed by modern travellers in Norway and Sweden. W. W. C.

AN ENGLISH COUNTRY WAKE.

WAKES IN ENGLAND.

in of Wakes.—Wakes, or watches, so called from othic word waken, or the Saxon wacian, originated e idolatrous superstition of paganism. Wakes were ly festivals kept in honour of the tutelar divinities e anniversaries of the dedication of their temples. r. Kennett, in his "Roman Antiquities," observes, e ceremony of the consecration of temples (a piece uperstition very well worth our notice), we cannot r apprehend than by the following account which tus gives us of that solemnity in reference to apitol, when repaired by Vespasian; though per- the chief rites were celebrated upon the entire ng of the structure, this being probably intended for the hallowing the floor. 'Upon the 21st of , being a very clear day, the whole plot of ground gned for the temple was bound about with fillets garlands. Such of the soldiers as had lucky names, red first with boughs in their hands, taken from e trees which the gods more especially delighted Next came the vestal virgins, with boys and girls se fathers and mothers were living, and sprinkled place with brook-water, river-water, and spring- r. Then Heloidius Priscus, the Prætor (Plautus n, one of the chief priests, going before him), after ad performed the solemn sacrifice of a swine, a p, and a bullock, for the purgation of the floor, and the entrails upon a green turf, humbly besought ter, Juno, Minerva, and the other deities, protectors he empire, that they would be pleased to prosper their present undertaking, and accomplish, by their divine assistance, what human piety had thus begun. Having concluded this prayer, he put his hands to the fillets, to which the ropes, with a great stone fastened to them, had been tied for this occasion; when immediately the whole company of priests, senators, and knights, with the greatest part of the common people, laying hold together on the rope, with all the expressions of joy, drew the stone into the trench designed for the foundation, throwing in wedges of gold, silver, and other metals, which had never endured the fire.'"

These dedications were solemnized and commemorated with all the extravagance of superstition, and with all the licentious impurities inseparable from pagan idolatry, and continued, on some occasions, for several days and nights.

Popish Wakes.—The learned Mr. Whitaker, in his History of Manchester, has given a particular account of the origin of English wakes and fairs. He observes, that "every church at its consecration received the name of some particular saint: this custom was practised among the Roman Britons, and continued among the Saxons; and in the council of Cealchythe, in 816, the name of the denominating saint was expressly required to be inscribed on the altars, and also on the walls of the church, or a tablet within it. The feast of this saint became of course the festival of the church. Thus Christian festivals were substituted in the room of the idolatrous anniversaries of heathenism: accordingly, at the first introduction of Christianity among the Jutes of Kent, Pope Gregory the Great advised, that what had previously been done among the Britons, should be continued—that Christian festivals should be instituted in the room of the idolatrous, and the suffering day of the martyr whose relics were reposited in the church, or the day on which the building was actually dedicated, to be the established feast of the parish. Both were appointed and observed; and they were clearly distinguished at first among the Saxons, as appears from the laws of the Confessor. Thus instituted at first, the day of the tutelar saint was observed, most probably by the Britons, and certainly by the Saxons, with great devotion. When Pope Gregory recommended the festival of the patron saint, he advised the people to erect booths of branches about the churches on the day of the festival, and to feast and be merry in them with innocence. Accordingly, in every parish, on the returning anniversary of the saint, little pavilions were constructed of boughs, and the people indulged in them in hospitality and mirth. The feasting of the saint's day, however, was soon abused; and even in the body of the church, when the people were assembled for devotion, they began to mind diversions, and to introduce drinking. These celebrities were the cause of those commercial marts, which we denominate fairs. The people resorted in crowds to the festival; and a considerable provision being wanted for their entertainment, little traders were invited by interest to bring their wares for sale. Thus among the many pavilions for hospitality in the neighbourhood of a church, various booths were erected for the sale of different commodities. In larger towns and populous districts, the resort of the people to the WAKES would be great, and the attendance of the traders numerous; and this resort and attendance constitute a FAIR," from the Latin word feria, a holiday.

PROTESTANT WAKES.—Those holy men, who effected the Reformation from Popery, were determinately opposed to the ancient wakes with their immoralities: but they were not able to accomplish the perfection of their various plans, many of them being numbered with the "Noble Army of Martyrs." Elizabeth restored the Reformation in part; but much of popery remained in numerous festivals and ceremonies, though many holy men, retaining the spirit of the Reformers, laboured for greater purity in the externals of religion, and the abolition of the demoralizing and pernicious customs: hence they were denominated Puritans. Their influence with the religious and sober part of the nation was very great; but King James disliked their strict, scriptural morality. He therefore commanded Bishop Moreton to draw up a declaration, commonly known by the name of the "Book of Sports," to encourage recreations and sports on festivals and on the Lord's day. It states, "That for his good people's recreation, his Majesty's pleasure is, that, after the end of divine service, they should not be disturbed, letted, or discouraged, from any lawful recreations; such as dancing, either of men or women; archery for men; leaping, vaulting, or any such harmless recreations; nor having of May-games, Whitson-ales, or May-poles, or other sports therewith used, so as the same may be had in due and convenient time, without impediment or let of divine service; and that women should have to carry rushes into the church for the decoring of it, according to their old customs; withal prohibiting all unlawful games to be used on Sundays only; as bear-baiting, bull-baiting, interludes, and at all times (in the meaner sort of people prohibited) bowling." This declaration was ordered to be read in all the parish churches of Lancashire especially, where papists abounded: and it was to have been read in all the churches throughout England, but that the pious Archbishop Abbot peremptorily forbad its being read at Croydon, where he was residing. This refusal cost the upright prelate his favour with his sovereign, as the court had their balls, masquerades, and plays, even on the Lord's day evenings!

Archbishop Laud, in the reign of Charles I, was a perfect contrast to holy Abbot, and he revived the wakes and Sunday revels. Pierce, Bishop of Bath and Wells, in reply to the archbishop, who was offended with the judges for prohibiting them, says, "The late suppression of the revels was very unacceptable, and that the restitution of them would be very grateful to the gentry, clergy, and common people: for proof of which he had procured the hands of seventy-two of his clergy, in whose parishes these feasts are kept; and he believes that if he had sent for a hundred more he should have had the same answer from them all; but these seventy-two," says his lordship, "are like the seventy-two interpreters that agreed so soon in the translation of the Old Testament in the Greek. There are in Somersetshire," says he, "not only feasts of dedication (wakes), but also church-ales, clerk-ales, and bid-ales."

"The Feasts of Dedication are in memory of the dedication of the several churches; those churches dedicated to the Holy Trinity have their feasts on Trinity-Sunday; and so all the feasts are kept upon the Sunday before or after the saint's day to whom the churches are dedicated, because the people have not leisure to observe them on the week-day; this (says his lordship) is acceptable to the people, who otherwise go into the tipling houses, or else to conventicles.

"Church-Ales are, when the people go from afternoon prayers on Sunday to their lawful sports and pastimes in the churchyard, or in the neighbourhood, in some public-house, where they drink and make merry.

"Clerk-Ales, are so called, because they were for the better maintenance of the parish-clerk, &c.,—the people, thinking it unfit that the clerk should duly attend at church and gain but small wages, send him in provision, and then come on Sundays, and feast with him, by which means he sells more ale, &c.

"A Bid-Ale is, when a poor man, decayed in his substance, is set up again by the liberal benevolence and contribution of his friends at a Sunday's feast."

English Wakes in the Nineteenth Century.

We are not acquainted with every parish in the kingdom; but we well know, that many of the evils before enumerated, have been abolished, or greatly counteracted in not a few parishes in different parts of the country. The active vigilance of patriotic magistrates; the establishment of Sunday-schools for the religious education of the poor; and especially the indefatigable zeal of itinerant preachers of the gospel, of different denominations, have been the means of incalculable benefit. Parts of Staffordshire, for example, at the commencement of this century, presented scenes the most shocking in many parishes among the colliers, nailers, iron-makers, miners, &c.: cock-fighting, bull-baiting, badger-baiting, bear-baiting, with every species of profaneness, intemperance, impurity, and brutality. In those same districts godliness now prevails in an eminent degree; and Wednesbury, Darlaston, Tipton, Bilston, Oldbury, &c. &c., now are blessed with many chapels, where the gospel is preached faithfully and "with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven." Still an affecting measure of ungodliness prevails; and much remains to be done, fully to evangelize the people.

Greenwich on Easter and Whit-Sunday, with several following days, and Deptford, on Trinity Sunday, with following days, are still cursed with almost every of iniquity in their Fairs. And though we ·cified only a few places, there are many, which d name, in and around London, Manchester, ·ham, &c., where scenes are exhibited, and

.tions committed, over which every Christian nust sincerely mourn.

ritish Magazine (conducted by clergymen) for ath, August, states "that there are at the moment about 15,000 boys in the metropolis, of the poor, who have no visible means of ice, and who are in fact trained to every va-vice.—The unchecked continuance of such f things threatens to sap the foundations of civilized society. We therefore earnestly beg to call the attention of the public to these alarming facts." These, with many of their elders, both in years and wickedness, throng the Wakes and Fairs around our metropolis, prompt for every species of immorality and villany; nor is it possible for our servants, and families, and property, to be unaffected by such a state of society. Education, Religion, and Employment, are indispensable to correct these evils: and they demand the persevering exertions of Magistrates, Ministers of the Gospel, and Sunday-School Teachers, the best and most efficient of all Philanthropists.

urth practice prevalent at Wakes is drunken- ıis, indeed, may be considered as their general e feature.

"A fifth practice, which at these seasons almost as universally prevails, is that of fighting. The Wakes form a sort of general centre, where all the dissolute characters in the neighbourhood, and the disturbers of the public peace, may meet, and indulge their violent and ungovernable propensities.

"To all these dreadful evils, attendant on the Wakes, I might add many others, evidently promoted by them, such as profane cursing and swearing—gambling—wasteful improvidence—extravagance—vanity, and finery in dress—idleness, loss of time, and such like. But those which I have specified are sufficient for my purpose. They prove, beyond a doubt, the point, in support of which I have adduced them. Is not the crime, which has been committed among us, the natural and almost the necessary consequence of the practices which I have been describing? Do not sabbath-breaking, cruelty, lewdness, drunkenness, and fighting, tend in the most obvious way to produce bloodshed and murder?——See the fruit, the harvest of the seed which you have been so profusely sowing for so many years. See the natural tendency of Sabbath-breaking, of lewdness, of drunkenness, and fightings. No longer pretend to be ignorant of the consequences to which they lead. Bloodshed and murder follow in their train: and those who encourage the practices which lead to the commission of these crimes, are justly chargeable with a portion of the guilt which attaches to the commission of them."

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ADAM.

Sect. VII.—The Expulsion of Adam from Paradise.

Paradise, as specially planted, and richly furnished by the overflowing benevolence of God, was no longer a suitable place of habitation for our fallen parents. They had forfeited every expression of favour from their Maker: and though "grace reigned through righteousness by Jesus Christ our Lord," they must depart from the garden of Eden. The sight of "the tree of knowledge of good and evil" might serve to aggravate their misery; and beholding "the tree of life," they might be tempted to abandon faith in the promised Saviour,—to cherish presumption, and endeavour to secure immortality by improper means, in a way not ordained or approved by their gracious God.

"And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil: and now lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat and live for ever: therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken. So he drove out the man." Gen. iv, 22—24.

Adam appears to have been unwilling to leave Paradise, the delightful place which was the Divine plantation. He might fear the pressure of want, in an uncultivated and cursed world; or the assaults of powerful beasts, having thrown off their allegiance, and become wild and fierce, as if to avenge their insulted Maker; or the bold and insidious attacks of fallen spirits, seeking to plunge him into depths of misery still deeper, to his eternal ruin; and he lingered till Divine justice expelled him. "So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east end of the garden of Eden, Cherubim, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life." Ver. 24.

Terribly dreadful must have been the sight of those majestic servants of God, stationed at Eden's entrance, "to keep the way of the tree of life."

> "They looking back, all th' eastern side beheld
> Of Paradise, so late their happy seat,
> Wav'd over by that flaming brand, the gate
> With dreadful faces throng'd and fiery arms:
> Some natural tears they dropt, but wip'd them soon:
> The world was all before them, where to choose
> Their place of rest, and Providence their guide:
> They hand in hand, with wand'ring steps and slow,
> Through Eden took their solitary way."
> Paradise Lost.

The remainder of Adam's history is almost wholly concealed from our knowledge: yet so far as we possess information, we see that it corresponded with his fallen condition. In process of time he was delighted to become a father: and Eve, in the transports of her overflowing joy, called her first born Cain, which signifies a possession. The possession she seems fondly to have supposed that she had gained, was the promised seed, who should bruise the serpent's head: but alas! how illusory were her hopes! She soon discovered her mistake; and, therefore, to express her feelings, when she brought forth her next son, she call him Abel, which signifies vanity.

Adam would probably cherish the anticipation of much comfort in these two sons, and observe them with growing delight, increasing in wisdom and stature, while he infused into their opening minds the lessons of sacred knowledge. But they were born in sin, in the image of their fallen father; and though they were "brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," Cain his first-born was an irreligious infidel! Abel was a believer, a man of sincere religion; by which he condemned the unholy life of his elder brother; who, hurried on by the strength of his ungoverned passions, and enslaved by the power of Satan, embrued his murderous hands in the blood of his pious brother's life.

To express or even to conceive the feelings of Adam on this occasion is utterly impossible. He would regard the horrible deed as the consequence of his own transgression; and reflections of the bitterest kind would harrow up his soul: yet "the sin of the murderer was probably far more distressing to him than the sufferings of the martyr."

Besides Cain and Abel, Adam had many "sons and daughters," who were multiplied during his life, so as to fill the earth. In the one hundred and thirtieth year of Adam's life, the Lord gave unto him another son, instead of Abel, whom Cain had murdered. This son Eve named Seth, signifying settled; and he appears to have been a holy man of God. Adam lived to see the multitude of his descendants evince the consequences of his own apostacy in increasing wickedness, and died at the age of nine hundred and thirty years, as it is believed, in the lively hope of his personal interest in immortal glory, through Christ the promised Saviour.

Sect. VIII.—Adam a Type of Christ.

Contemplating sin and death as the consequences of Adam's transgression, the apostle speaks of Jesus Christ as "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven," of whom the first man was a remarkable type, the figure of him that was to come." 1 Cor. xv, 45—47; Rom. v, 14. The typical character of Adam may be considered in many striking particulars, a few of which it will be indispensable to notice.

I. Adam was "the son of God" (Luke iii, 38), that is, he was the immediate offspring, the peculiar production of the Creator.—Christ, in an unspeakable and inconceivable manner, was God's dear Son, the only begotten of the Father. 1 John i, 18; iii, 16—18.

II. Adam was created in the image of his Maker.—Christ is "the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person." Heb. i, 3.

III. Adam was constituted lord of this lower world for the government of its creatures.—Christ is Lord of all,—the Creator, Preserver, and Sovereign of all; and as Mediator, he is appointed to receive the homage of the whole intelligent universe. Col. i, 16, 17; Rev. v, 12, 13.

IV. Adam was the common father of all mankind, through whose disobedience, they are heirs of sin and death.—Christ is "the everlasting Father" of his people, from whom, as a quickening spirit, they derive spiritual life. He is "the surety of the better testament," "the head of the body the church," through whose obedience all believers are heirs of life eternal. Isa. ix, 6; Heb. vii, 22; Rom. v, 14—21.

V. Adam is commended to us in his marriage in Paradise, as prefiguring the mysterious union and reciprocal affection between Christ and his church. "For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church; and he is the Saviour of the body." Eph. v, 23.

The satisfaction of our Lord and Saviour, as the surety of the new covenant, answered fully to the sentence pronounced upon Adam, and it is the means of life and salvation to all believers. Did our labour, pain, and sorrow come upon us through the sin of Adam?—The travail of Christ's soul brings us health, and peace, and bliss eternal. Did the curse come upon us by sin?—"Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." Is our degradation and expulsion from communion with God the fruit of sin?—We are brought nigh to God by the blood of Christ, and through him Jews and Gentiles have access by one Spirit unto the Father, and are made the children of God by gracious adoption. Is our ignorance of God and of spiritual things the consequence of sin?—Christ is made our wisdom; and by his word and Spirit effectually instructs us and makes us wise unto salvation. Are we unholy and impure by sin?—Christ is become the source, and pattern, and giver of personal and entire sanctification. Are we unworthy by defilement and guilt?—Christ is "the Lord our righteousness." Are we the subjects of death through Adam's transgression?—Christ "has brought life and immortality to light by his gospel," and "the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Do our young readers sincerely believe these things? Do they receive the doctrines of the Scriptures concerning the second Adam? and do they worship the Father in spirit and in truth by faith in Jesus Christ? Such, and only such, are interested in the salvation which is in Christ Jesus; and they, and only they, shall finally obtain everlasting glory in Paradise restored.

ICE PALACE.

The annals of the reign of Catherine II, make mention of one ephemeral palace, which, like that of Pandæmonium,

> "—— Out of the earth, a fabric huge,
> Rose like an exhalation;"

and like an exhalation vanished, not leaving a wreck behind. From a true and particular account of this ice palace, drawn up by Kraft, an imperial academician, and published at St. Petersburgh the year after its erection, it appears, that seven years before, an ice castle had been built on the river Neva; but the ice bent under the weight of the edifice and of the soldiers who garrisoned it. To avoid a similar defect in the foundation, it was resolved, on the occasion of the marriage of Prince Galitzin, in 1740, to erect a palace of ice on terra firma; and a site was chosen between the imperial winter palace and the admiralty, one of the lords of the bed-chamber being appointed to superintend the works. The palace was constructed of blocks of ice, from two to three feet thick, cut out of the winter covering of the Neva; these being properly adjusted, water was poured between them, which acted as cement, consolidating the whole into one immense mass of ice. The length of the edifice was fifty-six feet, its breadth seventeen feet and a half, and its height twenty-one. It was constructed according to the strictest rules of art; and was adorned with a portico, columns, and statues. It consisted of a single story, the front of which was provided with a door and fourteen windows; the frames of the latter, as well as the panes, being all formed of ice. The sides of the doors and of the windows were painted in imitation of green marble. On each side of the door was a dolphin, from the mouths of which, by means of naphtha, volumes of flames were emitted in the evening. Next to them were two mortars, equal to eighty pounders, from which many bombs were thrown, a quarter of a pound of powder being used for each charge. On each side of the mortars stood three cannons, equal to three pounders, mounted upon carriages, and with wheels, which were often used. In the presence of a number of persons attached to the court, a bullet was driven through a board two inches thick, at the distance of sixty paces, by one of these cannons, a quarter of a pound of powder being also used for a charge. The interior of the edifice had no ceiling, and consisted of a lobby and two large apartments, one on each side, which were well furnished, and painted in the most elegant manner, though formed merely of ice. Tables, chairs, statues, looking-glasses, candlesticks, watches, and other ornaments, besides tea-dishes, tumblers, wine-glasses, and even plates with provisions in one apartment, also formed of ice, and painted of their natural colours; while in the other were to be seen a state bed, with curtains, bed, pillows, and bed clothes, two pair of slippers, and two night caps of the same cold material. Behind the cannon, the mortars, and the dolphins, stretched a low balustrade. On each side of the building was a small entrance. Here were pots with flowers and orange trees, partly formed of ice, and partly natural, on which birds sat. Beyond these were erected two icy pyramids. On the right of one of them stood an elephant, which was hollow, and so contrived as to throw out burning naphtha; while a person within it, by means of a tube, imitated the natural cries of the animal. On the left of the other pyramid was seen the never-failing concomitant of all princely dwellings in Russia, a banya, or bath, apparently formed of balks, which is said to have been sometimes heated, and even to have been appropriated to use.

The appearance of the ice palace, it is said, was remarkably splendid when lighted up in the evening with numerous candles. Amusing transparencies were usually suspended in the windows to increase the effect; and the emission of flames by the dolphins and the elephant, all tended to excite greater surprise, while the people beheld the crystalline mass.

Thus, there wanted not, to carry on the parallel between this palace and the magical edifice which Milton describes,

> "——— Many a row
> Of starry lamps and blazing cressets, fed
> With naphtha and asphaltus, yielding light
> As from a sky. The hasty multitude
> Admiring enter'd; and the work some prais'd,
> And some the architect."

Crowds of visitors were continually seen around this fantastic and unique construction, which remained entire from the beginning of January almost to the middle of March. The glassy fabric then began to melt, and was soon afterwards broken into pieces, and the ruins were conveyed to the imperial ice-cellar. On the wisdom displayed in the construction of this costly emblem of mundane glory, the reader may make his own comment.—Modern Traveller.

DRUNKENNESS.

A Welchman was for some time awfully habituated to the vice of drunkenness, but was at length restored to sobriety by the following singular incident. He had a tame goat which would follow him to the alehouse he frequented. One day, by way of frolic, he gave the animal so much ale that it became intoxicated. What particularly struck the Welchman was, that from that time, though the creature would follow him to the door, he never could get it to enter the house. He was thereby led to see how much his sin had sunk him beneath a beast, and from that time became a sober man.

THE SUPERSTITIOUS BRAMIN.

A Bramin at Benares was so cautious of causing the death of any living animal, that before him as he walked, the place was swept, that he might not destroy any insect: the air was fanned when he ate for the same purpose. Some mischievous European gave him a microscope to look at the water he drank. On seeing the animalculæ, he threw down and broke the instrument, and vowed that he would not drink water again: he kept his promise, and died.

THE PALM TREE.

THIS tree grows in a stately column from thirty to fifty feet in height, "crowned," says Forbes, "with a verdant capital of waving branches, covered with long spiral leaves." Though the tree arrives at maturity thirty years after planting, it continues in full strength seventy years longer, producing annually fifteen or twenty clusters of dates, each weighing fifteen or twenty pounds. It is one of the most beautiful trees in the vegetable kingdom, upright, lofty, and verdant. Though it often grows in a soil apparently dry and sterile, a subterraneous supply of water may be calculated upon. Sir Philip Smith, when in Egypt, told the British officers that they might always find water by digging to the roots of a palm tree. Carne, in his "Letters from the East" gives many instances as a confirmation of this fact: his route to the pyramids led occasionally through woods of palm or date trees, where, fatigued with heat and thirst, he enjoyed the refreshment of "delicious water." And then again in the valley of Paran, "we halted," says he, "in a beautiful grove of palm trees, in which was a spring of excellent water." In Egypt, where it is an object of considerable attention, he had experience of their value, meeting with them, as he did, in the barren and sandy places, destitute of all other verdure and exposed to the scorching sun, where they delightfully interrupted the monotony of the scene, and grouping together, afforded a most grateful and refreshing shade. The beautiful town of Rosetta stands encircled by them, and, scattered at intervals around, they rise high above the highest of the buildings. Upon the northern skirts of the desert of Sin, two leagues from Tor, Dr. Shaw tells us he saw more than two thousand palm trees, and "nine of the wells spoken of in Scripture, the other three being filled up by those drifts of sand which are common in Arabia:" under the shade of these trees is the bath which is held by the inhabitants of Tor in extraordinary veneration, and which they call the bath of Moses.

In Palestine it grew so abundantly, that "it was a common symbol of the country; many coins of Vespasian and other emperors being extant, in which Judea is personified by a disconsolate woman sitting under a palm tree." Pliny also calls Judea by a name signifying "renowned for palms." In Jericho, where the soil is sandy and climate warm, several species of the tree are still found. Strabo and Josephus, who celebrate the palm trees of Palestine, particularly notice those of Jericho.

The utility of this tree is not less remarkable than its beauty. Its clusters of fruit, which are frequently very large, furnish a great part of the diet of the inhabitants of Arabia and Persia; whole families in Upper Egypt, we are told, subsist entirely upon it. This is gathered with great care and ceremony; and it may be mentioned as a peculiar characteristic of the palm, that its external structure is so formed, as to supply the steps for an easy ascent to man, in order to obtain the fruit which grows at the top of the tree (from which alone the branches spring), while it denies access to beasts of all kinds. "Besides dates," says Calmet, "it produces a kind of honey, little inferior to common honey, and they likewise draw a wine from it much used in the East.

Gibbon says that the Asiatics celebrated three hundred and sixty uses to which the trunk, branches, leaves, juice, and fruit were applied.

The palm or branch of the palm tree was carried before conquerors in processions and rejoicings for victory. The Jews sent a golden branch of a palm tree to the kings of Syria, as a kind of tribute or present.—Scripture Garden Walk.

TEOCALLI, OR GREAT TEMPLE OF MEXITLI,

IN MEXICO.

THIS temple was a truncated pyramid 120 feet high, and 318 feet square at its base, situated in the midst of a vast enclosure of walls, and consisting of five stories, like some of the pyramids of Saccara. When seen from a distance, it appeared an enormous cube, with small altars, covered with wooden cupolas on the top. The point where these cupolas terminated, was 177 feet above the pavement of the enclosure. The material of which the pyramids was built, is supposed to have been clay, faced with a porous stone resembling pumice-stone, hard and smooth, but easily destructible. De Solis gives the following description of this edifice, on the authority chiefly of Acosta:

"The first part of the building was a great square, with a wall of hewn stone, wrought on the outside with various knots of serpents intertwisted, which gave a horror to the portico, and were not improperly placed there. At a little distance from the principal gate was a place of worship, not less terrible: it was built of stone, with thirty steps of the same, which went up to the top, where was a kind of long flat roof, and a great many trunks of well-grown trees fixed in it, in a row, with holes bored in them at equal distances, and through which, from one tree to another, passed several bars run through the heads of men who had been sacrificed, of whose number (which cannot be repeated without horror) the priests of the temple took exact account, placing others in the room of those which had been wasted by time. A lamentable trophy, in which the enemy of mankind displayed his rancour, and which these barbarians always had in view, without the least remorse! for inhumanity put on the mask of devotion, and custom had rendered death in all its terrors familiar to their eyes. The four sides of the square had as many gates opening to the four winds. Over each of these gates were four statues of stone, which seemed to point the way, as if they were desirous to send back such as approached with an ill disposition of mind. These were presumed to be threshold gods, because they had some reverences paid them at the entrance. Close to the inside of the wall were the habitations of the priests, and of those who, under them, attended the service of the temple, with some offices; which altogether took up the whole circumference, without retrenching so much from that vast square, but that eight or ten thousand persons had sufficient room to dance in it upon their solemn festivals. In the centre of this square stood a pile of stone, which in the open air exalted its lofty head, overlooking all the towers of the city, gradually diminishing till it formed a half-pyramid; three of its sides were smooth, the fourth had stairs wrought in the stone; a sumptuous building, and extremely well proportioned. It was so high that the stair-case contained a hundred and twenty steps, and of so large a compass, that on the top it terminated in a flat forty feet square: the pavement was beautifully laid with jasper stones of all colours: the rails, which went round in nature of a balustrade, were of a serpentine form, and both sides covered with stones resembling jet, placed in good order, and joined with white and red cement, which was a very great ornament to the building. On the opening of the rails, where the stairs ended, were two marble statues, which supported, in a manner that admirably well expressed the straining of the arms, two huge candlesticks of an extraordinary make. A little further was a green stone, five spans high from the ground, which terminated in an angle, and whereon they extended on his back the miserable victim they were about to sacrifice, and opened his breast to take out his heart. Beyond this stone, fronting the staircase, stood a chapel of excellent workmanship and materials, covered with a roof of precious timber. Here the idol was placed on a high altar, behind curtains: it was of human figure, sitting in a chair which had some resemblance of a throne, sustained by a blue globe, which they called Heaven, from the sides whereof came four rods, with their ends resembling the heads of serpents, which the priests placed upon their shoulders, when they exposed their idol to public view. It had on its head a helm composed of plumes of various colours, in form of a bird, with a bill and crest of burnished gold: its countenance was severe and horrible, and still more deformed with two blue bands, which bound its forehead and its nose. In the right hand it held a curling serpent, which served for a staff, and in the left, four arrows, which they venerated as a present from heaven, and a shield with five white plumes placed in the form of a cross: and concerning these ornaments, these ensigns and colours, they related many remarkable extravagances, with a seriousness deserving to be pitied. On the left hand of this chapel was another of the same make and bigness, with an idol called Tlaloch, in every respect resembling his companion. They were esteemed brothers and friends to such a degree, that they divided between them the patronage of war, equal in power, and unanimous in inclination; for which reasons the Mexicans addressed them both with the same prayers, the same sacrifices, and the same thanksgivings. The ornaments of both chapels were of inestimable value; the walls were hung and the altars covered with jewels and precious stones, placed on feathers of various colours: and they had eight temples in the city of almost the same architecture, and of equal wealth. Those of a smaller size amounted to two thousand, and were dedicated to as many idols, of different names, forms, and attributes. There was scarce a street without its tutelar deity; nor was there any calamity incident to nature without its altar, to which they might have recourse for a remedy. In a word, their gods were derived from their fears, nor did they reflect how they lessened the power of some by what they attributed to others. Thus did the devil continually enlarge his dominions, and exercise a most deplorable tyranny over rational creatures, in the possession of which he remained for so many ages, by the incomprehensible permission of the Most High."—Modern Traveller.

HOSPITAL SCENES.

(Abridged from the Cottage Magazine.)

On a recent visit to the metropolis, among other scenes of distress, few were so interesting to me as the great metropolitan hospitals. Retiring from the bustle of the public streets, those vast asylums filled with the consequences of sin, are to be found stretching forth their long ranges of windows, with here and there a withered plant hesitating between life and death in the casement—an apparent emblem of many a sinking frame within. In one of those melancholy abodes our attention was led to a patient, whose mortal career was evidently drawing to a close. It was a young woman whose faded cheek every token of health had long since fled for ever. Her eyes, which appeared once to have possessed uncommon beauty, were now supernaturally enlarged. Her head and face were bound up with linen bandages, and had it not been for the hectic flush of disease which mantled over her forehead, we might at times have thought her a corpse in her grave clothes. "She is not long for this world," whispered the nurse. "I fear not," said I; "pray how long has she been under your care?" "Only a few weeks, Sir," said the nurse. "She was found dying for want, and almost consumed with disease, in the streets." "A woman who was a sinner, I suppose." "You are right, Sir, in your conjecture. We are told that she was once one of the gayest of the gay, and dressed as finely as any of them; but it is now all over, poor thing—it is all over now." "Does she seem to be in much distress of mind?" said I. "At times she weeps like rain—her poor frame shakes under the mental agony." At this time the poor dying girl began to awake from a slight doze. "Who is that, nurse, who is that?" said she. "It is a gentleman come to see how you are." "God bless him," said she hastily; "it is a long time since any one came to inquire after Margaret." She sunk back into her state of lethargy. The name struck me. Margaret, thought I, how familiar is that name to me. I approached the bed: she did not answer me. I could not leave the room, without at least endeavouring to speak one word in season to one who was evidently so near the region of the shadow of death. Bending down I said, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." I know not whether she heard or understood me, nor shall I ever know on this side of the grave; but, if she did, the gospel message was delivered. Oh! how important it is to give up our minds to God before disease and death has touched them, and blasted them for ever! Not many days after, I called to inquire after her. I approached her bed, but it was empty. The sick, the afflicted, the dying lay around, but the dead had been carried away. She had dozed on, the nurse told me, in one unconscious dream, till the tide of life had ebbed for ever, and she awoke in eternity. "Man dieth and wasteth away, yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" Whilst I was musing upon this solemn event, the nurse brought me a book which she had found after her death, under her pillow. It was an old-fashioned little book by one of the puritans, "The Tears of a Magdalen," full of touching exhortations and sweet scriptural doctrine. As I was turning over its leaves in melancholy mood, a card fell from between them. I took it up, and was still more deeply affected to find inscribed upon it, "D——— Sunday School."

"THE WAGES OF SIN IS DEATH!"

ROBERT HALL AND MATTHEW HENRY'S COMMENTARY.

I think it was in the month of February, that Mr. Hall told me that he had commenced Matthew Henry. He observed, "I have often read portions of it, and consulted it; but I have now begun with the first chapter of Genesis, and I mean to read the work through regularly; I have set myself, Sir, two chapters every morning, and I anticipate it as a feast. That is the way to read Matthew Henry, Sir; I discover new beauties in him every day, that are not obvious when reading detached parts. I would advise you to adopt the same method, Sir; you will be quite delighted with it. I have found, that the most pious persons of my acquaintance, in the latter period of their lives, have been great readers of Henry. There must be something next to inspiration in him, Sir; for as face answers to face, so does the heart of one Christian to another." I asked his opinion of Scott's Commentary "O, it is a good work, Sir; but it is not to be compared to Henry; there is not that unction of spirit which there is in Henry." About a month or six weeks after this he said, "Well, Sir, I continue my plan of reading Matthew Henry every morning, and have come to the second chapter of Exodus; and am more and more delighted with him."—Greene's Life of Hall.

CHRIST CRUCIFIED.

Enough, enough! thy babbling verse
No more, vain Muse, prolong;
Henceforth with harp and lute rehearse
A nobler, holier song;
To Heav'n let loud Hosannas ring,
The triumph of our martyr'd King.

Amaz'd before th' abyss I pause
Of miracles profound,
And, wrapt in Heav'n's mysterious laws,
A wonder would expound;
A wonder angels cannot scan,—
How God immortal died for man.

Mercy of mercies! Son by Sire
To foes a hostage giv'n!
Three days a buried corpse, aspire
In glory back to heaven!
Captivity in thraldom led,
And death by death discomfited!

These would I sing: but groan and shriek
Of vengeance and of pain,
On Calvary's mount a story speak,—
The slayer and the slain:
Above the hill, look, high in air,—
Hang there not three in torment there?

And one the midst (nor anger He Alone, nor terror shows),
Outstretch'd upon th' accursed tree,
His forehead meekly bows;
His bleeding hands and ankles view,
With nails of iron broken through.

Vain, wretched man! behold, and wake!
With shame repentance blend;
Thy cheek and breast, for sorrow's sake,
Thy hair and garment rend;
Beat thy hard heart, and learn the bliss
Of anguish deep and dear as this!

Before thee runs the purple flood,—
No dye of Tyrian wave,—
But gushing deep from wounds of blood,
The crown of mockery gave;
Or lash'd from every stripe and sore
The cruel scourge hath furrow'd o'er.

Weep, child of man, insensate, weep;
The gates of grief set free;
The ground in tears for Jesus steep,
He drench'd in blood for thee.
For boon like His, grudge not in turn
The sacrifice of hearts that mourn.

BIGOTRY OVERRULED TO CIRCULATE THE BIBLE AT AN ENEMY'S EXPENSE.

In the year 1527, when good Mr. Tindal was an exile in Germany for his religion, God put it into his heart to translate the five books of Moses, and the whole of the New Testament, into English. But having lost his papers by a shipwreck, in his passage to Hamburgh, he had his work to begin again after he had written a considerable part. However, by patient perseverance in well-doing, he surmounted every difficulty, and accomplished his great design. To some of the books translated, he added prefaces, and notes to particular chapters and verses. This publication was sent over to England, and the bishops of that day were filled with consternation and alarm, at the appearance of the word of God in the language of the people, and were determined if possible to suppress it. The Bishop of London was remarkably active in this affair. He consulted a merchant in the city of the name of Packington, respecting the best means of defeating Tindal's object, and preventing the Scriptures being spread abroad and read. Packington, who is supposed to have been friendly to the Reformers, told the prelate, he thought the most likely method of securing his own design, would be to send over a sufficient sum of money to purchase the whole impression of Tindal. He did so; but the good man took care, as soon as possible, to procure another copy, one previously sold, for himself; and, with the bishop's money, he was supported, and enabled to proceed with the translation of the Bible, until he had prepared a perfect English copy of the sacred Scriptures. Hence they came over in great abundance. Sir Thomas More was then (A. D. 1532) Lord Chancellor, and having several persons before him accused of heresy, and ready for execution, he offered to compound with one of them for his life, on condition he would discover the people who maintained Tindal abroad, and enabled him to send the Bible into this country. George Constantine was the individual to whom the proposal was thus made, and when the poor man had got security for his life, he said, it was the Bishop of London: the Chancellor smiled, and observed, he believed it was so.

CHOLERA.

"An Address to the People of Great Britain, in consequence of the Alarming Fatality of Cholera, by B. Z." (price three pence), has been sent to us, and we [illegible] grateful to the unknown and pious author for such [illegible] publication. We trust it will be extensively read, [illegible] be a great blessing, as it is well adapted to pro[illegible] edification in its readers.

Perhaps the most admirable illustration of solic[illegible] to improve the awful visitation of our nation, is, [illegible] of some worthy Christian philanthropist sending to [illegible] Home Missionary Society, 100*l*. to build a small ch[illegible] at Easing Lane, Durham, for the accommodation of [illegible] poor neglected people of that neighbourhood. THE TABERNACLE, CITY ROAD, LONDON.

THE REV. GEORGE WHITFIELD, M. A.

"Whitfield's Tabernacle," of which we give a representation, leads us to give a short biography of its devoted founder. Whitfield was certainly one of the most extraordinary men of the eighteenth century; and his name, with that of his distinguished friend, the Rev. John Wesley, will be handed down to the latest generations, as one of the worthiest and most eminent benefactors of mankind.

Mr. Whitfield's father was a wine merchant, at Bristol, and afterwards an innkeeper in the city of Gloucester, where George, his youngest of six sons, was born in 1714. At two years of age his father died, and his education was somewhat neglected: but between the age of twelve and fifteen he made considerable proficiency in the Latin classics at the public grammar school. His mother's circumstances not being affluent, George assisted her in the business, for about two years; but the prevailing bent of his genius beginning to develop itself, in unusual devotional studies and the composition of sermons, one of which he dedicated to his eldest brother at Bristol, measures were taken for his education for the church.

At the age of eighteen, Whitfield entered Pembroke College, Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his excessive austerities and habits of devotion, and found in Mr. Charles Wesley a most kind and sympathizing friend. Two years after, in 1734, he joined the little band of pious men (Mr. Charles Wesley, Mr. James Hervey, Mr. Morgan, and Mr. Kirkham), who associated with Mr. John Wesley for the study of the Greek Testament, and the mutual advancement of their personal religion; and thus originated the Methodists in England.

Deeply affected with the prevailing ignorance and impiety, they began their career in the city of Oxford, seeking all opportunities for diffusing religious knowledge among the poor, and the wretched inmates of the prisons.

His father dying in 1735, Mr. John Wesley was induced to accompany General Oglethorpe to the new colony of Georgia, in North America, as chaplain, and in the hope of preaching the Gospel to the Indians. Whitfield returned to his native city, Gloucester, where he was successful in the conversion of several young men, who united with him in pious exercises. He made frequent visits to the county goal, in which he read and prayed every day with the prisoners. His fame for piety and zeal reached the ears of Dr. Benson, Bishop of Gloucester, who sent for the young Methodist, declaring, that he should think it his duty to ordain him, when he chose to make the request, though he was only twenty-one years of age: and after having examined the articles of the church of England, and studied with prayer the Epistles to Timothy, he made application to the bishop, and was ordained deacon, June 30, 1736. The following Sunday he preached his first sermon, "On the Necessity and Benefits of Religious Society," in the church of Gloucester, in which he had been baptized.

"Curiosity," says Whitfield, "drew a large congregation together. The sight, at first, a little awed me. But I was comforted with a heart-sense of the Divine presence, and soon found the advantage of public speaking when a boy at school, and of exhorting and teaching the prisoners, and the poor people at their private houses, whilst at the university. By these means I was kept from being daunted. As I proceeded, I perceived the fire kindled, till at last, though so young, and amidst a crowd of those who knew me in my childish days, I trust I was enabled to speak with some degree of authority. Some few mocked, but most for the present seemed struck; and I have since heard, that a complaint was made to the bishop, that I drove fifteen mad the first sermon. The worthy prelate wished the madness might not be forgotten before the next Sunday."

Bishop Benson offered him a curacy: but he preferred returning to Oxford that he might prosecute his studies. Soon after he accepted an invitation to officiate at the chapel in the Tower of London, and preached his first sermon in the metropolis in August 1736, at Bishopsgate church, to a deeply affected congregation. He continued two months at the Tower, where he took great pains with the soldiers, and several young men who attended his sermons.

Letters, at this time, from the Wesleys, made him desirous of visiting America, and Mr. C. Wesley coming to England, to procure more labourers, Whitfield agreed to go; for which he waited on General Oglethorpe, who had returned to London. He did not embark till December 1737; but in the twelve months intervening, he preached in Bristol, Bath, Gloucester, and London, being invited by the committees of various charities, on account of his popularity. The subjects of his discourses were the essential doctrines of vital Christianity; and such were his natural powers of oratory, sanctified by a pious earnestness of manner, that multitudes were drawn to hear him The churches were crowded to excess, and thousands were unable to gain admittance. He generally preached nine times every week; and, early on Sunday mornings, the people were seen to be flocking to the churches, with lanterns in their hands, and conversing on the blessings of eternal salvation.

Mr. John Wesley returned to England, where he was informed that Whitfield had set sail for Georgia: he was well received by the magistrates, officers, and people; but he found the new colony in the most miserable condition. Besides religious visiting, he generally preached twice a day, and four times on the Lord's day; and, for the benefit of the Georgians, he projected, and ultimately completed, an Orphan Asylum, similar to that surprising monument of the charity of Professor Frank, in Germany. "I was really happy," says he, "in my little foreign cure, and could have cheerfully remained among them, had I not been obliged to return to England to receive priest's orders, and to make a beginning towards laying a foundation to the Orphan House."

Whitfield arrived in London, December 8, 1738, where he again enjoyed the society of his friend Mr. Wesley, and they began to form religious societies in different parts of London; the principal place of meeting being in a large room which they had hired in Fetter Lane. In January, 1739, he received priest's orders from his good friend, Bishop Benson. He complied with invitations to preach in London, Oxford, and Bristol; by which thousands were awakened to a sense of religion: but the churches were not sufficient to contain the crowds that followed him.

On account of his preaching the necessity of spiritual regeneration, the pulpits, in many places, were refused to him by the clergy; and at Bristol he determined, after much reflection and prayer, to commence preaching in the open air. This practice he began among the rude and ignorant colliers at Kingswood, near Bristol, of whom he writes, "Having no righteousness of their own to renounce, they were glad to hear of a Jesus who was a friend of publicans and sinners, and came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance! The first discovery of their being affected was, to see the white gutters made by their tears, which plentifully fell down their black cheeks, as they came out of their coal pits. The change was visible to all, though numbers chose to impute it to any thing rather than the finger of God."

Besides the colliers, and thousands from the neighbouring villages, persons of all ranks flocked daily to hear him, out of Bristol; and he was soon invited to preach by some of the more respectable, in a large bowling-green, in the city itself. Such success attending his labours in field-preaching, he wrote to Mr. Wesley, who had never been at Bristol; and as he, as well as Mr. Whitfield, had been refused the use of churches, he followed the practice of his younger friend, having the sanction of our Saviour's example, in calling sinners to repentance both in highways and in the fields.

Whitfield left Mr. Wesley full of labours at Bristol, and visited many of the principal towns in the kingdom, collecting for his Orphan House in Georgia. In Wales, he encouraged the zealous Howel Harris, under whose ministry the power of religion was reviving. Being unable to obtain the use of churches in London, he ventured, on Sunday, to preach in Moorfields. Though threatened by the mob, a Divine blessing evidently attended these labours; and the same evening he preached on Kennington Common, to a multitude. For several months, Moorfields, Kennington Common, and Blackheath, were the chief scenes of his powerful ministry, and his auditors often consisted of twenty thousand persons. It is said their singing could be heard two miles off, and the voice of the preacher at the distance of a mile.

The building of a school having been commenced at Bristol, Mr. Whitfield visited that city, and put Mr. Wesley in full possession of the property; then introduced him at Gloucester as a field preacher, and embarked a second time for America, in August, 1739. In that country he was received with a cordial welcome by many of the ministers, and by thousands of the people, who expressed their delight to see Puritanism revived by a minister of the church of England; and Mr. Whitfield found himself at home among these descendants of the persecuted English Puritans, to whom his ministry was blessed in an extraordinary manner. Two years after he returned to England, for the purpose of making further collections for his great work in Georgia: "but," says he, "what a trying scene appeared here! During my journey through America, I had written two well-meant, though injudicious, letters against England's two great favourites, 'The Whole Duty of Man,' and 'Archbishop Tillotson,' who, I said, knew no more of religion than Mohammed. Mr. John Wesley had been prevailed on to preach and print in favour of perfection and universal redemption, and very strongly against election, a doctrine which I thought, and do now believe, was taught me of God, therefore could not possibly recede from. I had written an answer, which, though revised and much approved by some judicious divines, I think had some too strong expressions about absolute reprobation, which the apostle leaves rather to be inferred than expressed."

Mr. John Wesley had become opposed to the doctrine of election, as taught in the seventeenth article of the church; and the use made of the writings of Mr. Whitfield was to inflame the societies against him, as one who had dreadfully fallen. He says, "Ten thousand times would I rather have died than part with my old friends. It would have melted any heart to have seen Mr. Charles Wesley and me weeping after prayer, that, if possible, the breach might be prevented. Once I preached in the Foundery (a place which Mr. John Wesley had procured in my absence) on Gal. iii, but no more." Preaching in Moorfields, he writes, "I had the mortification of seeing numbers of my spiritual children, who, but a twelvemonth ago, would have plucked out their eyes for me, running by me whilst preaching, disdaining so much as to look at me, and some of them putting their fingers in their ears, that they might not hear one word I said. The like scene opened at Bristol, where I was denied preaching in the house I had founded: busy-bodies, on both sides, blew up the coals. A breach ensued; but as both differed in judgment, and not in affection, and aimed at the glory of our common Lord, though we hearkened too much to tale-bearers on both sides, we were kept from anathematizing each other, and went on in our several ways, being agreed in one point, endeavouring to convert souls to the blessed Redeemer."

Thus these two distinguished men separated in their operations, and became the leaders of the two branches of the methodist body — the Calvinist, and Arminian.

They both held the grand and essential peculiarities of the Gospel, by which a sinner is pardoned, sanctified, and saved; each embracing the all-sufficient atonement of the incarnate Son of God, and the regenerating, purifying influence of the Holy Spirit; but Mr. Wesley rejected the doctrine of Predestination and Election, as stated in Article XVII of the church of England; while Mr. Whitfield became more fully confirmed in its truth. The question of general and particular redemption thus occasioned a difference of sentiment, and for a short time a shyness between them: but they kept up an epistolary correspondence, and lived and died united in heart. This will appear partly by a clause in Mr. Whitfield's will, in which he says, "I leave a mourning ring to my honoured and dear friends, and disinterested fellow-labourers, the Rev. John and Charles Wesley, in token of my indissoluble union with them in heart and affection, notwithstanding our difference in judgment about some particular points of doctrine."

Mr. Whitfield, having been excluded from Mr. Wesley's connection, and generally from the pulpits of the established church, was necessitated to seek other places, in which to prosecute his zealous labours. Mr. Cennick, with others of the first Methodists, being of Mr. Whitfield's sentiments, joined with him at Bristol, and assisted him to build another preaching house at Kingswood, among the numerous colliers. Here, and at several other places, they preached to very large congregations. Being ordered to attend the House of Commons, to give information concerning the state of Georgia, the Speaker received him courteously, and assured him that there would be no persecution in the reign of George the Second. Thus encouraged, he pursued his plans with ardent zeal; and his friends procuring a piece of ground in Moorfields, London, a large shed was erected as a temporary shelter from the weather, and called "The Tabernacle." Mr. Whitfield, at first, disliked the site of his new temple, on account of its vicinity to the Foundery, the preaching house of Mr. Wesley (where the "City Road Chapel" now stands), which gave it the appearance of opposition. But upon this occasion he remarks, "All was wonderfully overruled for good, and for the furtherance of the Gospel. A fresh awakening immediately began. Congregations grew exceedingly large; and, at the people's desire, I sent (necessity reconciling me more and more to lay-preaching) for Messrs. Cennick, Harris, Seagrove, Humphries, and several others, to assist." New scenes of usefulness opened to him daily; and numerous invitations being sent to him from different places, he was enabled to visit them, leaving his lay assistants to preach among his settled congregations. He continued his practice of field preaching, not only through all parts of England, but in Wales, Scotland, and Ireland; and his ministry was crowned with extraordinary success.

In the year 1748, Mr. Whitfield was introduced to the acquaintance of the Countess of Huntingdon, in whom he found an intelligent, pious, faithful, and generous coadjutor, and he became one of her ladyship's chaplains. In 1753 he opened his new TABERNACLE in Moorfields, London, represented in our engraving, a building capable of holding about four thousand persons: and in the same year he opened the Tabernacle at Bristol; two years after, another at Norwich; and in 1756, his new chapel in Tottenham Court Road, still larger than that in Moorfields.

But to follow this apostolic servant of Jesus Christ through all his extensive travels, and to describe his wonderful successes, in turning sinners to God, would require volumes. In the course of his ministry, which included thirty-four years and a quarter, Mr. Whitfield crossed the Atlantic Ocean thirteen times, and preached EIGHTEEN THOUSAND SERMONS, which was something more than five hundred a year! His usefulness in the conversion of sinners to God corresponded with his indefatigable labours. Mr. Whitfield died in America, September 30, 1770, at Newbury Port, near Boston.

The death of Whitfield was lamented as a great public calamity, both in England and in America; and many funeral sermons were preached and published, to improve the sorrowful event, both by the ministers of the established church and of Dissenters: among the former may be mentioned, Mr. Romaine, Mr. Venn, Mr. Newton, Mr. Madan, and Mr. Toplady; and among the latter, Dr. Trotter, Dr. Gibbons, Mr. Brewer, and others. We shall give a few extracts in our next.

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

PERHAPS no subject will be thought more suitable for the "CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE," than a series of Ecclesiastical Biography. In this we shall be called to contemplate the most inviting illustrations of our most holy faith; and while we behold "so great a cloud of witnesses" for the truth as it is in Jesus, we shall be animated in our progress, following them who through faith and patience persevered and now inherit the promises. Every one will perceive the propriety of commencing with some brief notices of the inspired founders of the Christian church, many particulars of whom are to be found in the Holy Scriptures.

APOSTLES OF CHRIST.

1. PETER is mentioned first. Roman Catholics are accustomed to style him Saint Peter; but this is an address not agreeable to the Scripture, which gives no such titles to individual men, however holy. Unsanctioned by the word of God, it is to be regretted that such a style should have been adopted from the popish communion.

Very little is known of Peter the apostle, besides what is contained in the New Testament: the Roman Catholics, however, contend that he was Bishop of Rome, during twenty-five years: but we have no satisfactory evidence that Peter the apostle ever was at Rome, much less that he was bishop of that city. Probable tradition reports, that he came to Rome during the persecution raised against the Christians by Nero, and that he was apprehended and crucified. It is also said, that, remembering his shameful denial of his blessed Lord, he suffered, at his own request, with his head downwards, being unworthy to die in the manner of his Divine Master, A.D. 66. Peter wrote two inspired epistles, which we possess, bearing his name.

2. Andrew, the apostle, brother of Peter, is said to have prosecuted his evangelical missionary labours among the Scythians, Sogdians, and Ethiopians; that he made many converts to Christ in Greece and Epirus; that he organized a Christian church at Constantinople; ordained Stachys; and that, at Petræ, a city in Achaia, Ægeas the proconsul, crucified him; being provoked that Stratocles, his brother, and Maximilla, his wife, had embraced Christianity. It is said, that Maximilla ordered that his body should be embalmed, and that it was afterwards buried in the church at Constantinople, by Constantine the Great. There is to be seen at this day, in the church of St. Peter, Marseilles, a cross in the form of the letter X, enclosed in a silver shrine, pretended to be the cross on which Andrew suffered martyrdom.

3. James, the apostle, the son of Zebedee, was beheaded by Herod Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus, and grandson of Herod the Great. Acts xii. It is said, that the officer who brought James to the tribunal, observing his pious cheerfulness after his condemnation, asked forgiveness of the apostle, confessed himself a Christian, and was beheaded with him. Herod, the unprincipled tyrant, was smitten with worms by the hand of God, and he died in the most grievous torments.

4. John, the apostle, was brother to James: and both of them, for their powerful eloquence, were named by their blessed Master "Boanerges,"—Sons of Thunder. John was pre-eminently beloved by our Lord, and to his care he committed his mother. Leaving Judea before the destruction of Jerusalem, he laboured chiefly in Asia Minor, particularly at Ephesus. Churches are said to have been gathered by him in Smyrna, Pergamus, Sardis, Thyatira, Philadelphia, and Laodicea. It is related, that when at Rome, A.D. 95, he was put by order of Domitian, the emperor, into a caldron of boiling oil, in which he stood for several hours unhurt. Being taken out, he was banished to the isle of Patmos, where he wrote the Book of Revelation. Rev. i, 9. From this island he returned the next year, and resided chiefly at Ephesus, until A.D. 100; when, beloved by all, and at the advanced age of nearly a hundred years, he died in peace. Several characteristic anecdotes are recorded concerning this venerable apostle, which we cannot omit to notice. On one of his visits to a neighbouring church, he saw a youth, whom he committed to the minister for religious education: but during the apostle's banishment he absconded. On his return, the minister informed him, "He is dead: that is, he is dead to God; for he is a robber on the mountains." The aged apostle obtained a horse, engaged a guide, pursued, and found the bandit; tenderly invited his confidence, and directed him to the fountain of mercy in Christ. The young apostate was reclaimed; and lived and died an honour to his Christian profession. He was accustomed, in his extreme age and feebleness, to be led to the church, giving them only, as an address, this short exhortation —"Love one another: little children, love one another." The inspired writings of John are those bearing his name, the Gospel, three Epistles, and the Book of the Revelation.

5. Philip, the apostle, we are informed, prosecuted his evangelical labours with much success, in Upper Asia, part of Scythia, and Colchis. In the latter part of his ministry he came to Hierapolis in Phrygia, a city particularly addicted to idolatry, and in which they worshipped a serpent of extraordinary magnitude. Philip, by his prayers, procured the death of this monster, and convinced many of its worshippers of the absurdity of paying divine honours to such odious reptiles; but the magistrates, votaries of Jupiter Ammon, enraged at the success of Philip, imprisoned him, ordered him to be severely scourged, and then put to death; which, some say was by hanging, others by crucifixion, A.D. 52.

6. Bartholomew, the apostle, supposed to be Nathanael, who was called by our Lord, "an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile," is said to have been apprehended with Philip. But an earthquake happening while Bartholomew was bound to the cross, he was released. He laboured in Judea, Ethiopia, Arabia, and India. For the use of his converts, it is said, he wrote out the Gospel by Matthew, which he left in India, whence he returned to the more northern and western parts of Asia. He preached the faith of Christ at last in Albania, a city upon the Caspian Sea, where his endeavours to reclaim the people from idolatry were crowned with martyrdom: he being flayed alive, and afterwards crucified by order of the governor. He endured this dreadful series of sufferings with cheerfulness and triumph, comforting his sorrowing friends, and confirming the Gentile converts to the last moment of his life, which terminated A.D. 72.

7. Thomas, the apostle, surnamed Didymus, or the Twin, prosecuted his mission among the Persians, Medes, Hyrcanians, and Bactrians. Chrysostom says, "Thomas, who at first was the most weak and the most incredulous of all the apostles, became through the condescension of Jesus Christ to satisfy his scruples, the most fervent, powerful, and invincible of them all; and went through almost all parts of the world, and lived without fear in the midst of the most barbarous nations, performing his duty without any regard to his life. And being encouraged by a divine vision, he travelled into the Indies, to Malabar, and the country of the Brahmins, who, fearing the downfal of their rites and religion, resolved upon his death; and accordingly, when he was intent at prayer, they stoned him, wounded him with darts, and at length, one coming near, thrust him through with a lance," A.D. 73. Some say, A.D. 66.

8. Matthew. Of this apostle we know but little except that of his labours as an evangelist in writing the Gospel which bears his name. Yet it is related that he prosecuted his mission among the Ethiopians, the Persians, and the Parthians; and at length suffered martyrdom at Nadabbar, in Asiatic Ethiopia, being slain with a halbert, A.D. 60. He alone, of all the New Testament writers, wrote his Gospel in the Hebrew language: but lived to translate it, or to see it translated into Greek.

9. James, the son of Alpheus, is styled "the Lord's brother;" and he was commonly called "James the Less," and "James the Just, on account of his extraordinary holiness." He is considered as having been the first bishop of the Christian church at Jerusalem. Even by many of the unbelieving Jews, James was venerated; on which account, Ananias, the Jewish high-priest, with the Scribes and Pharisees, called him, at the Passover, to stand upon the porch of the temple, and to satisfy the doubting minds of the people concerning the faith of Christ. James complied with this request: but being enraged that his doctrine was received by many, they threw him from the battlements; and while he was praying for his murderers, some of them beat him on the head with a fuller's club, of which, his skull being fractured, he died. Thus James was murdered by the mob, while there was no Roman governor at Jerusalem, A. D. 62.

10. Jude, the apostle, or Lebbeus Thaddeus, was the writer of the Epistle which bears the name of Jude. At the commencement of his ministry, he preached in Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and Idumea; and afterwards in Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Persia; confirming his doctrine with miracles. We have no certain information of the termination of his ministry: though it is generally believed that the Magi put him to death in Persia, about A. D. 62.

11. Simon Zelotes, the Canaanite, the son of Cleophas, is said to have preached the Gospel in Egypt, Greece, Libya, and Mauritania. Various accounts have been published concerning Simon the apostle: some have affirmed that he fulfilled his apostolic ministry in Britain; and others that he was Bishop of Jerusalem until A. D. 107, where he was crucified at the advanced age of one hundred and twenty years.

12. Judas Iscariot was the guilty apostate and hypocritical betrayer of his holy Master, Jesus Christ. By an act of suicide, this wretched instrument of Satan "went to his own place!"

13. Matthias was chosen by the disciples, and by lot, to fill the office of the traitor. He is believed to have been one of the seventy disciples. Leaving Judea, it is recorded that he laboured in Cappadocia, where he is believed to have died a martyr for Christ. Some Greek writers say that he was hanged on a cross.

14. Paul, the apostle. The life, labours, and writings of this extraordinary minister of Christ might well require the pages of many volumes: and many have been filled with the most judicious and edifying remarks and comments. Among these several works, Lord Lyttleton's "Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of Paul," deserve especial notice. That nobleman's treatise is a work, of which it has been truly said, that "Infidelity has never been able to fabricate a specious answer."

But his conversion, ministry, and successes are so fully detained in the New Testament, and his doctrines and spirit are so richly contained in his fourteen inspired Epistles, that little is necessary to be added here, besides a few particulars concerning his martyrdom. Chrysostom informs us, that it being reported that a cup-bearer of the emperor, and his concubine Poppœa Sabina, embraced the Christian faith from the ministry of the apostle, Nero determined on Paul's immediate destruction. He was beheaded, as a Roman citizen, at the Salvian Waters, and buried on the Estium Way, A. D. 66.

THE HARVEST MOON, AND THE HUNTER'S MOON.

Henry. Father, I have wondered to see the moon appear so brilliant and beautiful for so many evenings lately; and yesterday I heard it called the harvest-moon, by a gentleman of Kent. What is meant by the harvest-moon?

Father. Wisdom is obtained principally by observation and inquiry: I am glad, therefore, that you observed what the Kentish gentleman said, and not less so by your proposing to me this question.

Henry. That gentleman said, the crops were exceedingly abundant in Kent, and the harvest-moon, with the favourable weather, was of the greatest advantage to the farmer, in getting in the corn. But I did not know why he called it the harvest-moon.

Father. As to your present inquiry, I would remark, that about the time of harvest, in this part of the earth, there is something peculiar in the rising of the moon; by which the industrious farmer derives great advantage from the prolonged light of the shining of that beautiful planet; on account of which it is called "the harvest-moon," in August; and that peculiarity partly continues in September, from which it is called "the hunter's-moon."

Henry. But what is the cause of the difference in the shining of the moon in those two months of the year?

Father. Fully to explain the cause would require some further acquaintance with astronomy than you at present possess: but as you become further informed on the wondrous works of God in the heavens, you will be better prepared, not only to understand the causes of many things of which you may now be ignorant, but also to adore and love the glorious and beneficent Author of all the grandeur of the heavens, and of all our personal blessings. Read these lines of poetry, which will partly answer your question, and tend to excite your curiosity in relation to the works of God.

Henry.

"There is a time, well known to husbandmen,
In which the moon for many nights, in aid
Of their autumnal labours, cheers the dusk
With her full lustre, soon as Phœbus hides
Beneath th' horizon his propitious ray:
For as the angle of the line which bounds
The moon's career from the equator, flows
Greater or less, the orb of Cynthia shines
With less or more of difference in rise.
In Aries least this angle: thence the Moon
Rises with smallest variance of time,
When in this sign she dwells; and most protracts
Her sojourning in our enlighten'd skies."

Futher. I hope you will remember those lines.

Henry. Shall I beg you will endeavour to explain to me more clearly the cause of the harvest-moon and the hunter's-moon?

Futher. You know that the moon is a planet which attends our earth, at the distance of about 240,000 miles; and she makes her journey round the earth in a little more than twenty-nine days twelve hours; so that there are nearly thirteen changes, or new moons, in the course of a year. You may have observed, that the moon rises later each day, by about three quarters of an hour, than on the day preceding: but in places situated in such a latitude as that in which we live, there is a remarkable difference about August and September, when at the season of full moon she rises, for several nights together, only about twenty minutes later on one day than on the day preceding. By thus succeeding the sun before the twilight is ended, the moon prolongs the light, to the great benefit of those who are engaged in gathering the fruits of the earth; and hence the full moon at this season is called the "harvest-moon."

Henry. Who first made observations upon the harvest-moon?

Father. We cannot tell who first observed this peculiar variation in the moon's appearance: but it is believed, that it was noticed by persons engaged in agriculture, at a much earlier period than it was observed by astronomers. Plain and pious husbandmen ascribed it to the special goodness of God, not doubting but that it had been ordered by him on purpose for their advantage.

Henry. And I should think they were right in so considering the harvest-moon.

Father. Most certainly they were: for all the arrangements of the blessed God in nature, and all his dispensations in providence, were ordained, and they are still directed, for his own glory in connection with the welfare of his creatures. Learned astronomers and other scientific men, frequently speak and write of the works of God, as if they were mere machinery, the wise arrangements of something which they call Nature: whilst a pious beholder of the wonders of God in the heavens, though he may understand but little of the laws of motion, and the causes of the several appearances in the sky, speaks far more rationally, and in a manner far more worthy of their blessed Author.

Henry. I have heard it said, that scientific and philosophical men are frequently irreligious and infidels.

Father. There is some truth in that report: but I have pleasure in knowing some philosophers and scientific men of the highest class, who are both believers and pious men. I would have you cherish the sentiments of the devout Psalmist, whenever you look upon the wonderful works of God. — Psal. viii, 1, 3, 4; xix, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

SPIKENARD.—(Nardus Indica.)

The root of this species is small and slender, putting forth a long small stalk. The spike (which gives the plant its name) is bristle-shaped, a finger's length in height, and odoriferous; the colour inclines to purple. This flower emits a rich and delightful fragrance, of which the whole surrounding medium partakes. A costly perfume was made from the blade or spike, which was esteemed as an article of luxury among the ancients, in whose feasts it frequently had a distinguished place.

Some very interesting observations on this plant are given by the Editor of Calmet's Dictionary, in some extracts from Dr. Gilbert Blane; and as they may be useful in confirming the opinion that the spikenard of Scripture was the same as that already described, we transcribe them for the information of the reader. In a letter dated Lucknow, 1786, his brother writes: "Travelling with the Nabob Vizier, on one of his hunting excursions, towards the Northern mountains, I was surprised one day, after crossing the river Rapty, about twenty miles from the foot of the hills, to perceive the air perfumed with an aromatic smell; and on asking the cause, I was told it proceeded from the roots of the grass, that were bruised or trodden out of the ground by the feet of the elephants and horses of the Nabob's retinue. The country was wild and uncultivated, and this was the common grass which covered the surface of it, growing in large tufts close to each other, very rank, and in general from three to four feet in height. As it was the winter season, there was none of it in flower. I collected a quantity of the roots to be dried, and carefully dug up some of it to be planted in my garden at Lucknow. There it throve exceedingly, and in the rainy season it shot up spikes about six feet
The whole plant has a strong aromatic odour, but the smell and the virtues reside principally in the h roots, which in chewing have a bitter, warm, pu taste, accompanied with some degree of that ki glow in the mouth, which cardamoms occasion."
circumstance in the account above recited,
Dr. G. Blane, of its being discovered in an unfrequ country from the odour it exhaled by being tre upon by the elephants and horses, corresponds striking manner with an occurrence related by A in his history of the expedition of Alexander the into India. It is there mentioned, that during his through the deserts of Gradosia, the air was perf with the spikenard, which was trodden under fo the army, and that the Phœnicians who accomp the expedition collected large quantities of it, as as of myrrh, in order to carry them to their own c try as articles of merchandize.

With regard to the virtues of this plant, it ap from a passage in Horace, that it was so valuable, as much of it as could be contained in a small b precious stone, was considered a sort of equivalen a large vessel of wine, and a handsome quota f guest to contribute at an entertainment, accordin the custom of antiquity.

Though there seems to have been spikenard of a ferior quality growing in Syria (Nardus Syriaca), Galen tells us, that the term is misapplied when g
to any other species but the "Nardus Indica.

INDIAN MANNER OF WATERING GARDE

Among the numerous evidences of the increasing

THE IMPORTANCE OF HAVING A PURS

The most important principle, perhaps, in life, have a pursuit — a useful one if possible, and events an innocent one. The unripe fruit of the of knowledge is, I believe, always bitter or sour scepticism and discontent — sickness of the mind often the results of devouring it. — Sir Humphry

MUNGO PARK.

Park relates, that after traveling upon a hot and sultry day, through a desert country, he threw himself upon the ground, worn out with fatigue, and feeling himself as one lost and cast out from the world, and as if even Providence had forgotten him. As he lay, he turned to one side, and a little flower caught his eye, which was blooming with extreme beauty in the midst of so much barrenness. The sight brought comfort immediately to his mind, and he said to himself, "That God, who has planted this little flower in such a place, and provided for its sustenance, will not forget me."

What can I do for thee!
Omnipotent!—Eternal!—Infinite!
Is not the thought aspiring blasphemy,
Needing forgiveness to be granted it?
Who can conceive thy limitless domain?
Would thought exploring stretch her wings for flight
To yon far star upon the verge of sight,
(A sun immense, supplying worlds with light)
Thence must she stretch her wings and fly again!

And if, ten thousand suns pass'd by, she gaze
Amaz'd upon the measureless expanse,
She will perceive innumerous fresh rays—
New suns around whose bright founts planets dance,
Receiving warmth and gladness from their beams;
All clad with fruits and flowers, along whose fields
Man wanders, and where life its joyance yields
Of soft sensation, and th' exquisite streams
Which gush in real joys, or play in dreams.

Thy space is infinite! yet boundless space
Possesses not a vacancy—no place
But fill'd with wonders of thy mighty hand.
And righteously thou sendest weal or woe;
For thou each deed, and word, and thought, dost know,
Or slightest movement, through thy vast command.
Then surely all my wants are known to thee,
Eternal Ruler of Infinity!

Oh! 'tis a thought of comfort, that the mind
Of high Archangel, which has left behind
At distance so extreme man's boasted powers,
Rises not nearer to thy topless throne,
Than doth the little insect, which, unknown,
Invisible to man, in smallest flowers
Finds a vast world; and there in reckless play
Sports its existence of a summer's day.

Then need I fear, that in this boundless mass
Of matter, I, an atom, shall be lost?
No! the Eternal Knowledge will not pass
Even the smallest; each a price has cost
Of agony to ransom it: and though,
Scatter'd by Death and Time, but dust it be,
It never can be lost; for surely He Hath ever known it, and will ever know.

RUINS OF THE TEMPLE OF CARNAC AT THEBES.

At sun-rise we set out to visit Carnac, the majestic ruins of which appeared in the distance, towering in their magnificence most sublimely above a grove of trees. After traversing a low tract of land we came upon the temple, and I doubt whether all the powers of description would be able to convey even a faint idea of the overwhelming grandeur that awaits the spectator. An avenue of sphynxes, which, though partly ruined, are still distinctly visible, reaches from Carnac to Luxor, two or three miles distant. In every direction sweep fine colonnades, and innumerable courts and halls puzzle and bewilder the imagination. The walls are covered with a profusion of sculpture and painting, and we were pointed out in particular some very spirited battle scenes, as also the discoveries which had lately been made by excavations. We saw two noble obelisks standing, with a third prostrate on the ground, and a column of majestic proportions in solitary grandeur, all its companions having fallen. There were also the fragments of a colossal granite statue, the limbs of which were still very perfect, and another, more mutilated and broken. The roof of one of the sanctuaries, which is in excellent preservation, is painted blue, and covered with golden stars, which had a very fine effect; but what struck us most, and literally overwhelmed us with astonishment, was a truly majestic forest of gigantic columns, the greater part quite perfect, though one or two in a falling state were yet suspended in the air, as if the angel of destruction in passing over had stayed his destroying hand, touched with the magnificence of the scene, or

> "As if the Spoiler had turned back with fear,
> And turning left them to the elements."

From the top of one which we ascended, we had a panoramic view of the scene. In every direction, diverging like the radii of a circle from a common centre, we beheld vast avenues of immense pillars, gigantic ruins, majestic fragments, and an infinity of gateways, which, from their numbers, might well have entitled Thebes to have been denominated "the City of a Hundred Gates."

Upon one of the colonnades had lately been discovered the name of Seconthis, and of his successor. According to Blair, Seconthis flourished 874 before Christ. He is by some thought to have been the Shishak of the Scriptures, who sacked Jerusalem 970 before Christ—though Sir Isaac Newton considers Shishak to have been the same with Sesostris. But whoever may have founded or inhabited Thebes, enough remains after the lapse of 2000 or 3000 years to show that at one period it was perhaps the grandest city in the world; and to prove that the natives of Africa, however we may now consider them, were at one time very superior to ourselves in some respects, for what modern building would survive the flight of so many centuries.

Amongst all Thebes, Carnac reigns pre-eminent, and such is its wonderful majesty and strength, that it seems as if none but Almighty power could have destroyed it, when for the sins of the nation "the Lord God destroyed the idols, and caused their images to cease," when "He poured his fury upon Sin, the strength of Egypt, and cut off the multitude of No," when "He set fire in Egypt, and No was rent in sunder." Oh the greatness and the littleness of man! which whilst he debased himself to worship "the likeness of things above, and in the earth beneath, and in the water under the earth," could at the same time have raised such grand, such magnificent structures to the honour of false gods.—Mrs. Elwood's Journey to India.

GENEROUS BOOK LENDER.

Michael Begon, who was born at Blois, in 1638, was possessed of a valuable library, which was free of public access. In most of his books was written, "Michaelis Begon et amicorum;" i. e. the property of Begon and his friends; and when he was once cautioned by his librarian against lending his books, for fear of losing them, he replied, "I would rather lose them than seem to distrust any honest man."

WHAT IS TIME ?

I asked an aged man, a man of cares,
Wrinkled and curv'd, and white with hoary hairs ;
" Time is the warp of life," he said, " Oh tell
The young, the fair, the gay, to weave it well ! "

I asked the ancient, venerable dead,
Sages who wrote, and warriors who bled ;
From the cold grave a hollow murmur flow'd—
" Time sow'd the seed we reap in this abode ! "

I ask'd a dying sinner, ere the tide
Of life had left his veins —— " Time !" he replied,
" I've lost it ! Ah the treasure !" and he died.

I ask'd the golden Sun and silver spheres,
Those bright chronometers of days and years ;
They answer'd, " Time is but a meteor glare,"
And bade us for Eternity prepare.

I ask'd the Seasons in their annual round,
Which beautify or desolate the ground ;
And they replied (no oracle more wise)
" 'Tis Folly's blank, and Wisdom's highest prize ! "

I ask'd a spirit lost ; but oh ! the shriek
That pierc'd my soul ! I shudder while I speak !
It cried. " A particle ! a speck ! a mite
Of endless years, duration infinite ! "

Of things inanimate, my dial I
Consulted, and it made me this reply ;
" Time is the season fair of living well,
The path of glory, or the path of hell."

I ask'd my Bible, and methinks it said,
" Time is the present hour, the past is fled ;
Live ! live to day ! to-morrow never yet
On any human being rose or set."

I ask'd old father Time himself at last,
But in a moment he flew swiftly past ;
His chariot was the cloud, the viewless wind
His noiseless steeds, which left no trace behind.

I ask'd the mighty Angel, who shall stand
One foot on sea, and one on solid land ;
" By heavens," he cried, " I swear the mystery's o'er :
Time was, but henceforth Time shall be no more ! "

ROBERT HALL ON EDUCATING THE POOR.

" SOME have objected to the instruction of the lower classes, from an apprehension that it would lift them above their sphere, make them dissatisfied with their station in life, and, by impairing the habit of subordination, endanger the tranquillity of the state; an objection devoid, surely, of all force and validity. It is not easy to conceive in what manner instructing men in their duties can prompt them to neglect those duties ; or how that enlargement of reason, which enables them to comprehend the true grounds of authority, and the obligations to obedience, should indispose them to obey. The admirable mechanism of society, together with that subordination of ranks which is essential to its subsistence, is surely not an elaborate imposture, which the exercise of reason will detect and expose. This objection implies a reflection on the social order equally impolitic, invidious, and unjust. Nothing, in reality, renders legitimate governments so insecure as extreme ignorance in the people. It is this which yields them an easy prey to seduction, makes them the victims of prejudice and false alarms, and so ferocious withal, that their interference in a time of public commotion is more to be dreaded than the eruption of a volcano."

BOOKS OF STERLING MERIT.

BAGSTER'S COMPREHENSIVE BIBLE.—For elegance, beauty, accuracy, and cheapness, this is by far the best Bible for the study or the pulpit. Besides the immense mass of valuable introductory matter, on the Authenticity, Inspiration, History, Translations, Geography, Writers, &c. &c., of the several books of the Bible, the 4,000 notes, and 500,000 parallel passages, render it an inestimable treasure to the Christian student, whether of a public or private character. By a simple Index, the Notes are made to illustrate 40,000 passages. " Not one Note is intended to be of a doctrinal or controversial nature ; but to comprise illustrations of Jewish and Eastern Manners, Customs, Rites, and Ceremonies—Critical and Philological Observations—Chronological, Historical, and Classical Elucidations—Sacred Geography and Natural History, on which more light has been thrown than has ever met the eye of the English reader."

THE PILLAR OF DIVINE TRUTH immoveably fixed on the Foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, &c., shown by the Genuineness, Preservation, Authenticity, Inspiration, Facts, Doctrines, Miracles, Prophecies, and Precepts of the Word of God. The invaluable materials of this cheap volume are drawn solely from the Comprehensive Bible. We rejoice to be able to introduce so much instructive matter, in this form, to the notice of our young friends, who may not be able to procure the original work. The worthy publisher is entitled to the thanks of the Christian public for the " Pillar of Divine Truth," which will remain an imperishable monument to the honour of the lamented, learned, and all but martyred William Greenfield.

AMERICAN RELIGION AND CHURCH ORDER, with an Appendix, containing " A Manual for Communicants," and a " Sermon on Revivals," by Dr. Cox of New York. 32mo. 72 pp.

Religion in America deserves to be better understood by British Christians ; and this pamphlet, closely printed, for only eight pence, will give a clearer insight of its history, extent, and present character, than many large volumes. We recommend it in the most unqualified manner, as so much has been said on the subject of Revivals, and these so greatly desired in reference to religion in England.

MOURNING HABITS OF DIFFERENT NATIONS.

IN Europe, black is generally used, because it represents darkness, to which death is like, as it is a privation of life.

China white, because they hope the dead are in heaven, the place of purity.

Egypt yellow, representing the decaying of trees and flowers, which become yellow as they die away.

Ethiopia brown, denoting the colour of the earth from whence we come and to which we return.

In some parts of Turkey blue, representing the sky, where they hope the dead are gone : but in other parts, purple or violet, because being a kind of mixture of black and blue, it represents, as it were, sorrow on the one side, hope on the other.

HINDOO SUPERSTITIONS AND SELF-TORTURE. (See p. 93.)

THE BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Baptist Missionary Society has special claims upon the respect and support of every Christian denomination. It is almost the oldest existing institution of this divinely benevolent class; and when it is considered what has been accomplished by its agents in the translation of the Holy Scriptures into the languages of the East, every one, filled with astonishment, will exclaim, in the inspired words of Balaam, "What hath God wrought!"

Mr. (now Dr.) Carey, originated the Baptist Missionary Society in 1792. This venerable man proposed to the Northamptonshire Association of Baptist ministers, at one of their meetings, "whether it were not practicable and obligatory to attempt the conversion of the Heathen?" After urging in a sermon before them, the two noble maxims—"Attempt great things for God," and "Expect great things from God;" he submitted a plan, which was accepted, and the Society was formed, the friends present making a collection for this magnificent object, amounting to 13*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*!

Hindostan was judged a proper sphere for their attempt, on account of its immense population, and the degrading superstitions which universally prevailed: but before any plan could be matured, they found a Baptist brother, Mr. John Thomas, a surgeon, lately returned from Calcutta to London, where he was labouring to raise a fund for the purpose of establishing a mission to India! This pious and devoted man had preached to the natives in Bengal; and it deserves recording, that John Thomas had the singular honour of being the first Englishman, who made known the gospel of salvation to the benighted Hindoos.

Thomas was engaged as a missionary by the Baptist Society; and Carey also offered himself to go to India. They sailed in 1793, in a Danish East Indiaman; but without a provision for their support. Thomas proposed to maintain himself by his profession; and Carey by some occupation, till he could acquire the native language. Under difficulties extraordinary, with the assistance of Mr. Fountain, another missionary, they succeeded in translating the Scriptures into Bengalee. In 1799, they were reinforced by four more missionaries; but now they were refused permission to settle in the British territory. Carey and Fountain removed across the river Ganges, sixteen miles from Calcutta, to Serampore, a Danish settlement; where, to his everlasting honour, the governor protected and encouraged these men of God. Ever since, this has been the principal station of the Baptists in India. Kristno, the first Hindoo convert to Christianity, was baptized with Felix Carey, eldest son of the Doctor, in December, 1779, in the river Ganges, in the presence of a great concourse of people, Hindoos, Mohammedans, Europeans, and the Danish governor, who shed tears at the affecting sight. In seven years from the date of Kristno's baptism, one hundred and nine intelligent converts submitted to that ceremony.

In 1801, Marquis Wellesley, the Governor General of India, appointed Carey teacher of Bengalee and Shanscrit, in his new college of Fort William, a station which he filled with ability.

In 1806, there were ten English missionaries at Serampore, who issued proposals for printing the Scriptures in fourteen of the Oriental languages: but to detail the labours of these devoted men, and the successes with which God graciously favoured them, requires more space than our limits allow. They had all things in common; and laboured for the common cause of the mission. Dr. Carey, by his learned labours at Calcutta, Dr. Marshman, by the school at Serampore, and Mr. Ward in the printing office, have each contributed more than one thousand pounds per annum to the mission object in the East.

The Baptists have many stations in different parts of India, the West Indies, the Burman Empire, Ceylon, and some in Honduras, and in South Africa; in all which places their labours in the conversion of souls to Christ have been honoured of God, especially in Jamaica and in the East Indies. But the most astonishing work of any body of Christians, in any age, is that of their translating the Holy Scriptures into the languages of the East. In 1806, the Baptist missionaries were printing the Scriptures at Serampore in six languages, and translating them into six more. In 1819, they were printing or translating the word of God into twenty-seven languages, at Serampore or Calcutta!!

Slanders the most base, and attacks the most virulent, were from time to time made, by party, prejudiced, or unprincipled writers, upon these noble benefactors of mankind. They were loaded with every vulgar or senseless epithet, even by educated Englishmen, who called them dissenters, schismatics, Calvinists, fools, madmen, tinkers, low-born and low-bred mechanics: but their heaven-born benevolence is manifest in their works, upon which the God of glory has placed the seal of his approving blessing; while their oriental learning has been proved to surpass that of any university in Europe. Dr. Carey, especially, is admitted to be the first oriental scholar of our age. The calumnies of their enemies have been deservedly exposed by Mr. Fuller, secretary to the Baptist Missionary Society, by Dr. Buchanan, a zealous chaplain, Mr. Wilberforce, Lord Teignmouth, and the late learned Mr. Greenfield.

The Baptist with the Wesleyan and Church missionaries, have recently endured persecutions in Jamaica of a most shameful character; and enmity to the Gospel of Christ has been manifested by the demolition of ten of their chapels, and the serious damage of others, by the white inhabitants of that island. We forbear entering upon this subject particularly; but refer to the published accounts of these disgraceful transactions, which are universally reprobated in England.

The expenditure of the Baptist Missionary Society, for the past year, ending May 31, 1832, was 15,794*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.*

DR. CAREY'S ADDRESS

TO MARQUIS WELLESLEY, GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA.

Delivered in Shanscrit.

Dr. Claudius Buchanan, in his "Memoir of the Expediency of an Ecclesiastical Establishment for British India," published in 1806, mentions the foundation of the College of Fort William, by Marquis Wellesley, as an important institution, "the fountain of civilization to Asia." He also speaks of Dr. Carey as "Shanscrit Teacher" in that College, and calls him "the venerable Mr. Carey; for many years past the Protestant missionary in the North of India; following the steps of the late Mr. Swartz in the South; in oriental and classical learning his superior, and not inferior in laborious study and Christian zeal. Mr. Carey is author of a grammar of the Shanscrit language in 900 pages 4to.; of a grammar of the Bengal language; of a grammar in the Mahratta language; of a translation of the Scriptures into the Bengal language; and of various other useful publications in oriental literature."

Dr. Buchanan inserts in his work the translation of Carey's Shanscrit address to Marquis Wellesley, after Clotworthy Gowan, Esq., the first student, had publicly pronounced his oration in that language; and which we here present to our readers, as worthy of their perusal, and admirably illustrative of the means by which Christianity has been introduced into that populous heathen portion of the earth.

"My Lord,

"It is just, that the language which has been first cultivated under your auspices, should primarily be employed in gratefully acknowledging the benefit, and in speaking your praise.

"This ancient language, which refused to disclose itself to former governors of India, unlocks its treasures at your command, and enriches the world with the history, learning, and science of a distant age.

"The rising importance of our collegiate institutions has never been more clearly demonstrated than on the present occasion; and thousands of the learned in distant nations will exult in this triumph of literature.

"What a singular exhibition has this day been presented to us! In presence of the supreme governor of India, and of its most learned and illustrious characters, Asiatic and European, an assembly is convened, in which no word of our native tongue is spoken, but public discourse is maintained on interesting subjects, in the languages of Asia. The colloquial Hindoostanee, the classic Persian, the commercial Bengalee, the learned Arabic, and the primeval Shanscrit, are spoken fluently, after having been studied grammatically, by English youth. Did ever any university in Europe, or any literary institution in any other age or country, exhibit a scene so interesting as this? And what are the circumstances of these youth? They are not students who prosecute a dead language with uncertain purpose, impelled only by natural genius or love of fame. But having been appointed to the important offices of administering the government of the country in which these languages are spoken, they apply their acquisitions immediately to useful purposes; in distributing justice to the inhabitants, in transacting the business of the state, revenual and commercial; and in maintaining official intercourse with the people in their own tongue, and not, as hitherto, by means of an interpreter.

"The acquisitions of our students may be appreciated by their affording to the suppliant native immediate access to his principal; and by their elucidating the spirit of the regulations of our government by oral communication, and by written explanations, varied according to the circumstances and capacities of the people.

"The acquisitions of our students are appreciated at this moment by those learned Asiatics, now present in this assembly, some of them strangers from distant provinces; who wonder every man to hear in his own tongue important subjects discussed, and new and noble principles asserted, by the youth of a foreign land.

"The literary proceedings of this day amply repay all the solicitude, labour, and expense that have been bestowed on this institution. If the expense had been a thousand times greater, it would not have equalled the immensity of the advantage, moral and political, that will ensue.

"I, now an old man, have lived for a long series of years among the Hindoos; I have been in the habit of preaching to multitudes daily, of discoursing with the Brahmins on every subject, and of superintending schools for the instruction of the Hindoo youth. Their language is nearly as familiar to me as my own. This close intercourse with the natives for so long a period, and in different parts of our empire, has afforded me opportunities of information not inferior to those which have hitherto been presented to any person. I may say indeed that their manners, customs, habits, and sentiments, are as obvious to me as if I was myself a native. And knowing them as I do, and hearing as I do their daily observations on our goverment, character, and principles, I am warranted to say (and I deem it my duty to embrace the public opportunity now afforded me of saying it), that the institution of this college was wanting to complete the happiness of the natives under our dominion; for this institution will break down that barrier (our ignorance of their language) which has ever opposed the influence of our laws and principles, and has despoiled our administration of its energy and effect.

"Were, however, the institution to cease from this moment, its salutary effects would yet remain. Good has been done, which cannot be undone. Sources of useful knowledge, moral instruction, and political utility, have been opened to the natives of India, which can never be closed; and their civil improvement, like the gradual civilization of our own country, will advance in progression for ages to come.

"One hundred original volumes in the oriental languages and literature, will preserve for ever in Asia the name of the founder of this institution. Nor are the examples frequent of a renown, possessing such utility for its basis, or pervading such a vast portion of the habitable globe. My Lord, you have raised a monument to fame, which no length of time or reverse of fortune is able to destroy; not chiefly because it is inscribed with Mahratta and Mysore, with the trophies of war and the emblems of victory; but because there are inscribed on it the names of those learned youth, who have obtained degrees of honour for high proficiency in the oriental tongues.

"These youth will rise in regular succession to the government of this country. They will extend the domain of British civilization, security, and happiness, by enlarging the bounds of oriental literature, and thereby diffusing the spirit of Christian principles throughout the nations of Asia. These youth, who have lived so long amongst us, whose unwearied application to their studies we have all witnessed, whose moral and exemplary conduct has, in so solemn a manner, been publicly declared before this august assembly on this day; and who, at the moment of entering on the public service, enjoy the fame of possessing qualities (rarely combined) constituting a reputation of threefold strength for public men—genius, industry, and virtue; these illustrious scholars, my Lord, the pride of their country, and the pillars of this empire, will record your name in many a language, and secure your fame for ever. Your fame is already recorded in their hearts. The whole body of youth of this service hail you as their father and their friend. Your honour will ever be safe in their hands. No revolution of opinion, or change of circumstances, can rob you of the solid glory derived from the humane, just, liberal, and magnanimous principles, which have been embodied by your administration.

"To whatever situation the course of future events may call you, the youth of this service will ever remain the pledges of the wisdom and purity of your government. Your evening of life will be constantly cheered with new testimonies of their reverence and affection; with new proofs of the advantages of the education you have afforded them; and with a demonstration of the numerous benefits, moral, religious, and political, resulting from this institution;—benefits which will consolidate the happiness of millions in Asia, with the glory and welfare of our country."

THE REV. GEORGE WHITFIELD, M.A.

THE REV. JOHN WESLEY'S CHARACTER OF WHITFIELD.

Having quoted the high testimonies of the public newspapers, he says of his departed friend and fellow-labourer—"These accounts are just and impartial; but they go little farther than the outside of his character: they show you the preacher, but not the man, —the Christian,—the saint of God. May I be permitted to add a little on this head, from a personal knowledge of forty years? Mention has already been made of his unparalleled zeal, his indefatigable activity, his tender-heartedness towards the poor. But should we not likewise mention his deep gratitude to all whom God had used as instruments of good by him, of whom he did not cease to speak in the most respectful manner, even to his dying day? Should we not mention, that he had a heart susceptible of the most generous and the most tender friendship? I have frequently thought that this, of all others, was the distinguishing part of his character. How few have we known of so kind a temper, of such large and overflowing affections! Was it not principally by this that the hearts of others were so strangely drawn and knit to him? Can any thing but love beget love? This shone in his very countenance, and continually breathed in all his words, whether in public or private. Was it not this, which, quick and penetrating as lightning, flew from heart to heart—which gave life to his sermons, his conversation, his letters? Ye are witnesses. If it be inquired, what was the foundation of his integrity, or of his sincerity, courage, patience, and every other valuable and amiable quality, it is easy to give the answer. It was not the excellence of his natural temper, nor the strength of his understanding; it was not the force of education; no, nor the advice of his friends. It was no other than faith in a bleeding Lord; faith of the operation of God. It was a lively hope of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away. It was the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost, which was given unto him, filling his soul with tender, disinterested love to every child of man. From this source arose that torrent of eloquence which frequently bore down all before it; from this that astonishing force of persuasion, which the most ardent sinners could not resist. This it was which often made his head as waters, and his eyes a fountain of tears. I may close this head with observing, what an honour it pleased God to put upon his faithful servant, by allowing him to declare his everlasting Gospel in so many various countries, to such numbers of people, and with so great an effect on so many of their precious souls!"

THE REV. MR. TOPLADY'S CHARACTER OF WHITFIELD.

Mr. Toplady, in his funeral sermon for Mr. Whitfield, says, "I deem myself happy in having an opportunity of thus publicly avowing the inexpressible esteem in which I held this wonderful man; and the affectionate veneration which I must ever retain for the memory of one, whose acquaintance and ministry were attended with the most important spiritual benefit to me, and to tens of thousands beside.

"It will not be saying too much, if I term him the Apostle of the English empire; in point of zeal for God, a long course of indefatigable and incessant labours, unparalleled disinterestedness, and astonishingly extensive usefulness. England has had the honour of producing the greatest men in almost every walk of useful knowledge. At the head of these are, first, Archbishop Bradwardine, the prince of divines; second, Milton, the prince of poets; third, Sir Isaac Newton, the prince of philosophers; fourth, Whitfield, the prince of preachers."

THE INFIDEL HUME'S CHARACTER OF WHITFIELD AS A PREACHER.

Hume the historian, having heard Mr. Whitfield preach at Edinburgh, was asked by an intimate friend, what he thought of his preaching. Hume replied, "He is, Sir, the most ingenious preacher I ever heard. It is worth while to go twenty miles to hear him." He then repeated the following passage which he heard, towards the close of the discourse. "After a solemn pause, Mr. Whitfield thus addressed his numerous audience: 'The attendant angel is just about to leave the threshold, and ascend to heaven. And shall he ascend, and not bear with him the news of one sinner, among all this multitude, reclaimed from the error of his ways?' To give the greater effect to this exclamation, he stamped with his foot, lifted up his hands and eyes to heaven, and with gushing tears cried aloud—'Stop, Gabriel! Stop, Gabriel! Stop, ere you enter the sacred portals, and yet carry with you the news of one converted sinner to God!' He then, in the most simple, but energetic language, described what he called a Saviour's dying love to sinful man; so that almost the whole assembly melted into tears. This address was accompanied with such animated, yet natural action, that it surpassed any thing I ever saw or heard in any other preacher."

Happy for that proud infidel philosopher, had he been melted to penitential tears at the description and appeal of the apostolic preacher, so as to have been led truly to believe what Whitfield correctly called "a Saviour's dying love to sinful man!"

BRITISH CHRONOLOGY.

British Chronology embraces several remarkable epochs, a few of which require to be familiar to us, and therefore they deserve the special attention of our young readers.

I. The Roman Conquest of Britain, A. D. 84. This was partially effected by Julius Cæsar, in the year before the Christian era 54, or, as some reckon it, 52; but the complete subjugation of the country was not made till after the defeat of the magnanimous queen Boadicea, in A. D. 80, with the destruction of 80,000 of her soldiers.

II. The Roman Relinquishment of Britain, A. D. 446. The Roman frontier being invaded at every point, the troops were withdrawn from Britain, and its inhabitants absolved from their allegiance to the Emperor of Rome.

III. The Saxon Heptarchy, A. D. 585. The Britons having invited the Saxons Hengist and Horsa in 449, to aid them against the Scots, successive bodies of Germans came over and settled in Britain, until they conquered the country, which seven chiefs divided among themselves, forming what is called by historians the Heptarchy, or sevenfold government.

IV. Austin's Mission, A. D. 596. Pope Gregory the Great, sent Austin, and forty monks to assist him, into Britain, to convert the Saxons to Popish Christianity. They were received by Ethelbert, the king of Kent, whose wife was a French princess, who had embraced Christianity. Austin was the first Archbishop of Canterbury.

V. The Danish Conquest, A. D. 1017. This was completed by Canute, after the Danes had struggled in their attempts during 200 years, in fifty-four battles by land, and thirty-eight by sea, with grievous sacrifices of human life.

VI. The Norman Conquest, A. D. 1066. Edward III, had made William Duke of Normandy his heir: but Harold II was chosen by the people. William overcame his rival, who fell on the field of battle near Hastings, with about 60,000 of his soldiers.

VII. The Reformation, A. D. 1545. Luther had begun the Protestant Reformation in Germany, A. D. 1517; and his example, in making the sole appeal in religion to the Holy Scriptures, was beginning to be followed in many nations. William Tindal retired to the continent to translate the scriptures into English, and the Bible was ordered by Henry VIII to be set up in Churches for the people to read in 1539: but the pope's supremacy was not abolished in England till 1545, and the Reformation was not completed till the reign of Edward VI.

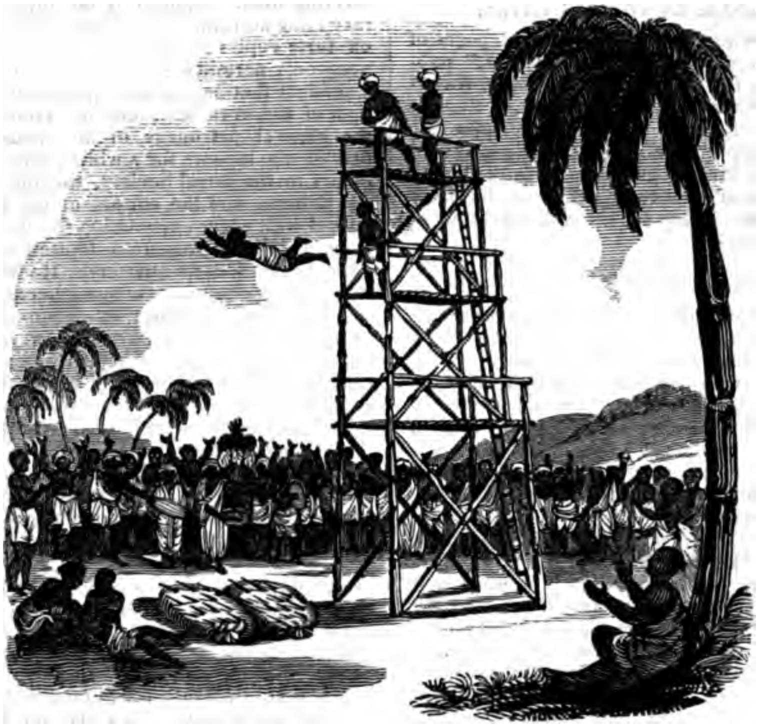
VIII. The Commonwealth, A. D. 1649. Charles I and his parliament had been contending about eight years, when he was condemned, and afterwards beheaded, January 30, 1649. Oliver Cromwell became Lord Protector of England.

IX. The Restoration, A. D. 1660. Charles II, son of the late king, was an exile in Holland: but he was invited back after the death of Oliver Cromwell, and the resignation of the Protectorship by his son Richard, and was proclaimed, May 8, 1660, and entered London May 29.

X. The Glorious Revolution, 1688. This event is deservedly called glorious; as by it the constitutional liberties of the English were settled, and an end was put to the long series of grievous persecutions which had been endured by the Dissenters from the Church of England.

EPITAPH ON ZANCHIUS, AN EMINENT CHAMPION FOR THE TRUTH.

Here Zanchius rests, whom love of truth constrain'd
To quit his own and seek a foreign land.
How good and great he was, how form'd to shine,
How fraught with science human and divine,—
Sufficient proof his numerous writings give,
And those who heard him teach and saw him live.
Earth still enjoys him, tho' his soul is fled:
His name is deathless, tho' his dust is dead.



HINDOO SUPERSTITIONS.

HINDOO SUPERSTITIONS AND SELF-TORTURE.

The cut which, in the first page of this number, we present to our readers, illustrative of Hindoo superstition, is from a collection of drawings taken by a native. It represents the self-tortures of the deluded devotees at a great religious festival, in honour of Shivu, one of the principal divinities worshipped in British India. The man to the left in the picture has a ramrod run through his tongue:—he in the centre is dancing with an enormous snake round his neck, but which has been deprived of its fangs:—the third is holding burning coals in a pan, the wire handles of which are stuck into his sides. It makes us blush for human nature, to think that multitudes of our fellow-subjects in India should take such absurd methods to honour their imaginary gods, and which, with all their accompanying impurities, should be sanctioned by the Brahmins, their priests.

Mr. Ward, one of the Baptist missionaries, in his larger work on the Hindoo mythology, gives us much information concerning the debasing superstitions in India; many of which are still practised, and even in the city of Calcutta. At the "abominable Cherook Poojah," a religious festival, among other modes of self-torture, that is common which is represented in the cut on this page. Devotees, called sunyasses, or perfect ones, throw themselves from a considerable height upon iron spikes fixed in the ground beneath. They erect a stage of bamboos, having three resting places, the highest about twenty feet from the ground. From these heights, these people cast themselves on spikes stuck in bags of straw. As the spikes are laid nearly flat, the deluded wretches are seldom wounded mortally, but sometimes they are killed by the fall. In some villages, several of these stages are erected, and as many as two or three hundred persons cast themselves down on these spikes in one day, in the presence of great crowds assembled for the purpose of being spectators of this devotion.

In the cut we have given, a ladder is seen behind, by which the stage is ascended, and at the foot are the bags of straw planted with spikes. One person is seen just removed, in a wounded state,—another in the act of descending,—and a third, at the top of the stage, is preparing to follow! This is a part of the Hindoo religion! "Alas!" says a friend to Christian missions, after witnessing the scenes we have described, and others of a similar character, "what a week has this been for every abomination! The quantity of human blood shed in various ways in this country, from the earliest ages to the present period, has perhaps always been greater than in any nation upon the face of the earth, in ancient or modern times."

Who, that enjoys the inestimable blessings of Christianity, does not pray, "Have respect, O God! unto the covenant: for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty," Psal. lxxiv, 20; remembering that his gracious promise assures us—"They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Isaiah xi, 9.

ON CONSCIENCE.

There is a pang which vice can ne'er conceal,
A pang which virtue never yet could feel;
Man, though no other monitor advise,
Still in his secret moments this will rise
To curb his darings—to inflict despair—
And draw from human misery a tear;
As keen remembrance of a misspent life,
O'erwhelms the soul with agonizing strife.
Know! when reflections in the bosom spring,
Th' accusing conscience never wants a sting.

PERSEVERANCE IN DIFFICULTIES.

We select the following from the delightful pages of "the Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties," published by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, as "a most extraordinary instance of literary industry and perseverance;" and to urge upon our young friends the importance of never giving way to trifles, either in their literary pursuits, or in the acquisition of any branch of science or art, to which their taste might lead them. They should take the line of Terence as their motto—

> "Nil tam difficile est, quin quærendo investigari possit."

"There is nothing so difficult, but may be overcome by endeavouring."

The Reverend William Davy, A. B. was born in 1743, near Chudleigh in Devonshire, where his father resided on a small farm, his own freehold. From a very early age he gave proofs of a mechanical genius, and when only eight years old, he cut out with a knife and put together the parts of a small mill, after the model of one that was then building in the neighbourhood, the progress made in constructing which he used to observe narrowly every day, while he proceeded with equal regularity in the completion of his own little work. When the large mill was finished, it was found not to work exactly as it ought to have done, and the defect at first eluded the detection even of the builder. It is said, that while they were endeavouring to ascertain what was wrong, the young self-taught architect made his appearance, and, observing that his mill went perfectly well, pointed out, after an examination of a few minutes, both the defect and the remedy.

Being intended for the Church, he was placed at the Exeter Grammar School; and here he distinguished himself by his proficiency in classical learning, while he still retained his early attachment to mechanical pursuits, and exercised his talents in the construction of several curious and ingenious articles. At the age of eighteen he entered at Oxford, where he took the degree of A. B. at the usual time. It was during his residence at the University that he conceived the idea of compiling a system of divinity, to consist of selections from the best writers, and began to collect, in a common place book, such passages as he thought would suit his purpose. On leaving college, he was ordained to the curacy of Moreton, in the diocese of Exeter, and not long after he removed to the adjoining curacy of Lustleigh, with a salary of 40*l.* a year. In the year 1786, he published, by subscription, six volumes of sermons by way of introduction to his intended work; but this proved an unfortunate speculation, many of the subscribers forgetting to pay for their copies, and he remained in consequence indebted to his printer above a hundred pounds. This bad success, however, did not discourage him: he pursued his literary researches and completed the work. But when his manuscript was finished, he found that from its extent, it would cost two thousand pounds to get it printed. In these circumstances, he again contemplated publication by subscription, and issued his proposals accordingly; but the names he collected were too few to induce any bookseller to risk the expense of an impression of the work. Determined not to be defrauded of the honours of authorship, Mr. Davy now resolved to become a printer himself. So, having constructed his own press, and purchased from a printer, at Exeter, a quantity of worn and cast-off types, he commenced operations, having no one to assist him except his female servant, and having of course to perform alternately the offices of compositor and pressman. Yet in this manner did the ingenious and persevering man, sustained by the anticipation of the literary fame awaiting him, proceed until he had printed off forty copies of the first three hundred pages, his press only permitting him to do a single page at a time. Confident that he had now produced so ample a specimen of the work as would be certain to secure for it the general patronage of the learned, he here suspended his labours for a while; and having forwarded copies to the Royal Society, the universities, certain of the bishops, and the editors of the principal reviews, waited with eager expectation for the notice and assistance which he conceived himself sure of receiving from some of these quarters. He waited, however, in vain; the looked-for encouragement came not. Still, although thus a second time disappointed, he was not to be driven from his purpose, but returned with unabated courage to his neglected labours. He no doubt thought that posterity would repair the injustice of his contemporaries. In one respect, however, he determined to alter his plan. His presents to the bishops, critics, and learned bodies, had cost him twenty-six of his forty copies; and for the completion of these, so thanklessly received, he naturally enough resolved that he would give himself no farther trouble, but limit the impression of the remainder of the work, so as merely to complete the fourteen copies which he had reserved, in this way saving both his labour and his paper. And he had at last, after thirteen years of unremitting toil, the gratification of bringing his extraordinary undertaking to a conclusion. The book, when finished, the reader will be astonished to learn, extended to no fewer than twenty-six volumes 8vo., of nearly five-hundred pages each! In a like spirit of independence he next bound all the fourteen copies with his own hands; after which he proceeded in person to London, and deposited one in each of the principal public libraries there. We may smile at so preposterous a dedication of the labours of a life-time as this; but, at least, the power of extraordinary perseverance was not wanting here, nor the capability of being excited to arduous exertion, and long sustained under it, by those motives that act most strongly upon the noblest natures—the consciousness of honourable pursuit, and a trust in the verdict of posterity. It is true this temper of mind might have been more wisely exercised; and the patience, ingenuity, and toil, which were expended upon a performance of no great use in itself, bestowed upon something better fitted to benefit both the zealous labourer and his fellow-men. Yet this consideration does not entitle us to refuse our admiration to so rare an example of the unwearied and inflexible prosecution of an object, in the absence of all those vulgar encouragements which are generally believed and felt to be so indispensable.

THE SABBATH.

It is the day of rest! Let earth retire
  And leave my thoughts, eternal God, to thee.
  Let my dull heart, this sacred morning, be Warm'd by thy grace and touch'd with heavenly fire.
Softly the sabbath-bell is heard afar,
  Like mercy's summons to a feast of love;—
  On to the house of prayer the suppliants move
To tell their wants to Him whose sons they are.
Vain is the sculptur'd roof—the long-drawn aisle—
  Vain music's tone and vain the silken vest:
  That worshipper, and he alone, is blest,
On whose rapt soul the Spirit deigns to smile.
Yet do the sabbath's joys but dimly show
The bliss of that bright world to which we hope to go.

THE SKYLARK.

(Alauda arvensis. LINNÆUS.)

THE beautiful notes of this delightful songster must have struck upon the ears of every one who has taken a walk into the fields at this season of the year. It is one of the very few birds that sing while flying. It mounts perpendicularly into the air, and continues for a long time singing almost over the same spot. It often soars so high, that the music vibrates upon the ear long after the musician has disappeared, and from these circumstances it has been used as a theme by the poet, and as an incentive to devotion by the divine. It is said to begin its song before the morning dawns; to this Milton alludes in his L'Allegro:

> " To hear the lark begin his flight,
> And singing startle the dull night,
> From his watch-tower in the skies,
> Till the dapple dawn doth rise."

And also Shakespeare:

> " The gentle lark, weary of rest,
> From his moist cabinet mounts up on high,
> And wakes the morning, from whose silver breast
> The sun ariseth in his majesty."

This harmony it continues several months; generally beginning it in May, and ending in September.

The lark forms a genus in the Linnæan system, but the British species are only two; the subject of this paper, and the wood-lark. The general characteristics of the skylark, are as follows. " The length seven inches, bill dusky; the feathers on the top of the head are dusky, bordered with reddish brown; they are rather long, and capable of being raised in form of a short crest; on the upper parts of the body the feathers are reddish brown, darker in their middle, their edges pale; the under parts are dirty buff colour, darkest on the neck and breast, which parts are streaked with dusky; the tail is dusky brown, the two middle feathers darkest, with light reddish margins; legs dusky in old birds, but lighter in young; claws dusky; the hind one very long and straight."

This bird builds on the ground, amongst grass or corn; its nest is formed of dry grass, and other vegetable stalks, lined with fine dry grass.. The eggs are four or five in number, of a dirty white, blotched and spotted with brown.

In the winter, larks assemble in large flocks, when they are taken in great numbers, and are found to be very fat. Far greater numbers are taken in Germany, where a duty is levied upon them; this paid at Leipsic, according to Dr. Latham, amounts to 12,000 crowns per annum (about 2,800*l.* sterling); at the rate of a groschen, or two pence halfpenny for sixty larks.

These birds are common to almost all parts of this kingdom, especially where corn abounds. Mr. Rennie says (Colonel Montague's Dict.), " In the beginning of September they are seen in great numbers in Egypt about Cairo, and continue some days; they are supposed to come from Barbary, and are called in Egypt Asfour Djebali, or Mountain Birds."

ON THE LARK.

From the green waving corn
The lark spreads his wings,
And hails as he sings
The fresh glow of the morn.
With pinions replenish'd, he hovers on high,
And so far sends his song from the blue vaulted sky,
You would think the shrill note, as he soars from your view,
To his dear native earth bade for ever adieu!
But his eye is still fixed where his wing shall repose;
And though heavenward his flight
He upholds with delight,
Yet with rapture he darts to the spot whence he rose.

TOBIN.

THE TOAD EMBEDDED IN A TREE.

I REMEMBER some years ago getting up into a mulberry tree, and finding in the fork of the two main branches a large toad, almost embedded in the bark of the tree, which had grown over it so much that he was quite unable to extricate himself, and would probably in time be completely covered over with the bark. Indeed, as the tree increased in size, there seems to be no reason why the toad should not in process of time become embedded in the tree itself, as was the case with the end of an oak rail that had been inserted into an elm tree, which stood close to a public footpath. This, being broken off and grown over, was, on the tree being felled and sawn in two, found nearly in the centre of it. The two circumstances together may explain the curious fact of toads having been found alive in the middle of trees; by showing, that the bark having once covered them, the process of growth in the tree would annually convey the toad more nearly to the centre of it, as happened with the oak rail; and by showing that toads, and probably other amphibia, can exist by the absorption of fluids on the skin alone. This is confirmed by the following fact. A gentleman informed me, that he put a toad into a small flower-pot, and secured it so that no insect could penetrate into it, and then buried it in the ground at a sufficient depth to protect it from the influence of frost. At the end of twenty years he took it up, and found the toad increased in size, and apparently healthy. Dr. Townson, in his tracts on the respiration of the amphibia, proves, I think satisfactorily, from actual experiment, that, while those animals with whose economy we are best acquainted receive their principal supply of liquids by the mouth, the frog and salamander tribes take in theirs through the skin alone; all the aqueous fluid which they take in being absorbed by the skin, and all they reject being transpired through it. He found that a frog absorbed nearly its own weight of water in the short time of an hour and a half, and that by being merely placed on blotting paper well soaked with water; and it is believed that they never discharge it, except when they are disturbed or pursued, and then they only eject it to lighten their bodies, and facilitate their escape. That the moisture thus imbibed is sufficient to enable some of the amphibia to exist without any other food, there cannot I think be a reasonable doubt; and if this be admitted, the circumstance of toads being found alive in the centre of trees, is accounted for by this and the preceding facts related.—Jesse's Gleanings in Natural History.

FEROCITY OF THE CAT.

THE cat in its wild state is a very fierce and destructive animal: when wounded it has been often known to attack its pursuers, and it will always defend itself with desperate resolution, when driven to extremities. At Barnborough, a small village between Doncaster and Barnsley in Yorkshire, there is a tradition extant of a conflict that once took place between a man and a wild cat. The fight is reported to have begun in an adjacent wood, and to have been continued from thence into the porch of the church, where it ended fatally to both combatants. A rude painting in the church commemorates the event; and the natural red tinge of some of the stones, is considered as stains of blood which still remain.

CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

Soldier, go! — but not to claim
Mouldering spoils of earth-born treasure,
Not to build a vaunting name,
Not to dwell in tents of pleasure.
Dream not that the way is smooth,
Hope not that the thorns are roses;
Turn no wishful eye of youth,
Where the sunny beam reposes.
Thou hast sterner work to do,
Hosts to cut thy passage through:
Close behind thee gulphs are burning —
Forward! — there is no returning.

Soldier, rest! — but not for thee
Spreads the world her downy pillow;
On the rock thy couch must be,
While around thee chafes the billow.
Thine must be a watchful sleep,
Wearier than another's waking;
Such a charge as thou dost keep Brooks no moment of forsaking.
Sleep, as on the battle-field,
Girded — grasping sword and shield:
Those thou canst not name nor number,
Steal upon thy broken slumber.

Soldier, rise! — the war is done:
Lo, the hosts of hell are flying;
'Twas thy Lord the battle won;
Jesus vanquish'd them by dying.
Pass the stream — before thee lies
All the conquer'd land of glory;
Hark! what songs of rapture rise,
These proclaim the victor's story.
Soldier, lay thy weapons down,
Quit the sword, and take the crown;
Triumph! all thy foes are banish'd,
Death is slain, and earth has vanish'd.

CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH.

ON THUNDER.

THUNDER is excited by a sudden kindling of sulphureous exhalations. Its cause long puzzled the philosophers, and various hypotheses were formed for removing the difficulty; but the ingenious Dr. Franklin of America has solved the problem by showing, that it is nothing more than the electric fluid, darting from the clouds in which it is collected. The distance the thunder is from us, may nearly be estimated by the interval of time between our seeing the lightning and hearing the thunder; for as the motion of light is so very quick, that the time it takes up in coming to us from the cloud is not perceptible, and as that of sound is about 1000 feet in a second; allowing 1000 feet for every second that passes between our seeing the one, and hearing the other, we have the distance of the cloud (pretty nearly) whence the thunder comes. Thus we see, O mortal man! by what this terrific noise originates; but I ask what power it is that causes so great convulsion in the heavens! It is, O sinner! the Ruler of the universe: it is the hand of the Most High, which hurls the thunderbolt. Nature rests in his hands, he preserves and blesses, and at his almighty word the heavens and the earth are convulsed. The thunder roars; how dreadful is the stormy sky. The lightning flashes, the thunderbolt is shot. O God! how great art thou, and how terrible is thy power! God directs the thunder; the sinner hears and trembles: scarce does he dare to lift up his eyes towards Him whose voice seems to threaten him with death. O Christian! let not the majesty of thy God affright thy soul, when he sits in the stormy clouds, when the mighty sound of thunder terrifies the wicked.—W. E. H.

READING AND STUDY.

By Dr. Hickes.

SOME persons have so much time on their hands, that they know not how to spend it: it is a burthen and a charge; and so, like prodigals, they rather fling it away, than take pains to improve it. I counsel you, therefore, to set aside some hours for reading; it is a handsome diversion, and conveys profit through pleasure. The intellect is a grateful soil; but then, like a field, it requires cultivation. By reading you join past ages to the present; you travel into Asia, Africa, and America, without expense, without danger, nay, without walking out of your closet. Sensual pleasures rather stupify than delight; they play upon the organ, and dull the appetite; they are often brutal, and seldom innocent: but those of the understanding shine brighter; they are of a more refined metal, free from dross, and void of repentance: they extend the faculty, and render it more rational; they rather whet desire than glut it, and screw man's noblest prerogative, reason, up to the highest pitch. A man furnished with reading, can never be at a loss to set on foot and carry on a handsome conversation: he is always well stocked, and carries his provisions about him; whereas others are forced to fetch matter from the kennel or the stable, and too often from worse sources.

I would not have you upon all occasions discourse in syllogism, nor deliver your thoughts in mood and figure: but time your subject. Good things spoken out of season lose their value. Discourse must be adapted to the company; and it takes more when it naturally slides in, than when drawn in by head and shoulders. In a word, enrich your understanding by the knowledge of things that become your quality; and when you are doubly equipped (I mean with a fair estate and a good fund of learning), what can you desire more, but an ordinary stock of prudence to lay them out at advantage?

ARABIAN SUPERSTITIONS.

BURCKHARDT, the African traveller, in 1815, mentions that Yambo (on the Red Sea) was then desolated by the plague, and he describes a curious ceremony of a camel covered with all sorts of ornaments, bells, feathers, &c., being led in procession through the city, and afterwards slaughtered at the burial ground, and its flesh thrown to the vultures and dogs; the Arabs, who are very superstitious, hoping the plague would take refuge in the body of the camel, and that by killing the animal they should get rid of the disorder.

Bruce, about sixty years ago, mentions something of a similar nature taking place after a violent quarrel in the town. The belligerent parties seized a camel, loaded it with reproaches, accused it of having been the cause and origin of the dispute, and at length, putting an end to its life, amicably settled their misunderstanding.

There seems something of the nature of the scape goat of the Israelites in this singular ceremony.

SUPERSTITION AND HUMAN SACRIFICES OF THE DRUIDS.

DRUIDS.

R. Booker, the vicar of Dudley, nearly thirty years o, we heard deliver an interesting sermon at St. Phi-
's church, Birmingham, before several "Friendly cieties," called Druids, on one of their festivals.
e reverend Doctor contrasted the pagan with the ristian condition of Britain, under the domination
the ancient Druids, taking for his text, 1 Pet ii, 9,
. "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priest-od, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should ow forth the praises of Him who hath called you out darkness into his marvellous light: who in times t were not a people, but are now the people of d."

We were most deeply interested with the learned acher's portraiture of Druidism in Britain; and we e reason to believe that our young readers, who e been privileged with a Christian education, will l equal pleasure in contemplating the same subject.

he Names and Rank of the Druids.—The ids, Druidæ, or Druides, were the Philosophers and Priests of the ancient Gauls, Germans, and Britons. Some derive their name from the Hebrew word Drussim, which they translate contemplores, men given to meditation: while others say they were so called from Drus, the Greek word for an Oak, on account of their dwelling and offering sacrifices under that kind of noble trees: but others suppose they were so called from the old British word Drus, the same as the Greek, and signifying a Magician.

These venerated priests were the most distinguished order among the Gauls and Britons, chosen out of the principal families; and the honours of their birth, considered with their office, procured them the highest reverence among the people.

The Druids were divided into several classes, Vacerri, Bardi, Eubages, Semnothii, and Saronidæ: they were, however, considered chiefly under three ranks, Bards, or Poets; Vates, or Priests, and Naturalists; and Druids properly, who embraced the studies of both nature and morals with their religion. The Druids have been represented as the same among the ancient Gauls and Britons, as the Philosophers among the Greeks, the Magi among the Persians, the Bramins among the Indians, and the Chaldeans among the Assyrians.

The Doctrines taught by the Druids.—Attempts have been made, but in vain, to collect the opinions of the Druids, and form them into a system. Cæsar, in his "Commentary on the Gallic War," gives many particulars relating to them; and says, that "their chief principle is, that souls do not die with the body, but that after death they pass from one body to another, which doctrine they consider especially to inspire the people with courage and contempt of death: besides, they inculcate upon their youth many things concerning the stars and their motions, the magnitude of the world, the nature of things, and the power of the immortal gods."—"Mercury they worship as their chief god; of whom they have many images. They esteem him the inventor of all arts, and their guide in all their journeys and undertakings; they regard him as having particular influence over merchants and profits in trade. Next to him they esteem Apollo, then Mars, Jupiter, and Minerva, of whom they entertain the same notions as other nations. They think that Apollo can cure diseases; that Minerva first instructed men in arts and manufactures; that Jupiter is the ruler of heaven; and that Mars presides over war." They were ignorant of the only self-existent and ever-blessed God, the Creator of heaven and earth!

As to the moral doctrines of the Druids, some of them are too shocking to mention in this place: but we cannot refrain from inserting the following passage from Cæsar. "The men have the power of life and death over their wives and children; and when any nobleman dies, his near relations assemble to investigate the occasion of his death, and if there arise any suspicion, they have the power to bring his widow to trial in the most servile manner, and if the guilt be discovered, to burn her alive. Their funerals are conducted in the most sumptuous and magnificent manner, according to their quality: every thing dear to the deceased while living, even his animals, being cast into the funeral fire: and formerly, their vassals and clients, who were most beloved, were obliged to submit to the sacrifice of burning within the same fire with their lords."

Learning of the Druids.—As instructors of the people, Cæsar observes that "the Druids were exempted from the duties of war, and from the payment of taxes; and they enjoy many immunities. For this reason many chose their profession, and were placed under their tuition by their parents. They are reported to have learnt a great number of verses (some writers say commonly 24,000); for the purpose of which many continued at study during a period of twenty years. They do not commit them to writing; though they are not ignorant of letters, for in almost all other matters, both public and private they use (Greek) letters. They seem to observe this method for two reasons—that they may not deliver their learning to the vulgar; and that they may exercise more fully the memory of their pupils."

Much has been said of the Arithmetic, Geometry, Astronomy, Mechanic arts, and Medical skill of the Druids: but it has been chiefly speculation: yet if the remains of supposed Druid temples, especially Stonehenge, near Salisbury, were their work, they must have been well acquainted at least with some branches of mechanics.

Druids' Eggs.—Extravagant things have been reported concerning the miraculous eggs of the Druids. They were accustomed to wear them mounted in gold, as a charm, and as a medicine. This extraordinary egg was formed, as they pretended, by a great number of serpents interwoven and twined together. When formed, it was raised up in the air by their hissing, and was to be caught in a clean white cloth before it fell to the ground. The person who caught it was obliged to ride a swift horse, and to ride with full speed across a river, which stopped the serpent, that pursued him with great fury. The method of trying the genuineness of this egg was extraordinary. It was to be enchased in gold, and thrown into a river, and if genuine it would swim against the stream. It was about the size of an apple, and was worn, as Pliny testifies, as the "insignia, or badge of distinction of the Druids." Some suppose that this contrivance of the serpent's egg was a mere fraud, invented by the Druids to impose upon the ignorant and procure their admiration. Others imagine that it was only an emblematical representation of the creation of the world: the serpents denoting the Divine Wisdom forming the universe, and the egg representing the world formed by that Wisdom. The virtue ascribed to it, of giving those who possessed it a superiority over others, and endearing them to great men, was intended to represent the natural effects of learning and philosophy.

Religious Ceremonies of the Druids.—Cæsar remarks, "To the Druids belong the direction of divine things, of the public and private sacrifices, and the interpretation of their religion. The whole country is much addicted to superstition." The Druids performed their sacred rites in groves, and esteemed the oak as peculiarly the residence of the divinities: chaplets of it were worn both by the priests and the people; and its leaves were strewed around their altars. Misletoe, growing on the oak, was sought with diligence, as it was considered a sovereign remedy against evil spirits, and a preservative from ghosts and diseases. It was accounted sacrilege for any one to cut it besides a priest. On the discovery of it, the Arch-druid, assisted by his inferiors in the priesthood, cut the bush of it, with a consecrated golden knife; when two white bulls, which had been fastened by the horns to the tree, were sacrificed to the gods, to secure their effectual benediction upon the dedicated branch, as an antidote to diseases, and as a charm against the power of demons.

Horrible Customs of the Druids.—Human sacrifices were common among the Druids. Cæsar informs us, that "they who are dangerously ill, or daily conversant with the dangers of battle, either offer human sacrifices, or devote themselves to the altar. They have public offerings of this kind, which are committed to the care of the Druids, who have large hollow images, bound about with osiers, into which they put men alive, and setting fire to the case, suffocate them. Thieves, highway robbers, and other offenders, they believe are most grateful offerings to the gods: but when honesty has rendered these scarce, the innocent are forced to supply their place."

Prisoners taken in battle were thus sacrificed in the most barbarous manner. The victims, being stripped naked, and their heads being adorned with flowers, were tied to an oak, when the Arch-druid, invoking the gods, plunged the fatal weapon into their bowels, while the people shouted their horrid approbation!

Sometimes a hundred wretched captives at a time were enclosed in the dreadful wicker machine, which was set on fire by the Arch-priest, while the shouts of the multitude drowned the shrieks of the miserable sufferers!

This brief sketch of the ancient Druids, and their principles and practice, would naturally lead us to many serious and profitable reflections. What gratitude is due to the God of our salvation, who by his gospel has indeed "called us out of darkness into his marvellous light!" The following contrasted view of ancient and modern Britain, by a good writer, places our obligations to the benign religion of Christ in a conspicuous point of view.

"What was the condition of our country in the time of the Romans? Look back and consider;—see its ancient tribes, brave indeed, but savage, fishing in its waters, or hunting upon its mountains—their bodies painted in all the fantastic colours of barbarism—their minds still more disfigured with the stains of cruelty, impurity, and falsehood—the slaves of DRUIDICAL IDOLATRY—bending the knee to some demon—holding their wives as the slaves of their caprice and tyranny—and sacrificing the children whom God had given them at the shrine of the devil! What is our country now? Its inhabitants are settled into civilized and domestic life—the sciences cultivated—the arts advancing—industry, notwithstanding occasional stagnation, all astir—the fields waving with heavy corn—the most ingenious manufactures produced—the human intellect acknowledging but one God all-gracious and mighty—tyranny over the female sex abolished—and the cruel immolation of children altogether unknown!

"How has this wonderful change been produced? By the revelation of Jesus Christ. Human society will no doubt of itself make some progress towards civilization; but civilization without Christianity is barbarism. Is China civilized, with her infants exposed to the dogs or to the vultures? Is Hindostan civilized, with her widows self-immolated with the bodies of their deceased husbands, or her aged inhabitants exposed alive by their own children on the banks of the Ganges? Are Mohammedan countries civilized, with their females kept in almost constant confinement, and made the subjects of the most intolerable oppression? In none of the countries where a false religion prevails, can you ever find the human mind in that healthful condition which is necessary to the performance of any thing that is truly great or noble. Even the much-extolled nations of antiquity, although they exhibited the grandeur of intellect, did not exhibit the grandeur of morals; and it is the union of the two which alone can elevate man to that dignified station which his nature was intended to occupy. It is the Gospel of Jesus Christ which has softened the human heart, saving infants and widows and parents from premature death, and the female sex from bondage. It is the Gospel, which, emancipating man from the slavery of false religion, and thus communicating a right direction to his intellectual and moral energies, has become the parent of ingenuity, industry, learning, and happiness. Search the annals of the nations of antiquity, or of any country to which the Gospel is a stranger, where, amongst them, do you find any provision for the poor, any asylum for the destitute, any lazar-house for the sick, any refuge for the penitent profligate? But see these monuments of the spirit of the Christian religion scattered throughout our land—these trophies of her victory over the selfishness, or thoughtlessness, or cruelty of human nature! Were an ancient Greek or Roman, wrapping himself up in his scattered ashes, to rise from the dead, and to demand a proof of the blessings shed on Britain by the Gospel, I would point to our hospitals, to our infirmaries, to our penitentiaries; I would lead him to inspect our societies for clothing the naked, for visiting the destitute, for relieving the poor; and I would ask him, without fear of an answer in the affirmative, if such things were known in the cities of antiquity—in republican Athens, in imperial Rome? The mountains of our country show their features as rough as they did two thousand years ago—its torrents foam down their rocky beds with the same violence as ever—the ocean around us, hoary with storms, precipitates itself upon our shores with equal violence as in the days of Druidism. But how changed are the inhabitants of that country! Barbarism and cruelty have, like the snow before the sun, disappeared before the beams of Christianity; the moral world has assumed a mild and genial aspect, the efflorescence of Christian virtue has burst out upon it, and the ancient song has been verified—'The winter is past, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.'"

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

CAIN AND ABEL, THE SONS OF ADAM.

The Birth of Cain and Abel.

We have surveyed the life of Adam, the common father of all mankind. In that review, we beheld our first parents in their state of primitive uprightness, holiness, and happiness; living in the sweet enjoyment of intimate communion with God their Creator. And we have seen them in circumstances lamentably different; fallen from their original excellency and integrity; driven from the blissful presence of their Maker; and, by their criminal apostacy, their nature degraded and polluted, depraved and rendered mortal.

But although our first parents had cast themselves down from the high elevation of their creation, they were not destroyed: sovereign mercy had interposed, and they were still spared. As "grace reigned," they were blessed and made to multiply; that so, according to the unchangeable purposes of Heaven, their children might multiply and fill the earth. Labour and sorrow were the appointed lot of Adam and Eve, as the consequence of their disobedience: yet by faith in the promised seed, intervals of sacred pleasure and seasons of joyful hope would arise, to lighten the load of their oppressive cares, and sustain their weary spirits, while they endured the grievous loss of Paradise, and filled the number of their revolving years.

Cain was the eldest son of Adam, and the first man that was born into the world. His birth is reckoned to have taken place in the second year of the creation. Adam and Eve naturally desired the fulfilment of the gracious promise of their Creator, and to be blessed with children; and Cain was beheld by his delighted parents with rapturous satisfaction. They regarded their first-born smiling infant as a token of the munificent kindness of their Maker, and as a special boon from indulgent Heaven.

Remembering the Divine intimation of a Saviour, who should arise from her seed, Eve seems to have imagined that her first-born was the "Divine Man," who would bruise the head of the serpent, and secure their deliverance from degradation and evil: and therefore she said, "I have gotten a man from the LORD:" or, as some translate her exclamation, "I have gotten a man, the LORD." Agreeably to this fond hope, his parents called his name Cain, which signifies a possession: but how grievously mistaken and disappointed they were in their expectations, the character, history, and actions of this wretched man afford an affecting proof. So far from being a comfort to his parents, Cain rendered himself an example of wickedness; and for this reason he has been held forth by the inspired writers, as a warning to all future generations. 1 John iii, 12.

By the case of Cain, parents are impressively taught to beware of expecting unmingled happiness from their children, who, in many instances, plunge them into overwhelming sorrow by their evil courses as they rise up into life. Of human depravity, even in youth and from our birth, our Saviour has admonished us, in his affecting observation to Nicodemus, " That which is born of the flesh is flesh." John iii, 6.

Abel is believed to have been born in the following year; and as his parents had discovered the mistake into which their fond hopes had led them, in calling their first-born a possession, they gave the name of Abel to the second, a word which signifies vanity, or a vapour. Considering the untimely death of Abel, this name was singularly appropriate. Some suppose that the name was given under the Divine direction, by a spirit of prophecy; and it ought not to pass unnoticed, that among " the divers manners in which God spake in time past to the fathers by the prophets," names, significantly prophetical, were none of the least remarkable.

Abel, as the first on whom was executed the humiliating sentence, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," was an affecting instance of the correctness of the Psalmist's declaration, " Surely every man walketh in a vain show,—every man in his best estate is altogether vanity." Psal. xxxix. The name and history of Abel forcibly impress on us the humiliating reflection of the patriarch Job, " Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not." Job xiv, 1, 2.

Occupation of Cain and Abel.

Cain and Abel were heirs apparent to the whole world: for Adam, their father, was rightful lord of all the earth. Yet notwithstanding their nobility, and their large possessions, they were not brought up in idleness. God gave their father a calling even in Paradise, and Adam appointed one to each of his children. They were taught to labour, and were employed in necessary and suitable occupations. It is evidently the holy will of God, that we shall all have some useful employment while he continues us in the present world.

In the days of primeval simplicity, while men were unpractised in those schemes of self-interest, and self-gratification, which distinguish the following ages, agriculture and pasturage presented themselves as employments the most adapted for supplying the necessary demands of our nature. In these were the sons of Adam engaged. The tempers of the two brothers were different. Cain chose the cultivation of the earth, the business of his father, as most congenial with his active, energetic spirit, and his hardy, robust constitution. No occupation could be more innocent and rational, or more agreeable to the Divine command to Adam.

The mildness of Abel's disposition led him to prefer the pastoral life; and the care of the sheepfold was a course equally innocent and rational, and no less favourable to the pious exercises of a devout and contemplative mind. The business of keeping sheep, we perceive, is nearly as ancient as the world itself: nor was it esteemed beneath those who were the early favourites of Heaven, and who are now exalted to the highest stations in the Saviour's kingdom of glory. And, indeed, where shall we find usefulness, innocence, and pleasure, so combined in any other employment as they are in this?

No one subject has so frequently engaged the ingenious and elegant pens of the best poets, as the felicities of the pastoral life. Nay, when they would describe " the golden age of the world," and picture to our imagination a kind of heaven upon earth, they have found no method of doing it to greater advantage, than by representing shepherds, in times of peace, enjoying plenty and prosperity, feeding their flocks in verdant pastures, and leading them to living fountains of water, or reposing in shady groves.

But chiefly we should observe, the use which the wisdom of God in the Holy Scriptures has made of this employment, by transferring the pleasing images which it affords to the highest and most important truths of religion: whilst it teaches us how to make them the means of turning our eyes to the mercies and loving-kindnesses of our Lord Jesus Christ, the great "Shepherd and Bishop of souls." He nourishes the spirits of the righteous in pastures of eternal truth, and leads them to living fountains of divine consolation. Let no man then despise another for the supposed meanness of his occupation. The humble shepherd, who discharges his duties conscientiously, may comfort himself with this reflection, that he has " righteous Abel" for his example.

To the shepherds of Bethlehem, " keeping watch over their flocks by night," came the first glad tidings of the birth of our Saviour. Moses, the deliverer of Israel, was forty years a shepherd in the land of Midian; and King David, in his youth, kept his father's sheep in the wilderness,—and both David and Moses, in mountain solitude, held the most delightful converse with their God. With what beautiful simplicity does David improve this sentiment of pastoral care in the twenty-third Psalm, and many suppose that he wrote that edifying piece in his youth. " The LORD is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul."

Many a young believer, and many a youthful shepherd, it cannot be doubted, has been delighted with the language of that pious keeper of his father's sheep; and has sung his heavenly doctrines in the beautiful verses of Dr. Watts.

" My shepherd is the living Lord:
   Now shall my wants be well supplied;
His providence and holy word
   Become my safety and my guide.

In pastures where salvation grows
   He makes me feed, he makes me rest;
There living water gently flows,
   And all the food's divinely blest.

My wand'ring feet his ways mistake,
   But he restores my soul to peace;
And leads me for his mercy's sake
   In the fair paths of righteousness."

Being instructed by the Holy Scriptures how to raise his thoughts from things visible to things invisible, the humble Christian may make his business a perpetual lesson of heavenly wisdom and spiritual comfort; and so, after having, like Abel, lived a life of faith on earth, he may pass to dwell with him in everlasting mansions. Constantine the Great, the first Christian emperor of Rome, was accustomed to say, " My life, when at the summit of human felicity, is something more honourable than that of a shepherd, but much more troublesome."

THE EFFICACY OF RELIGIOUS EXAMPLE.

LORD PETERBOROUGH, when on a visit to Fenelon, at Cambray, was so charmed with the virtues and talents of the archbishop, that he exclaimed at parting, " If I stay here any longer, I shall become a Christian in spite of myself."

METEORIC STONES.

Meteoric stones are among the most extraordinary phenomena of nature. They are peculiar solid compounds of earthy and metallic matter, of singular aspect and composition, which occasionally descend from the atmosphere, usually from the bosom of a luminous meteor. Professor Jameson, in his "Manual of Mineralogy," observes, that meteoric iron falls from the air in all parts of the world, and appears to be formed in the atmosphere by some process hitherto unknown to us.

"While all Europe," says the celebrated Vauquelin, "resounded with the rumour of stones fallen from the heavens; and while philosophers, distracted in opinion, were framing hypotheses to explain their origin, each according to their own fancy, the honourable Mr. Howard, an able English chemist, was pursuing in silence the only route which could lead to a solution of the problem. He collected specimens of stones which had fallen at different times, procured as much information as possible respecting them, compared the physical or exterior characters of these bodies; and even did more, in subjecting them to chemical analysis, by means as ingenious as exact.

It results from his researches, that the stones which fell in England, in Italy, in Germany, in the East Indies, and in other places, have all such a perfect resemblance, that it is almost impossible to distinguish them from each other; and what renders the similitude more perfect and more striking is, that they are composed of the same principles, and nearly in the same proportion. The solitary masses of native iron that have been found in Siberia, Bohemia, Senegal, and South America, likewise agree in the circumstance of being an alloy of iron and nickel, and are either of a cellular texture, or have earthy matter disseminated among the metal. Hence a similar origin has been ascribed to them.

Langier, and afterwards Kenard, found chrome likewise in the proportion of about one per cent. in different meteoric stones they examined.

In all the instances in which these stones have been supposed to fall from the clouds, and of which any perfect account has been given, the appearance of a luminous meteor exploding with loud noise has been looked to as the cause. The stones likewise have been more or less hot when found after their immediately supposed fall. Different opinions however have been entertained on this subject, which is certainly involved in much difficulty. Some have supposed them to be merely projected from volcanoes; while others have suggested, that they might be thrown from the moon; or be bodies wandering through space, and at length brought within the sphere of the attraction of our planet.

Luminous bodies called fire-balls, meteors, &c., have in all ages been observed in the atmosphere, and many of them have been described by eye-witnesses. One of the most remarkable of these was the meteor which appeared in 1783. It was very luminous, and its diameter could not be less than one thousand yards. It traversed Britain and a considerable part of the continent of Europe with very great velocity, and at the height of nearly sixty miles from the surface of the earth. Most of the stones which have fallen from the atmosphere have been preceded by the appearance of luminous bodies, or meteors. These meteors burst with an explosion, and then the shower of stones falls to the earth. Sometimes the stones continue luminous till they sink into the earth; but most commonly their luminousness disappears at the time of explosion.

"Upon the whole," says Dr. Thomson, in his "System of Chemistry," "we may consider these stony and metallic masses as fragments of fire-balls which have burst in the atmosphere; but the origin and cause of these fire-balls will perhaps for ages baffle all the attempts of philosophers to explain them."

Amid the uncertain speculations of learned and wise philosophers, how consolatory is it to the humble Christian, that it is not necessary for him "to find out the Almighty to perfection," in any of his glorious works! "This is life eternal, to know Him the only true God, as revealed in his blessed word, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent," as "the great apostle and high priest of our profession."

SELECT LIST OF METEORIC STONES;

Collected from Dr. Thomson's "System of Chemistry," and Dr. Ure's "Dictionary of Chemistry."

1. In 1492, a stone of 260*lbs.* fell at Ensisheim in Alsace. It is now in the library of Colmar, and has been reduced to 150*lbs.*

2. 1581, July 26, a stone weighing 39*lbs.* fell in Thuringia. It was so hot that no person could touch it.

3. 1637, Nov. 29, Gassendi says, a stone of a black metallic colour fell at Mount Vaision, in Provence, weighing 54*lbs.* and it had the size and shape of a human head.

4. 1642, Aug. 4, a stone weighing 4*lbs.* fell between Woodbridge and Aldborough in Suffolk.

5. 1762, two stones weighing, one 200*lbs.* the other 300*lbs.* fell near Verona.

6. 1790, July 14, a great shower of stones fell at Barbotan, near Roquefort, in the vicinity of Bordeaux. A mass 15 inches in diameter penetrated a hut and killed a herdsman and a bullock. Some of the stones weighed 25*lbs.* and others 30*lbs.*

7. 1807, June 17, a stone weighing 160*lbs.* fell at Tmaiochin, in the province of Smolensko, in Russia.

8. 1818, July 29, a stone of 7*lbs.* fell at the village of Slobodka, in Smolenske. It penetrated nearly 16 inches into the ground.

9. 1824, towards the end of January, many stones fell near Arenazzo, in the territory of Bologna; one of them weighing 12*lbs.* is preserved in the Observatory of Bologna.

METEORIC STONES IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

Captain Kotzebue, the Russian navigator, relates the following as having occurred at the Sandwich Islands in September 1825.

"On the morning after our arrival, a remarkable phenomenon occurred, of which we were witnesses throughout its duration. While the heavens were quite clear, a thick black cloud formed itself over the island, resting its lower verge on the summits of the mountains, the densest portion of the cloud hanging over the little town of Hanaruro. The wind was perfectly calm, till on a sudden a violent gust blew from the north-east, and at the same time a crashing noise proceeded from the cloud, as if many ships were firing their guns; the resemblance was so perfect, that we might have supposed we heard alternately the individual shots of the opposing broadsides. This concussion lasted some minutes, and when it ceased, two stones shot from the cloud into the street of Hanaruro, and from the violence of the fall, broke into several pieces. The inhabitants collected the still warm fragments, and judging by these, the stones must have weighed full fifteen pounds each.

"They were grey inside, and externally surrounded with a black burnt crust. On a chemical analysis, they appeared to resemble the meteoric stones which have fallen in many countries."

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.

No. I.

Christian Experience! what is it?—is it a reality?—is it desirable?—The proud infidel, and the worldly formalist, unite in denouncing it as fanatic delirium, or enthusiastic extravagance. Others, well-meaning persons, ignorant Christians, speak of it as consisting principally of a state of depression, fear, and doubting, groaning under the consciousness of guilt and corruption.

Against all this we utter our decided protest, as a libel against our most holy religion.

Doubtless a Christian may be delirious, fanatical, enthusiastic, or extravagant; but what has any of this to do with Christianity? Are there not persons so distinguished, who make no pretensions to Christianity? Are these things taught and enjoined in the New Testament, as essential to Christianity? They are all forbidden, as inimical to our most holy religion!

Christians may indeed be depressed—fearful—doubting—and groaning under guilt and corruption: and instances may be found in the Scriptures, of holy men of God sometimes distinguished by such experience: but where, in the word of God, are we informed that such is Christian experience? Not in a single passage. That is experience inseparable from guilty, corrupted human nature; and it is found and felt, more or less, in every child of man: nor can it be otherwise, until the only antidote is realized, which is—Christian experience:—that which the New Testament describes as Christian experience!

The sacred writers define Christian experience as "the kingdom of God"—or "the life of God" in the soul—as "the fruit of the Spirit," the only sovereign remedy against fear and guilt, despondency and fanaticism. Christian experience, or "the kingdom of God," says the inspired apostle, "is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." Rom. xiv, 17. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Gal. v, 22, 23.

What connection can there exist between such a state of mind, and those fancies or evils with which weak or foolish men libel Christianity?

"Experience," Dr. Johnson defines as "knowledge gained by trial." Christian experience, therefore, must be Christian knowledge gained by trial; and to this a thousand passages in the word of God invite the guilty and the wretched children of man.—"Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money: come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money, and without price. Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness." Isai. lv, 1, 2. "O taste," says one that had large experience, "and see that the Lord is good: blessed are all they that trust in him." Psal. xxxiv, 9.

> "O sinners! come and taste his love,
> Come learn his pleasant ways,
> And let your own EXPERIENCE prove
> The sweetness of his grace."
> Watts.

Dr. Owen, "the prince of divines," defines Christian experience as "a spiritual sense, taste, or relish of the goodness, sweetness, useful excellency of gospel truths, endearing our hearts to God, and causing us to adhere to him with delight and constancy. All this experience, which is of so great use and advantage, consists of three things:—1. A thorough mixture of the promises with faith. It is that lively acting of faith, which gives a real incorporation of the things we are made the partakers of. When faith assiduously acts upon the promises, so that the mind is filled with their contents, then the foundation of this experience is laid. 2. It consists in a spiritual sense of the excellency of the things believed, wherewith the affections are touched and filled. No tongue can express that satisfaction which the soul receives in the gracious communications of a sense of the Divine goodness in Christ, whence it rejoiceth with joy unspeakable and full of glory. 3. It consists in experiments of the power of the word on all occasions, especially as it is the word of righteousness. This gives peace with God. This believing in, and feeling of the authority of the word satisfies the heart in its preferring spiritual, invisible, and eternal things, before those that are present."

Well meaning, but injudicious Christians, have denominated such a state of mind "Joyful Christian Experience," and the gloomy, sorrowful, dejected frame of heart, "Distressing Christian Experience." Distressing it may be, but it is not Christian: it dishonours Christ; and it caricatures his holy, happy, heavenly religion. That commands "Rejoice in the Lord always"—"Rejoice evermore." "Be careful (anxious) for nothing: but in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." Phil. iv, 6, 7.

Such is Christian Experience; and whosoever does not possess it,—so far fails of the possession and enjoyment of true religion.

THE CRUCIFIXION OF CHRIST.

After long watchfulness, extreme fatigue, mental agonies indescribable, and producing a perspiration tinged with extruded blood, indicating such a shock to the constitution as would of itself have probably become a cause of death; being dragged by unfeeling soldiers, in chains or galling cords; his temples pierced to the quick, whence a mortal fainting was not unlikely to have ensued; the blows of hands inured to violence, and perhaps armed with heavy gauntlets; being tied to a column, and his naked body torn with a scourge of dreadful torture, having iron points and bits of bone chained among the lashes; and then being compelled to bear the cross of death upon his lacerated and bleeding flesh;—after this train of previous suffering, the bare mention of which harrows up every feeling of humanity, and which could not but bring down the sufferer into the very grasp of death, Jesus was crucified: a mode of capital punishment, which was a horrible refinement of cruelty, and in which the whole weight of the body was suspended on nails driven through the hands; to the production of excruciating pain, but not of death, till long and lingering agony had subdued the powers of life. This agony, with the many aggravating circumstances peculiar to his case, the blessed Jesus endured for six hours. He then expired.—Probably about three hours after, the soldiers, men accustomed to the signs of death, inspected and were satisfied that dissolution had taken place: but one of them, whether in barbarous insult, or from a feeling of compassion, to extinguish any possibly remaining spark of life, or to put the question of death out of all doubt, drove his spear into the side of the corpse; and out of it blood and water immediately flowed, a physical demonstration that death had for some time taken place.—From Dr. Smith's Sermon on "The Resurrection of Christ."

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

EVANGELISTS AND APOSTOLICAL FATHERS.

15. Mark, the evangelist, besides the service which he has rendered to the church of Christ by his inspired Gospel, is believed to have been a useful assistant to the apostles Peter and Paul. He is called in the Acts, John Mark.

His ministry, in the latter part of his life, was successful in Lybia, Marmorica, and Pentapolis. He suffered various brutalities at Alexandria, at the celebration of one of the festivals of Serapis, an Egyptian deity, and died of his wounds. It is reported that the Egyptians, enraged at his opposition to their idolatry, broke into an apartment, in which Mark was engaged in prayer; and, having tied cords to his feet, dragged him through the streets to the prison; from which they again dragged him through the city, when he died, as they reached a place called Bacelus.

16. Luke, the evangelist, the amiable and faithful companion of Paul, was a physician of Antioch. But being converted to the faith of Christ, by the ministry of the apostle Paul in his native city, he consecrated all his powers to the glory of his Lord and Redeemer. This evangelist was inspired to write the Gospel history which bears his name, and also the Acts of the Apostles. Luke is said by some to have suffered martyrdom at Rome: but others affirm, that after Paul's imprisonment he went eastward, and preached in Egypt and Lybia; and that he itinerated in Dalmatia and France, Italy and Macedonia; and that while he was preaching the Gospel in Greece, a party of Pagans seized him, and for want of a cross hanged him on an olive tree.

17. Barnabas, the evangelist, is believed to have been a Levite, and of the country of Cyprus, and one of the seventy disciples whom Christ sent to preach through the villages of Judea. His proper name was Joses, to which the apostles added Barnabas, signifying The Son of Consolation, Acts iv, 36, 37. This name is believed to have been given to him on account of his singular talents as a minister in comforting and establishing weak believers. Barnabas was a person of great note among the apostles, to whom he gave up the price of an estate, which he sold to forward the cause of Christ, when he fully entered the evangelical ministry. In the missionary labours of Barnabas, some of which he prosecuted in company with the apostle Paul, he appears to have been eminently successful. Uncertain tradition says, that Barnabas gathered churches at Milan in Italy, and at Salamis in Cyprus, where he was stoned to death by the unbelieving Jews.

18. Timothy, the evangelist, was blessed with the early instructions of a mother and grandmother, who were both distinguished for their pious regard to the Scriptures. Their diligence and prayers were answered in the singular eminence of the religious character of Timothy; and being instructed in the Gospel by the apostle Paul as a son, he became the devoted assistant to that extraordinary ambassador of Christ. For many years he co-operated with the great apostle, in establishing and regulating the newly-formed churches. Timothy is called Bishop of Ephesus, by the Roman Catholics; but it is evident from the Scriptures, that his office was extraordinary—that of an evangelist, an assistant to the apostles in their special missionary labours. Timothy is reported to have been killed by the idolatrous crowds at Ephesus, at one of their abominable festivals which the evangelist was censuring: his martyrdom is said to have taken place about A. D. 97.

19. Titus, the evangelist, is believed to have been an idolatrous Gentile, but converted to the faith of Christ by the ministry of Paul. From several notices in the apostolical epistles, besides the Epistle to that evangelist, we learn that he became a faithful assistant to Paul in his various labours, accompanying him to Jerusalem, and to other places. Titus fulfilled several missions to Corinth, Crete, and Dalmatia, with much success. Concerning the death of this evangelist, we have no certain information. The last notice which we have of Titus mentions his going to Dalmatia, 2 Tim. iv, 10. Some suppose he returned to Crete, and died on that island at an advanced age.

20. Hermas, mentioned Rom. xvi, 14, is believed to have been a minister of considerable eminence among the primitive Christians. Though but little is known concerning him, his name is of some note with many, on account of a small book which he wrote, entitled "The Pastor."

21. Dionysius, the Areopagite, mentioned Acts xvii, 34, was born and educated at Athens. At twenty-five years of age he went to Egypt, to study at Heliopolis, under the priests of that country; and while there, it is said, he observed that eclipse of the sun which happened at our Saviour's crucifixion, by which he was led to exclaim, "Either the God of nature is suffering, or condoling with one that does!" At his return to Athens, he was elected a member of the court of Areopagus, whence his title the Areopagite. He was converted to Christianity by the ministry of Paul; and it is believed he became bishop of the Christian church at Athens, ordained by the apostle himself. Dionysius is supposed to have suffered martyrdom for Christ under the emperor Domitian, about A. D. 90, though others say under Trajan, about A. D. 107.

22. Clement, highly commended by the apostle Paul, Phil. iv, 3, is said to have been ordained bishop or pastor of the Jewish Christians at Rome, while Linus, and after him Anacletus, held the same office over the Gentile believers. After the decease of Anacletus, it is stated, that the Roman Christians were united under Clement, as their chosen pastor; he is therefore called "The third bishop of Rome." He is said to have presided over this church nine years, and to have died in the reign of Trajan, A. D. 100. There is extant a "Letter to the Corinthians," written by Clement in the name of the Roman church, and which in its style somewhat resembles the Epistle to the Hebrews. It breathes the pure spirit of Christian benevolence: and though it is manifestly inferior to the inspired writings, it has been pronounced, and it is deservedly esteemed, "the most precious and valuable treasure the church can boast, after the Holy Scriptures."

LINES, FOUND IN THE BOX OF A STUDENT

AT GUY'S HOSPITAL, AFTER HIS DECEASE.

Ah! fly, incautious youth, the flatt'ring snare
Which Pleasure spreads: of Beauty's arts beware;
Listen to Reason's voice; and Oh! disdain
To let destructive lawless passions reign;
Nor in one fatal moment hazard more
Than years of sad repentance can restore.

HYMN OF PRAISE.

Written during Illness, Jan. 1, 1832.

"Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits."—Psal. ciii, 2.

Lord of my life! to whom its powers belong,
Teach me to laud thy mercies in my song!
Some grateful record of thy love to raise,
And soar to thee upon the wings of praise.

When o'er the past I turn my thoughtful view,
And fleeting years, and long past scenes review,
What constant good, what unchang'd love I see,
What boundless favours, Lord, receiv'd from thee!

Thy tender care with being's dawn began,
Watched o'er my youth and led me on to man;
And forward still thy love and power engage
To guide me through to life's remotest stage.

But higher yet! yet higher mercies shine,
Gifts all thine own! transcendent and divine,
Which taught my soul a Father's smile to meet,
And bow adoring at a Saviour's feet.

Touch'd by such love, may praise employ my breath,
Loud sound through life, nor silent be in death,
Till, burst its bonds, my spirit flies to see
Its Father! Saviour! God! reveal'd in thee.

HARVEST STANZAS.

The harvest! the harvest! how fair on each plain
It waves in its golden luxuriance of grain;
The wealth of a nation is spread on the ground,
And the year with its joyful abundance is crown'd;
The barley is ripening on upland and lea,
And the oat-locks are drooping, all graceful to see,
Like the long yellow hair of a beautiful maid,
Where it waves in the breezes unloos'd from the braid.

The harvest! the harvest! how brightly the sun
Looks down on the prospect—its toils are begun,
And the wheat-sheaves so thick in the valleys are pil'd,
That the land in its glorious profusion has smil'd;
The reaper has shouted the furrows among—
In the midst of his labour he breaks into song—
And the gleaners laugh gaily, forgetful of care,
In the glee of their hearts, as they gather their share.

The harvest! the harvest! once more we behold
Fair plenty array'd in its livery of gold;
We are spar'd to exult in its bounties again:
A year hath been granted, and shall we remain
Forgetful of Him who hath lengthened our days?
Great God of the harvest, to thee be the praise!
Thou hast prosper'd our toils, and hast given the increase,
And establish'd the land in abundance and peace.

KING CHARLES I, ON A QUIET CONSCIENCE.

Close thine eyes and sleep secure,
Thy soul is safe, thy body sure:
He that guards thee, he that keeps,
Never slumbers, never sleeps.
A quiet conscience in the breast
Has only peace, has only rest:
The music and the mirth of kings
Are out of tune, unless she sings:
Then close thine eyes in peace, and sleep secure,
No sleep so sweet as thine, no rest so sure.

BOOKS OF STERLING MERIT.

The Christian Philosopher, designed to exhibit in the Outline of Natural History, and the Elements of Physics, the Wisdom, Beneficence, and Superintending Providence of the Deity in the Works of Creation. By William Martin. With Original Poetical Illustrations. 12mo. boards, pp. 504. Hamilton, London.

Mr. Martin has rendered a valuable service to the community by this publication. We could wish it to be in every family and school library, on account of the information it affords, and which is given in the spirit of a Christian. Science is a field so vast, so wonderful, and so entertaining, that every rational being, not sunk in sensuality, finds delight in exploring its riches. Comparatively few, however, of those who have written most learnedly on the various branches of Philosophy, have appeared to be Christians. They have seemed Atheists—morally incapable of directing their readers

"To look through Nature, up to Nature's God."

Mr. Martin is one of those few; and it affords us much satisfaction in recommending his interesting volume, as worthy of its title—"The Christian Philosopher." We shall have occasion to refer to this work in future.

The Messiah; a Poem in Six Books, by Robert Montgomery, Author of "The Omnipresence of the Deity" &c. &c. 8vo. pp. 300. Turrill, London.

Milton, almost alone, has done himself the immortal honour of devoting his poetical powers to celebrate worthily the honours of Messiah. Klopstock and Swain have made commendable attempts to show forth the praises of Messiah and the glories of Redemption in flowing numbers; and their works have gained many admirers among the pious. But the wonders of redeeming grace by the incarnation of Deity, in the recovery of mankind from condemnation, and their preparation for everlasting glory in immortality, is a subject of infinite magnitude, to engage the powers of the loftiest Muse.

Mr. Montgomery has done well in selecting this subject for his talents; and we congratulate him on his success. His Poem will do him honour, both as a poet and as a Christian; and we give it our cordial recommendation. We shall be able to give but one extract relating to the Last Judgment.

"We shall not sleep, but we shall all arise
For Judgment,—with an instantaneous frame
Of being, dust shall look on God, and live!
An hour is coming, when the grave will bear
And answer to a tomb-awaking trump
That thunders o'er the icy trance of death!
The waning universe, the earth and heaven,
Shall vanish in th' immeasurable deep!
But Thine own promise shall not pass away.
And though that hour, for resurrection doom'd,
Be hidden, shrouded from angelic mind,
A secret buried in eternal thought!—
As certain as the blood of Christ hath flow'd,
Messiah risen, and the Heaven received
And throned His presence,—He shall come again!"

GUADAMA, AN INDIAN IDOL.

DAMA, the celebrated Burmese divinity, is repre- d in our engraving. Temples to his honour, and es, like that which we here give, were found in ' part of the country visited by the troops of the ih army in the late war. Guadama is said to have many ages ago, a teacher among that people: e was deified on account of his merits.

e Baptists have a prosperous mission in Burmah; he labours of Mr. Judson, from America, were d on under difficulties and sufferings of the most il kind: the "Memoirs of Mrs. Judson," the of that devoted missionary, are well worthy of the al of all our readers. Several of the idols above sented, may be seen, we understand, at the on House, No. 6, Fen Court, Fenchurch Street, on.

ile writing this, we have lying on the table be- s an alabaster image of Guadama, as given above. s brought to England only a few months ago, by lical friend: the height of it about 14 inches; is rudely carved. How shockingly debased must be that people, who can bow down and worship stones, and contemptible figures like these!

THE EYE OF AN INDIAN IDOL.

Dining a few days ago with a gentleman engaged in the service of the East India Company, after the cloth was removed, we were gratified by a sight of some silver idols. Two especially interested us in a high degree: they were representations of Guadama, as in our cut. The sight of them led to conversation on the degrading genius of idolatry, the horrid customs attending it, and the immense treasures which were lavished upon the images and temples. A medical gentleman referred to "Brand's Manual of Chemistry," as containing a remarkable illustration of the extravagance of idolatry, in the "Eye of an Indian Idol." We give it for the edification of our readers.—"Among the crown jewels of Russia is a magnificent diamond, weighing 195 carats. It is the size of a small pigeon's egg, and was formerly the eye of a Brahminical idol, whence it was purloined by a French soldier; it passed through several hands, and was ultimately purchased by the Empress Catharine for the sum of 90,000*l.* in ready money, and an annuity of 4,000*l.*!"

IDOLATRY.

Nature of Idolatry.—Idolatry is the worship which a rational being pays to a senseless image, instead of God his Almighty Creator! However lightly we may regard this practice, on account of its known prevalence, surely nothing can present man in a condition more truly degrading to his nature; nothing can be more insulting to the glorious Majesty of Heaven, or in itself more highly criminal! The intelligent Christian philosopher and philanthropist may well weep for fallen, debased human nature, while he beholds his fellow-man—endued with reason, acute and penetrating in ordinary transactions, a skilful mechanic, and versed in various sciences—yet bowing down in religious veneration to a bit of metal, a block of wood, or a senseless stone!

Nations the most populous on earth, and celebrated for ingenuity, civilization, and refinement, are still sunk in this most shocking delusion, and practise idolatry as their dearest custom—expending in it their richest treasures, and sacrificing in it even their lives! Monstrous indeed is the impious practice: yet men take of "the trees of the forest," the cedar, the cypress, the oak, the ash, for domestic, culinary, and sacred purposes at the same time! The inspired portraiture of idolatry in Isaiah xliv, was drawn from the life, and its counterpart still exists! "He burneth part thereof in the fire: with part thereof he eateth flesh; he roasteth roast, and is satisfied; yea, he warmeth himself, and saith, Aha! I am warm, I have seen the fire: and the residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image: he falleth down unto it, and worshippeth it, and prayeth unto it, and saith, Deliver me; for thou art my god."

Idolatry prevails in every part of the world, and among all people who have not the precious treasures of God's holy word. All mankind are thus debased, in a greater or less degree, who are destitute of "the glorious Gospel of the blessed God:" and to extirpate this greatest of evils, "the Scriptures of truth" are the only means, by reading and preaching, diffusing "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

Mankind are still worshipping all the creatures of God, as were the ancient Pagans. They worshipped universal nature, the soul of the world, angels, demons, and the spirits of men departed, either separate or in union with some star or other body. They adored the luminaries of heaven, the sun, moon, planets, and stars, the atmosphere and the passing meteors, the earth, the mountains and rivers, the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, the fishes of the sea, and the reptiles of the ground. They worshipped men both living and dead, and in them the faculties of the human soul. In short, they worshipped the images of animals, even the most terrible and hateful, as serpents, dragons, crocodiles, and flies; they even adored inanimate things of the most humble kind, herbs and plants, every variety of vegetable!

Origin of Idolatry.—Archbishop Tennison, the learned Jacob Bryant, and many others, have written profoundly on this subject. But none of them have treated the matter so simply, forcibly, and accurately as the Apostle Paul in the first chapter of Romans. He traces the origin of idolatry to the blind depravity of the human heart. Endued with reason, man could not be an Atheist: the works of God in creation demonstrate his existence and divinity, as surely as the prints upon the sand would show the tread of the human foot, but infinitely more strongly. Guilty, fearful, and apprehensive of judgment, man must have a being to worship: but corrupt in heart, and blinded in mind, he could not worship an Almighty, a holy God; disquieted with terrors, and a prey to superstition—man sunk into idolatry!

Hear the origin of idolatry, as declared by the apostle. Man could not be an Atheist while possessing the faculty of rationality. "Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them (men), for God hath showed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse," in not acknowledging him. Rom. i, 19, 20. "And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient, being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness," &c., ver. 28, 29. "When they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing," &c., ver. 22, 23. "Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness. Who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen." Ver. 25.

From Gen. vi, 5, compared with Rom. i, 23, there is reason to believe that idolatry was practised before the Deluge; and this conjecture seems confirmed by the apostle Jude (ver. 4), who describes certain men in his days as "denying the only Lord God," and adds in ver. 11, "Woe unto them, for they have gone in the way of Cain:" from which it seems natural to infer, that Cain and his descendants were the first who threw off the sense of a God, and worshipped the creature instead of the Creator.

Paganism includes myriads of mediators and intercessors: from which it is manifest that its most ancient forms originated in primitive tradition, the purity of which soon became lost, and superstitions were added, according to the caprice or dread of the worshippers.

Dr. Prideaux, in his "Letter to Deists," gives the following account of the origin of the various idolatries. "When mankind began to increase after the flood, and they were taught from their forefather Noah, thus to worship God through hope in a Mediator; as the knowledge of those Divine truths began to decay, and superstition to increase among them, they began to determine themselves to such mediators as their own imagination led them to fancy; and some chose angels, and others men deceased, for this office; and, in process of time, erected temples and images to them, and honoured them with Divine worship, in order to render them more helpful and beneficial unto them."

ON TIME.

"Why sit'st thou by that ruined hall,
  Thou aged carl, so stern and gray?
Dost thou its former pride recal,
  Or ponder how it passed away?"

"Know'st thou not me?" the Deep Voice cried,
  "So long enjoyed, so oft misused—
Alternate, in thy fickle pride,
  Desired, neglected, and abused?

"Before my breath, like blazing flax
  Man and his marvels pass away;
And changing empires wane and wax,
  Are founded, flourish, and decay.

"Redeem my hours—the space is brief—
  While in my glass the sand-grains shiver,
And measureless thy joy or grief,
  When Time and Thou shall part for ever."

STATISTICS OF LONDON.

London, the metropolis of the British Empire, is reasonably believed to be the largest and most populous city in the world. London has been called the Modern Babylon, on account of its great extent and populousness. It is generally reckoned about seven miles long, from Poplar to Hyde Park Corner; and about five miles wide, from Islington to Camberwell: but these boundaries are too narrow, so greatly has the population increased.

The British metropolis includes within its gigantic bounds the two ancient cities of London and Westminster, the borough town of Southwark, and many adjacent villages. There are comprised in the "Bills of Mortality" (the lists of those dying) 147 parishes; of which 97 are within the city walls, 17 in the liberties without the walls, 23 out-parishes in Middlesex and Surrey, and 10 in the city and liberties of Westminster.

Such an aggregate, with the British court and palaces of the sovereign,—the houses of the senate,—the seat of government,—the chief courts of law and equity,—the residences of the nobility,—the grand emporium of commerce for all nations,—the source and centre of science and art to the empire and the whole world,—must necessarily present an immense variety of subjects, which might be rendered exceedingly interesting, even to the Christian reader. Our limits, and the plan of our work will allow us to embrace but a few of them, and upon those our remarks must be brief.

MORAL AND RELIGIOUS CHARACTER OF LONDON.

London and its immediate vicinity, we thus find, contains a population of nearly TWO MILLIONS of immortal souls!! Their character, and their eternal destiny, must force itself upon the consideration of every believer in the immortality of the soul, and the doctrine of future rewards and punishments—especially upon the mind of every intelligent Christian.

We have abundant reason to believe, that London contains men of every shade of character—many of the most eminent saints—persons of the most exalted sanctity;—and many who are like incarnate fiends—wretches of the most malignant disposition—beings, sunk as low as human nature is capable of being degraded on earth. We know that London contains many, the very element of whose holy life is love to God and active benevolence to man;—while it is evident, that there are many, whose minds cherish a deeply-rooted enmity against every thing which bears the lovely impress of the ever-blessed God our Creator, and whose whole mental powers are exercised in devising evil against their fellow men!

On the one hand, we behold in London the monuments of Christian mercy, MORE THAN THREE HUNDRED public institutions, formed by the voluntary benevolence of professed believers in Jesus Christ, to nourish the fatherless orphan—to support the friendless widow—to educate the wretched deaf and dumb—and to relieve human misery in every visible form; as well as to lead the ignorant and careless, both at home and abroad, to seek the blessings of salvation and eternal glory through the mediation of Jesus Christ.

On the other hand, we see offices of the magistracy, and the courts of justice, besides TEN PUBLIC PRISONS in London, humiliating indications of human depravity. These receptacles are occupied by practical infidels, whom conscience, honour, or regard to the future tribunal of God, cannot influence to abstain from injuring their neighbours, and to walk in the paths o virtue.

We have been informed, that public officers, most capable of forming a correct opinion, calculate, that in London there are 30,000 persons, who are supported by various kinds of depredations on the public! There are computed to be 15,000 boys in the metropolis, children of the poor, who are trained to every variety of vice! We forbear to enumerate further the several depraved classes of society in London, except the report of Mr. Wontner, the excellent governor of Newgate, for the year 1826, by which it appears, there were committed to that one gaol—

MEANS OF RELIGION IN LONDON.

"There is great difficulty," says Mr. Blackburn, in his "Discourse on the Moral and Spiritual Claims of the Metropolis," and which we strongly recommend, "in obtaining an accurate return of the various places of worship in this vast city, yet the following statement will, I believe, approach very near the truth:—

Episcopal churches and chapels....................	200
Independent chapels..................................	66
Wesleyan Methodist chapels.........................	36
Baptist chapels..	32
Calvinistic Methodist chapels.......................	30
Presbyterian (Scotch and Unitarian) chapels...	16
Roman Catholic chapels..............................	14
Quakers' meetings......................................	6
	400

"If we calculate that the average attendance at each place is 500 persons, which is certainly the greatest extent we can allow, and add 250 more for the fluctuating hearers at the several services of each Sabbath, it will give a result of 300,000 persons. Now the population of this wide-spread metropolis is estimated, by the last census (1821) at 1,274,800 souls; from which subtract the feeble minority above, and we find NINE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FOUR THOUSAND persons neglecting the public worship of God. And though considerable deductions are to be made for young children, sick persons, and the aged and infirm, yet, after all, the multitude, without even the forms of religion around us, is most appalling." The following statement will illustrate the occupations of the Sabbath:—"It appears, that of the papers at present published in London on the Sunday, there are circulated, on the lowest estimate, 45,000 copies; and that, upon the most moderate computation, between 2 and 300,000 readers of these papers are to be found in the metropolis alone; while the great number of pressmen, distributors, master-venders, hawkers, and subordinate agents of both sexes, and of all ages, who are necessarily employed on the Sabbath, all tend to the most flagrant breach of the day of rest."

We are by no means disposed to make the worst representation of the moral condition of London. We are aware of the commendable activity of the Christian Instruction Society, in its various and beneficial operations, and of the zealous exertions of several kindred institutions. But if virtue and vice are realities—if the Christian Scriptures are true—if the soul of man is immortal—if death, and judgment, and our individual appearance at the tribunal of God are certain—the state of the inhabitants of our metropolis is indeed most truly appalling! The energetic language of a clergyman of the established church, as quoted by Mr. Blackburn, is highly appropriate:—

"Such a mine of heathenism, and consequent profligacy and danger, under the very meridian, as it is supposed, of Christian illumination, and accumulated around the very centre and heart of British prosperity, liberty, and civilization, cannot be contemplated without terror by any real and rational friend of our established government; and is surely sufficient to awaken the anxious attention of every true patriot, every enlightened statesman, every sincere advocate of suffering humanity, every intelligent and faithful Christian!"

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE RATIONAL.

No. II.

INFIDELS have ridiculed spiritual religion, as professed by Christians. Why should this excite our astonishment? They do not understand its nature: they boast of reason, but in the neglect of worshipping their Creator, they sacrifice their just claim to rationality. "What can be so truly becoming a dependent state," says an elegant writer, "as to pay our adoring homage to the Author of all perfection, and profess our devoted allegiance to the Supreme, Almighty Governor of the universe? Can there be a more sublime pleasure, than to dwell in fixed contemplation on the beauties of the Eternal Mind? Can there be a more advantageous employ, than to present our requests to the Father of Mercies?"

But infidels are "alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their hearts." With all their presumed loftiness of understanding, such are merely natural, atheistical men—and we know well that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." 1 Cor. ii, 14.

"What, we ask" (says the Rev. Daniel Wilson, now Bishop of Calcutta, in his View of the Evidences of Christianity), "is there in these internal perceptions of life and consolation and strength, derived from the doctrines of Christianity, which should excite our astonishment? Would not the wonder be, if there were no such feelings, no such inward witness to the soul? What! are there excellencies in human knowledge; and shall there be none in divine? What! is an intelligent, well-educated man allowed to have powers of expression, and means of exciting our surprise and pleasure, beyond those of a child; and shall not the language of apostles and prophets, and the discoveries concerning God, and the soul, and eternity, be admitted to awaken emotions beyond the mere trifles of human knowledge and instruction? What! are men of uncommon endowments, as Bacon, Pascal, Newton, allowed to rise above those of ordinary talents; and are they expected to take wider views, and make more important communications, and excite warmer feelings of wonder, admiration, gratitude; and shall not the great and infinite God be allowed to surpass all the petty communications of man, in the mysteries of his will, in the importance of his commands, in the depths of his mercy, and in the correspondent emotions of fear, love, faith, hope, grateful joy, affiance, awakened in the heart? What! do we allow, that in the displays of glory and beauty in the works of creation, the natural perfections of God may be contemplated and known, and become to the pious and duly prepared mind, the sources of internal peace, thanksgiving, prayer, admiration, obedience, resignation; and shall we not admit, that men may see the moral perfections of God in the gospel? Shall all his mercy, and wisdom, and infinite contrivance in redemption have no effect upon the soul? Shall the stupendous fact of the incarnation be received with a tame indifference? What! do men allow, that tidings of joy and deliverance in human things, should call up proportionate affections; and that he would be thought a monster of ingratitude, who should receive with apathy the news of an immense act of royal clemency extended to him when condemned to death; and shall we not allow, that the glorious and unexpected tidings of redemption from eternal death, should awaken all the gratitude of the soul? Shall not pardon, and life, and adoption, and the hope of heaven, overwhelm the heart with correspondent perceptions and emotions?

"Yet, it is most reasonable, that if there be such a thing as a Revelation from the great God, comprising such amazing discoveries as the Gospel, affecting such all-important interests, promising such mighty aids of the Holy Spirit, laying down such grounds of faith, and love, and hope in Christ Jesus, delivering man from such complicated misery, and exalting him to such heights of holy peace and joy; it is most reasonable, that there should be such a thing as perceiving the excellency and glory of it, as feeling its efficacy, as having an inward witness of its fulfilment and operation in our own breasts. There is nothing to astonish us in such effects: the matter of astonishment would be, if Christianity did not assert, and Christians not experience them."

WHAT IS LIFE?

I ask'd a man of sorrow and of tears,
Whose corrugated cheek proclaim'd his years;
He mus'd awhile—and then distinctly said,
"Life is a burthen—would that I were dead!"

I ask'd a Christian, who had early stray'd
From virtue's path; this was the answer made—
"Life is a precious boon to mortals given,
Which, if well spent, will be received in heaven."

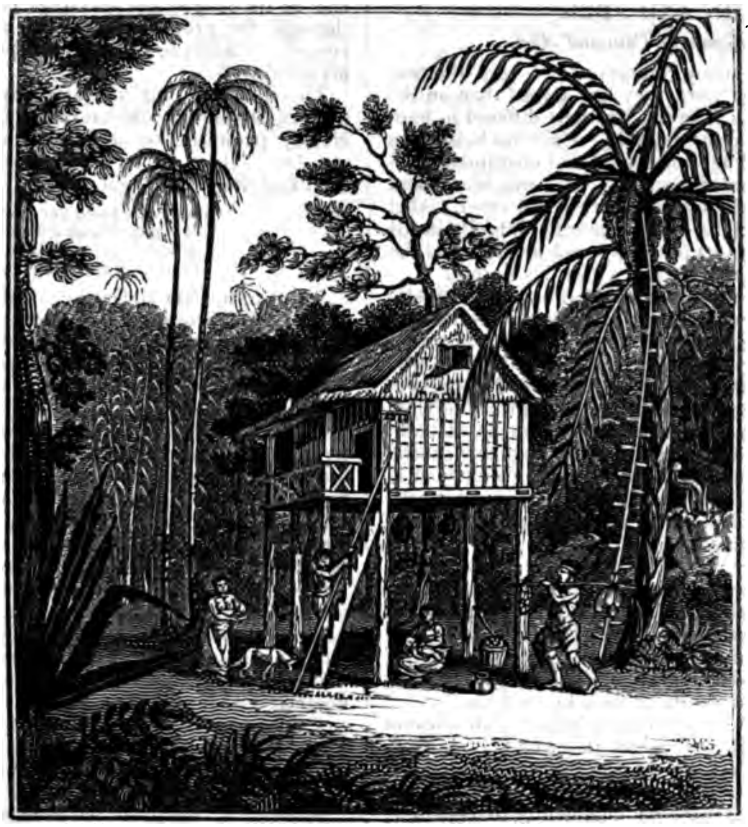
I ask'd an infidel, whose parting breath
Was faintly struggling with the tyrant Death;
"My life," he cried, "has hurled me down to hell—
I priz'd it not—and now it says farewell."

I ask'd a youth, whose cheerfulness of mien
Bespoke him happy in this active scene;
He told me 'twas "a poet's golden dream;"
And leaving me, rush'd forward with the stream.

I question'd age—it heav'd a heavy sigh
Expressing volumes; this was its reply—
"Life is, at best, but a tempestuous sea,
That fast rolls onward to eternity."

I ask'd myself—a voice appear'd to say,
"Beware you value it while yet you may;
'Tis a rich gift thy God bestow'd on thee.
Abuse it not—'twere better not to be."

REV. JOS. MARSDEN.



HOUSES IN SUMATRA.

RA is an island of Asia, the most western of the islands, and constituting on that side the boun-
' the Eastern Archipelago. It is about 1000 miles
;th, and almost 200 in breadth. Sumatra is in-l by various tribes, which by Mr. Marsden, who ıed a history of the country, are divided into , Achenese, Battas, Lampons, and Rejangs: each m has peculiar manners and customs.

ɔners that are taken in war, the Battas greedily
, and hang up their skulls in their houses, as
:s of their valour. Marsden says, that the idea ıng human flesh is so natural, that the natives r it is not the custom of the Europeans. He that they prefer this kind of food to all others, at the soles of the feet and the palms of the are accounted peculiarly delicious.

stian missionaries, by a gracious Providence, have ıbouring in this large island, and the above cut a by one of them to represent the native houses.
re erected, as is here seen, on posts driven into the
l. For this there are two reasons—earthquakes ry frequent, and wild beasts, bears, tigers, and nts, are numerous,—so that the people would l secure, unless their slight wooden houses were uilt. One of our missionaries who travelled h a part of the country, relates, that, at night, ere obliged to keep a strict watch, and discharge ıuskets to frighten away the elephants, lest they overturn the house altogether. It is said, that occasion, an elephant of uncommon size, when ; under one of these houses, not having room nt for his huge body, actually lifted up the whole g, and bore it away by main force!

WATERS OF THE RIVER NILE.

"The water of Egypt," says the Abbe Mascrier, "is so delicious, that one would not wish the heat to be less, or to be delivered from the sensation of thirst. The Turks find it so exquisite, that they excite themselves to drink of it by eating salt. It is a common saying among them, that if Mahommed had drank of it, he would have besought God that he might never die, in order to have had this continual gratification. When the Egyptians undertake the pilgrimage of Mecca, or go out of their country on any other account, they speak of nothing but the pleasure they shall have, at their return, in drinking the waters of the Nile. There is no gratification to be compared to this: it surpasses, in their esteem, that of seeing their relations and families. All those who have tasted of this water, allow that they never met with the like in any other place. When a person drinks of it for the first time, he can scarcely be persuaded that it is not a water prepared by art; for it has something in it inexpressibly agreeable and pleasing to the taste; and it should have the same rank among waters, that champagne has among wines. But its most valuable quality is, that it is exceedingly salutary. It never incommodes, let it be drank in what quantity it may: this is so true, that it is no uncommon thing to see some persons drink three buckets of it in a day, without the least inconvenience. When I pass such encomiums on the water of Egypt, it is right to observe, that I speak only of that of the Nile, which indeed is the only water drinkable, for their well-water is detestable and unwholesome. Fountains are so rare, that they are a kind of prodigy in that country; and as to rain water, that is out of the question, as scarcely any falls in Egypt."

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

CAIN AND ABEL.

The Religion of Cain and Abel.

CAIN and Abel, in many respects, were very different men: but in nothing were they less agreed than on the subject of religion. The two brothers differed in temper. Abel was meek and amiable,—Cain was boisterous and overbearing. Abel was candid and unsuspicious,—Cain was jealous and designing. Abel was tender and compassionate,—Cain was unrelenting and cruel. Abel was sincere and upright,—Cain regarded iniquity in his heart; and when opportunity occurred he disclosed the shocking malignity that lurked within his bosom.

The difference in these two brothers arose principally from their contrary dispositions, and their opposite sentiments concerning spiritual things. Cain was an infidel,—disregarding the ministry of his father, who preached reconciliation with God by faith in the promised Messiah. Abel was a believer in the word of God, which promised, in the seed of the woman, an all-sufficient Saviour. Cain was a deist, denying any special revelation from God, beyond that which is contained in his visible works. Abel, on the contrary, received the gracious intimations of Divine mercy with sincere faith, and with lively gratitude of heart.

Let our young reader consider the difference, which is here marked between Cain and Abel, as he may expect to find the same difference, in a greater or less degree, between avowed deists and sincere Christians, between declared infidels and devout believers. Our blessed Lord has given us an admirable rule of judgment, in saying, "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Cain, however, was not so entirely lost to all sense of propriety as totally to neglect the worship of God. He had not altogether cast off the restraint, which had been imposed upon him by the pious instructions of his father. We have reason confidently to conclude, that Adam had carefully inculcated upon both Cain and Abel, those sacred lessons of Divine truth, which he had learnt from the ministry of angels, from God himself, and by deep heartfelt experience. Bishop Hall observes, "Doubtless, their education was holy; for Adam, though in Paradise he could not be innocent, yet was a good man out of Paradise: his sin and fall now made him circumspect; and since he saw that his act had bereaved them of that image of God, which he once had for them, he could not but labour by all holy endeavours to repair it in them, so that his care might make amends for his trespasses."

Both the brothers were taught the knowledge of the true God, and the reasonableness of acknowledging his being and providence, by acts of religious worship. We learn from the Book of Genesis, that both of them were accustomed, at stated seasons, probably every sabbath, or at the end of harvest, to bring a devoted sacrifice to the LORD. "And it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground, an offering to the LORD." Gen. iv, 3.

Cain's consecrated gift was some of the fruits of the ground, "a thank offering," presented as an acknowledgment to God, for favours received through the seasons of the year: but it was not accompanied with contrition of heart on account of sin, nor intended as a propitiation, deprecating deserved punishment, nor even with sincerity of mind.

It is thought that the offering of Cain was not of the most valuable part of his fruits: but something imperfect and worthless. But God requires, as he deserves, the best which his servants can possibly present to him. "And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof." Abel came before the LORD in faith, as a sinner, according to the appointment of God. His offering was presented in sincerity, and was expressive of humility and believing obedience; and as he sought the blessings of the new covenant, through the promised Messiah, he was graciously accepted. "And the LORD had respect unto Abel and to his offering."

The vigour of our youthful days, and all our best powers, should be consecrated to God, and he has graciously promised to accept them. "I love them," says he, "that love me, and those that seek me early shall find me." Prov. viii, 17.

> "When we devote our youth to God,
> 'Tis pleasing in his eyes:
> A flower, when offer'd in the bud,
> Is no vain sacrifice."

"But unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect." It seems that no token of the Divine approbation accompanied the offering made by the elder brother; while God signified, in the most evident manner, his acceptance of that which the younger brother had laid upon his altar.

The reason why one was accepted, and the other rejected, is strikingly intimated by the apostle: it is to be attributed to the peculiar state of mind in the worshippers—to that of faith on the part of Abel, in which he offered his sacrifice. "By faith," says the inspired writer, "Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain." Heb. xi, 4. The faith thus commended, refers not only to his belief in the being of God, but also to the Divine promise of a sacrifice, which, in the fulness of time, was to be slain by the appointment of God, for the salvation of a guilty world. Abel's religion evidently comprised the five following great points of doctrine:—

1. The existence of an Almighty Creator and Governor of the world.
2. Obedience necessary to his revealed and righteous will.
3. Belief in the promised Messiah, as the Saviour of men.
4. Public confession of the sinful condition of mankind by means of vicarious sacrifice.
5. Dependence for acceptance with God on that atonement of Messiah which his own sacrifice prefigured.

Cain's religion was of a seriously different character. By bringing "the fruits of the ground" without a sacrifice for sin, he certainly acknowledged two great doctrines of religion:—

1. The existence of the Creator of the world.
2. The providence of God, by which the earth is rendered fruitful.

But he neither acknowledged his belief in a Saviour, nor his need of spiritual blessings; though we do not doubt that he had the same information on those subjects as that with which his brother Abel had been favoured, except so far as his irreligious mind had refused to regard the pious instructions of his penitent and believing father.

The offering of Cain was, therefore, not accepted. God could not, consistently with his justice and holiness, receive any thing, in the way of religious adoration, at the hands of a sinner, but through the merits of that sacrifice of Christ, which himself had appointed, and which was revealed in types as "slain from the foundation of the world." Rev. xiii, 8.

The religion of Cain differed from that of Abel, as much as the Deism of our times does from Scriptural Christianity; and its unholy fruits corresponded with natural character. Let our young readers ever beware of those who neglect the ordinances of Divine worship, or disallow the blessed word of God in the Scriptures as our only and infallible guide in the most important affairs of time and eternity.

VISIT TO POMPEII.

Pompeii and Herculaneum, towns of Italy, were destroyed by the great eruption of Vesuvius in the time of Titus, the Roman emperor, A.D. 79. Pompeii is about fifteen miles from Naples. Mrs. Elwood's description of her visit to those ruins cannot fail to be interesting.

"Our road passed through the palace of Portici, Resina, and Torre del Greco, till we came upon sheets of lava and beds of ashes, which, though interspersed with gardens, showed our vicinity to the volcano. But of Pompeii not a vestige was to be seen, till the coachman, after driving for some time between high banks of cinders, suddenly drew up at a rustic farm-yard sort of gate, and exclaimed, ere we were aware of its neighbourhood, 'Ecco Pompeii.'

"A few minutes brought us into the comic and tragic theatres, both paved with marble and in perfect repair. Near these in a large court stands the temple of Isis; behind the high altar still remains a covered closet or secret recess whence the priests were wont to deliver oracles to the people. The Via Appia is a tolerably wide street, with its ancient pavement in a far better condition than the modern one of Rome. There are elevated paths on the sides for foot passengers, and the marks of wheels even now visible.

"The remains of shops are on both sides, the walls of them painted, and the colours and designs perfectly fresh, as if but just finished. In the public baking house, in which bread was found when it was first discovered, is an oven, which, though some thousand years old, might even yet be used; and on a marble slab, in a coffee house, are the marks of cups as if but recently set down. Indeed, every thing looked so completely as if the town had but just been deserted, that we could almost have expected to have met with some ancient Roman lingering in his native city; but in these places, which some centuries ago resounded with the cheerful hum of men, solitude and desolation now reign; and the only living object to be met with was a shepherd conducting his sheep over pillars of marble, and through stately edifices half buried in ashes. The amphitheatre is in such wonderful preservation that it might still serve for spectacles and shows, and from the top there is a fine view of Vesuvius.

"The villa of M. A. Diomedes is in an affectingly perfect state: it really seemed so indelicate penetrating into the haunts and apartments of a private family, that we half expected to have encountered some of them coming to ask the motives for our intrusion, and to chide our impertinent curiosity. The illusion at the moment was so strong, that we forgot the many centuries that had elapsed since the poor master attempted to flee from destruction, with the keys of his house and a purse of gold in his hand, and when the unfortunate females sought for refuge in the subterranean apartments, where seventeen skeletons were subsequently discovered.

"We left Pompeii by the Herculaneum gate, beyond which are the tombs. Some of these are handsome, and some of them much mutilated, as if in mockery of the efforts of frail mortality to rescue itself from oblivion. The rain began now to descend in such torrents that we were obliged to abandon all idea of seeing Herculaneum. We, however, stopped at the palace of Portici, which is built over it; in this particular resembling what is so frequently seen in the world, where the splendour and fortune of one individual is founded on the depression and destruction of another, whose wrongs cannot be redressed because justice to him would injure his rival's prosperity. Thus Herculaneum remains entombed, lest its excavation might injure Portici. The curiosities and treasures of the former are many of them deposited in the museum of the latter, among which are several very interesting pictures, also the skull of the unfortunate female who was found in the villa at Pompeii, and who, from being better dressed than her companions, was supposed to have been the mistress of the house. There is likewise the impression of her arm and figure upon the ashes, which preserved this melancholy cast of her form whilst they cut short the thread of her existence."

THE FRUITLESS FIG TREE.

Matthew xxi, 19, 20: "And when he saw a fig tree in the way he came to it, and found nothing thereon but leaves only, and said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. And presently the fig tree withered away. And when the disciples saw it they marvelled, saying, How soon is the fig tree withered away!" This barren fig tree having leaves was expected to produce at least fruit of an inferior kind. The fruit which our Saviour sought at a time which St. Mark declares "was not the time of figs," is concluded to have been that precocious kind, which ripens in some eastern countries as early as the month of April.

Ah, where is that green leafy show,
That promised such fruit to bestow?
It is gone — and the tree too is dried up and gone;
And how was the work so decisively done,
That forbade it for ever to grow?

It was not the tempest when wide
It scatters the dark forest's pride,
At the bidding of Him whom the tempests obey;
But it was that swift word which had only to say,
Die, profitless tree! —— and it died.

And so will fresh piety shoot,
With the leafy precursors of fruit;
But I've seen the leaves fall, and the branches decay,
And the fair budding promises wither away,
From the failure of life at the root.

I have seen the ambitious house fall,
Though the cedar had built up its wall;
Prosperity blasted, and beauty decay,
And the pageants of this world all passing away,
To their graves I have followed them all.

I have seen too the humble man fill
His station unnoticed, and still,
While fix'd was his lot in this turmoil of dust,
But his branches were moisten'd with dew, as his trust
Shot upward to God's holy hill.

And a sweet emanation around,
To the root an unseen passage found;
And it seem'd as if sometimes a secret supply
Dropt invisibly down from the cloudless blue sky,
And solac'd the plant under ground.

Scripture Garden Walk.

BACON THE SCULPTOR.

It is reported of him that he always endeavoured to convey some moral sentiment in his performances; something that should excite reflection; and he certainly often fulfilled his purpose admirably.

A short time before his death he was applied to, to design and execute an Idol for a Temple in the East Indies; when, beginning to think on the subject, the recollection struck his mind, that it would be contrary to the letter of the second commandment—and he instantly gave it up.

PAPAL SUPERSTITIONS.

In the Abbey of Bury St. Edmund's, which was dissolved by Henry VIII, was the following list of relics:—

The sacred remains of King Edmund the martyr, enshrined. The same king's shirt entire. Certain drops of St. Stephen's blood, which were shed when he was stoned. Some of the coals on which St. Lawrence was burnt. Certain parings of the flesh of divers holy virgins. A sinew of St. Edmund in a box. Several skulls of ancient saints and martyrs; especially that of St. Patronill, which the people believed would cure all diseases in the head by applying it thereto. The sword which St. Edmund used. St. Thomas of Canterbury's boots. St. Bardolph's bones in a coffin, which the monks made the people believe procured rain when carried in procession in time of drought. Certain wax candles, which being lighted and carried round the corn fields in seed time, no tares or noisome weeds would grow therein for that year; with many others, which by the relation of the monks would work wonderful effects.

To a mind capable of discriminating aright between the baneful effects of superstition and the equally demoralizing consequences of infidelity, how awful is the moral appearance of a country, which can furnish such instances as the preceding of darkness and delusion. But if we investigate the matter as closely as a regard to truth and the great cause of religion requires of us, and if we trace the existence of the numerous and devastating evils which have arisen from such unprincipled corruptions to their true cause, how great a weight of crime will attach itself to that Papal policy, which by converting the sacredness of Christianity and the immense importance of its duties to answer the fraudful designs and covetous inclinations of unrighteous men, has turned the warm and genuine emotions of hearts kindling with religious fervour into the channels of bigotry, has immersed whole nations in a blindness more deadly than Paganism, has changed that which was designed for the soul's nutrition into its most noxious poison, and has afforded the strongest argument for its enemies that Christianity has ever been compelled to encounter!

ON THE RELIGIOUS CHARACTER OF DR. JOHNSON.

It is to be regretted that the pursuits of intellect, as well as the various species of manual operations, carry their concomitant evil with them. To the irritability of an author, there was added in Johnson's frame that of a martyr to an incurable disease, an irritability which was still further increased by the sternness of his spirit, which made all his sufferings the imprisoned companions of his own bosom. We must nevertheless admire and revere that honest disposition to abide the worst, and embrace the doctrines of Christianity with all their probing qualities, rather than to take refuge in obduracy or scepticism; and happy is it for us who remain, that he has not lent his name to any fallacious opinions or convenient tenets. Whatever might be the vacillation or inconsistency of his opinions on other points, we are certain that one of the very first men that this country has to boast, and a man whose moral writings have obtained for him a rank which would have gratified the pride of an ancient philosopher, believed, without compulsion, without the inducement of interest, without exception or reservation, that the Almighty made and governs the world; that mankind have fallen from grace by sin; that there is no means of recovering the Divine favour but through the merits of our Redeemer; that our own best endeavours, though not to be neglected for a moment, must ever be found imperfect, and that the deepest contrition and sincerest repentance are as strictly required of the first of the human species as of the lowest of the people. The religious awe which overspread his mind was genuine, it was excessive, it was painful even to witness, and it deprived him of all the consolation of our Faith. To imitate him in this point might lead to error; our peace of mind is to be established between God and ourselves, and not under the influence of any example in our own nature. Happy would it be for many were they equally oppressed by it; and thrice happy are those, who by a more fortunate and regular course of early life, have been led into the paths of peace before the mind has become corroded by evil, and made restive by perverse habits.—Memoirs, &c., by L. M. Hawkins.

LONG WORDS.

Nothing, says Humboldt, strikes Europeans more in the Aztec, Nahuatl, or Mexican language, than the excessive length of the words. This length does not always depend on their being compounded, as in the Greek, the German, and the Sanscrit, but on the manner of forming the substantive, the plural, or the superlative. A kiss is called tetennamiquiliztli; a word formed from the verb tennamiqui, to embrace, and the additive particles, te and liztli. In the same manner we have tlatolana, to ask, and tetlatolaniliztli, a demand; tlayhiouiltia, to torment, and tetlayhiouiltiliztli, torment. To form the plural, the Aztecs in several words double the first syllable; as miztli, a cat; mimiztin, cats: tochtli, a rabbit; totochtin, rabbits. Tin is the termination which indicates the plural. Sometimes the duplication is made in the midst of a word; for instance, ichpochtli, a girl; ichpopochtin, girls: telpochtli, a boy; telpopochtin, boys. The most remarkable example I have met with of a real composition of words, is found in the word amatlacuilolitquitcatlaxtlahuilli, which signifies, the reward-given-to-the-messenger-who-carries-a-paper-on-which-is-painted-tidings. This word, which forms by itself an Alexandrine line, contains amatl, paper (of the agave), cuiloa, to paint, or trace hieroglyphics; and tlaxtlahuilli, the wages or salary of a workman. The word, notlazomahuiztespixcatatzin, which signifies, venerable-priest-whom-I-cherish-as-my-father, is used by the Mexicans in addressing the priests.—Humboldt's Researches.

E BISHOP'S COLLEGE, NEAR CALCUTTA.

BUCHANAN, in his " Memoir of the Expediency of Ecclesiastical Establishment for British India,"
;en in 1805, shows the incalculable importance of country as a colony to Great Britain, and its claims ı British Christians. He writes as a sound politi-—as a noble philanthropist,—and as a genuine stian, in pleading the cause of the teeming popula-of Hindostan. " Providence," says the pious tor, " hath been pleased to grant to us this great ire, on a continent where, a few years ago, we had ı foot of land. From it we export annually an im-se wealth to enrich our own country. What do we in return? Is it said that we give protection to inhabitants, and administer equal laws? This is ssary for obtaining our wealth. But what do we in return? What acknowledgment to Providence ts goodness has our nation ever made? What benefit the Englishman ever conferred on the Hindoo, as brother? Every argument brought in support of policy of not instructing the natives our subjects, traced to its source, will be found to flow from ciples of Deism, or of Atheism, or of Polytheism, not from the principles of the Christian Religion."
r. Buchanan did not plead altogether in vain. An
:clesiastical Establishment" has been formed for India: but among the various arrangements which have been made for promoting the permanent improvement of the East, and for the diffusion of Christian knowledge throughout Asia,—if we except the translations of the Holy Scriptures by the missionaries, Drs. Carey, Marshman, Morrison, and Milne,—none appears to us of so great promise as the BISHOP'S COLLEGE, NEAR CALCUTTA.

Dr. Middleton, Bishop of Calcutta, was the honoured instrument in accomplishing this good work, a noble monument of Christian zeal.

A grant of land, amounting to about twenty acres, was made by the government in India, for the purposes of the College, to which a farther grant has since been made. It stands about three miles below Calcutta, in a fine situation, on the opposite bank of the river Hoogly, which is there much wider than the Thames at London. The spot is peculiarly favourable for privacy and retirement; and " the scenery is such," as Bishop Middleton observes, " as to gratify and soothe the mind."

The foundation stone of the college was laid, on the 15th of December 1820, by Bishop Middleton, when prayer for the Divine blessing on the undertaking was offered, and thanksgiving presented to Him for the progress already made to carry forward the establishment.

"The Incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," transmitted to Dr. Middleton the sum of 5000*l*. to enable him to commence the work; 5000*l*. were contributed by the "Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge;" 5000*l*. more were voted by the "Church Missionary Society;" and the "British and Foreign Bible Society" has added 5000*l*. This sum of 20,000*l*. was augmented by collections in all the churches in England and Wales, in consequence of a "King's Letter," which amounted to 45,000*l*., with which the building has been completed.

The College, as will be seen by reference to our Engraving, consists of three piles of buildings, in the plain Gothic style. These buildings form three sides of a quadrangle; the fourth, or south side, being open to the river, which in that part flows nearly from east to west. The pile which fronts the river consists of the college chapel to the east, divided by a tower from the hall and library on the west. The buildings on the east and west sides of the quadrangle contain the apartments for a principal and two professors, with lecture rooms, and rooms for the students. The whole is formed on the plan of combining comfort and convenience with an elegant simplicity.

Bishop's College is under the immediate direction of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel;" but the statutes are so framed as to afford opportunity both to the government in India and to the religious societies connected with the Church of England, of obtaining, under certain regulations, the benefits of the college for such students as they may place there.

For the regular supply of students, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel has adopted the measure stated in the following extract from a late report:—"Ten theological scholarships and ten lay scholarships have been formed by the society, for native or European youths educated in the principles of Christianity; and the sum of 1000*l*. per annum has been appropriated to this special purpose. The ordinary age of admission is fourteen."

The Christian Knowledge Society assists in this plan of scholarship; having placed the sum of 6000*l*. at the disposal of the Gospel Propagation Society, for the purpose of endowing five scholarships, to be called, in memory of the founder of the College, "Bishop Middleton's Scholarships." This grant is also intended to provide a salary for a Tamul teacher in the College, that being the language chiefly used in the society's missions.

The Church Missionary Society voted a grant of 1000*l*. per annum for several years, on account of the importance of the institution, and of the cooperation it afforded in their department of labour in India.

From the Report of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts of 1830, it appears, that the Directors of Bishop's College have upwards of 50,000*l*. in the 3½ per cents., as a fund towards the support of that institution. From the same report we learn, that there are upon that foundation, a principal, two professors, eight missionaries, two catechists, and a printer. The report also announces "the progressive improvement of Bishop's College, both in the enlargement of the buildings and in the accession of a numerous body of students, as well as the location of the three senior students, Godfrey, Bowyer, and Simpson, in the character of catechists, with the several missionaries, Rottler, Trion, Morton, and Tweddle, the former being within the Archdeaconry of Madras, the two latter at no great distance from Calcutta."

Dr. Wilson, Bishop of Calcutta.

Dr. Wilson, followed by the prayers of thousands of Christians of all denominations, is now on his voyage to India, to occupy his important station, as Bishop of Calcutta. We are confident that our readers will be gratified with the following brief sketch of his character.

"It is pleasing to find that good men, and truly excellent Christians, who are devoted to the service of the ministry in the Church of England, have increased, and are still increasing. Amongst them the Rev. Daniel Wilson occupies a conspicuous station. Educated at Oxford, and introduced to the ministry by the venerable Cecil, it would readily have been supposed that he possessed genuine piety and the requisite ministerial qualifications. Still it was a peculiar, and, in many respects, a hazardous task, for a young divine to follow in the steps of so excellent and useful a man as Mr. Cecil; yet, we believe, no deficiency was ever remarked in Mr. Wilson. He possessed greater talents than his predecessor, while his piety was maturing, and his knowledge of divine and human things extending; so that the inhabitants of Chobham, and the attendants at St. John's Chapel, were not only fully satisfied, but even rejoiced at the choice of the successor which Mr. Cecil had made.

"Dr. Wilson well becomes the pulpit;—his figure is good—his face beams with the intelligence of genius and the mildness of a Christian. His voice is fine—strong yet melodious; in its tone it is calculated to win the attention, while the excellence of his matter rewards it.

"The sermons of Dr. Wilson are plain and perspicuous, clear in their statements of duty and doctrine, animated in their appeals, and abounding in touches of true eloquence. His language is at once terse and elegant—familiar, yet not vulgar. His imagery is in general chaste, and his figures extremely felicitous.

"There is a rich vein of evangelical piety running through all his discourses; and, although he deals not in profound and subtile argumentation, he yet reasons extremely well, and that in a manner so popular, as to keep alive the attention and inform the judgment. The most ignorant can understand him, while the enlightened mind or polished taste cannot be offended. Dr. Wilson possesses, in a high degree, the happy art of adapting his sermons to the varied capacities of his hearers: there is something for all, in every discourse which he delivers; so that he is highly esteemed both by the poor and the rich. The spiritual wants of either are not forgotten, while at the same time both are reminded of their duties and their responsibilities.

"Nor has the devotion to his duty been confined to the labours of the pulpit. As far as his large and widely extended parish of Islington would permit, he administered religious instruction to all; if not by oral communication and personal visits, by friendly letters and pastoral addresses from the press. He has seized on every important occasion which was likely to interest the minds of his parishioners, to impart spiritual knowledge.

"The habits of society and the great extent of many of the parishes, rendering it impossible that those pastoral visits, which formerly were so beneficial both to the minister and the people, should be universally adhered to; it is highly praiseworthy in ministers to endeavour to supply the deficiency of personal visits, through the medium of addresses from the press. And this the late Vicar of Islington has always done.

"Dr. Wilson adheres to the old method of reading his sermons; but the propriety and energy with which he reads, and the persuasive tones of his voice, almost compensate for extemporaneous preaching. Yet it must be evident, that the man who preaches extempore, has a great superiority over the one who reads. He can lay hold on any occurrence which may be likely to interest his hearers: his mind is more open to impression from the circumstances and persons by whom he is surrounded, and therefore he is more likely to be animated and solemn, as occasion shall serve; and, if there be discoverable in his discourses any extravagances, they will be easily pardoned, when we reflect upon the power which he possesses over the judgment and passions of his auditors. But the minister who has a written discourse is deprived of all these advantages. He confines himself to the mere reading of his sermon, and cannot, therefore, so powerfully command the feelings of a congregation. The difference between a sermon which is read, and one delivered extempore, may in some measure be estimated, by comparing the effects produced by the debates in the French Chamber of Deputies, and in our House of Commons. In the former, the speeches are read from a tribune; they are consequently cold, formal, dull, and spiritless; but, in the latter, they are delivered extempore; they are therefore more full of fire and energy—more eloquent, and calculated to produce an instantaneous effect, and to carry conviction to the mind. We do not therefore see why this practice of reading sermons should not be abandoned. We are persuaded that it would be attended with the most beneficial effects to the interests of the Church.

"Dr. Wilson maintains a respectable character amongst the authors of the day. His publications are numerous, but chiefly confined to theology. In addition to a great variety of single sermons and tracts, which were some time since collected into two volumes, he has published 'Evidences of Christianity,' in two volumes, being lectures on those subjects preached at St. Mary's, Islington; and a narrative of a Tour on the Continent, under the title of 'Letters to an Absent Brother:' this work has passed through several editions, and will be read with pleasure by the Christian."

We cannot close this short account without expressing our gratification that such a man as Dr. Wilson should have been selected to fill the Bishopric of Calcutta. We know that he did not court the honour, but that he long declined it. When, however, he learnt the difficulty of finding a suitable man to occupy the post, he accepted it with all its inconveniences. Earnestly do we pray that his life and usefulness may be long continued, and that his son and successor at Islington may be found to walk in his steps.

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

CENTURY THE SECOND.

23. Ignatius, bishop of the Christian church at Antioch, was martyred, A. D. 109. He is said to have been acquainted with some of the apostles of Christ, especially Peter and Paul. It is believed that he was ordained to the pastoral office at Antioch, about A. D. 67, by the Apostle John, whose instructions he had previously enjoyed. In that populous and licentious city, Ignatius continued more than forty years, a zealous defender of the great doctrines of the Gospel; to the belief of which, many are reported to have been brought by his ministry from the darkness of pagan idolatry and impurity. About A. D. 107, Trajan, the Roman emperor, visited that celebrated city, to carry on his military preparations against the Parthians and Armenians. Having entered the city with great pomp, he made immediate and strict inquiry concerning the Christians, who were reported as numerous.

Ignatius appears to have been rather ambitious of the crown of martyrdom, and therefore presented himself before the emperor, who, proud of his own attainments in learning and philosophy, treated with contempt the venerable bishop, and his doctrine of one God, and of salvation by Jesus Christ, his only begotten Son, who had been ignominiously crucified. After having endured much cruelty in prison, from the malice of his keepers, Ignatius was sentenced by Trajan to be carried in chains to Rome, and there thrown to the wild beasts in the public theatre. On hearing his doom, Ignatius heartily rejoiced, and said, "I thank thee, O Lord, that thou hast condescended thus perfectly to honour me with thy love, and hast thought me worthy with thy Apostle Paul to be bound with iron chains." With that he cheerfully embraced his chains, and having fervently prayed for his church, commending it with tears to the Divine care and providence, he yielded himself to his keepers, who were appointed to transport him to the place of his execution.

Being consigned to a guard of ten soldiers, he took leave of his beloved Antioch, and marched sixteen miles to Seleucia, where they embarked for Cyprus, and landing at Smyrna, he is said to have been visited by the celebrated Polycarp, and by many Christian ministers and elders, deputed from several Asiatic congregations. During his stay at Smyrna he wrote four of the seven letters ascribed to Ignatius, to individuals and churches, exhorting them to constancy in their faith, and requesting their prayers. In his letter to the Roman believers, he expresses his contempt of death with all its terrors. "Let the fire," says he, "and the cross, and the assaults of wild beasts, the breaking of bones, the cutting of limbs, battering the whole body to pieces, yea, and all the torments which the devil can invent come upon me, so I may but attain to be with Jesus Christ."

After a long and tedious journey, Ignatius reached Rome, where he was visited by many of the Christians of that city, enjoying their sympathies and prayers. He was kept until one of their public festivals, when he was led forth in the presence of a vast crowd of people, in the amphitheatre, who feasted their eyes with the sight of the venerable martyr devoured by the wild beasts. Two of the Roman deacons are said to have collected the bones of Ignatius, and to have sent them to Antioch, where they were carefully interred.

Seven Epistles of Ignatius have been preserved; but in some particulars they are believed to have been corrupted, to serve the purposes of the popish prelacy.

IDOLATRY OF THE ANCIENTS.

Mr. Tooke, in his entertaining school-book, the "Pantheon, representing the Fabulous Histories of the Heathen Gods," has given a popular exhibition of ancient idolatry. It seems, however, to have been written in the true spirit of a mere classical scholar, admiring the ingenuity of the human mind in producing such a numerous diversity, rather than with the mind of a Protestant Christian, conscious of man's accountability to his Maker, jealous for the holy honours of the ever-blessed God, and aware of the danger of rational souls sunk in such criminality.

We cannot particularize the diversified divinities mentioned in the Pantheon; nor can we enumerate the different classes under which Mr. Tooke has ranked them. Our design is not to present the Pagan Mythology to our readers as an innocent thing—as systems of ingenious speculation to be admired: but to notice some of the foul, the cruel, the wicked characteristics of ancient idolatry.

Abominations of this kind corrupted and ruined the mighty nations known under the denominations of Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, Carthaginians, Phœnicians, Persians, Grecians, and Romans, with their dependencies.

Canaan, "a land flowing with milk and honey," the loveliest portion of the habitable earth, was polluted with the horrid rites of idolatry, and vomited forth its guilty inhabitants. Yet their descendants preserved and practised the bloody ceremonies of Moloch, Baal-peor, Rimmon, Ashtaroth, and others.

Egypt, in the genuine spirit of idolatry, sought by cruel bondage to destroy the holy seed of Israel, in testifying against the shocking rites of Adonis, Isis, Osiris, Tammuz, and others.

The Philistines worshipped Baalim, Baal-berith, Baal-peor, Baal-zebub, Baal-zephon, Dagon, &c. The Babylonians paid divine honours to Baal, Bel, Nebo, Nisroch, Adrammelech, Merodach, &c.; but we cannot even give the principal names of these "devils:" Milton will assist us in his Paradise Lost.

"First Moloch, horrid king, besmear'd with blood
Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears,
Though for the noise of drum and timbrels loud
Their children's cries unheard, that pass'd through fire
To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite
Worshipp'd in Rabba and her watery plain,
In Argob and in Basan, to the stream
Of utmost Arnon. Nor content with such Audacious neighbourhood, the wisest heart
Of Solomon he led by fraud to build
His temple right against the temple of God
On that opprobrious hill, and make his grove
The pleasant valley of Hinnon, Tophet thence
And black Gehenna call'd, the type of hell.
Next Chemos, th' obscene dread of Moab's sons,
From Aroar to Nebo, and the wild
Of southmost Abarim; in Hedebon
And Horonaim, Seon's realm, beyond
The flow'ry dale of Silma, clad with vines,
And Elealé, to th' Asphaltic pool.
Yet thence his lustful orgies he enlarg'd
Ev'n to that hill of scandal, by the grove
Of Moloch homicide—lust hard by hate—
Till good Josiah drove them thence to hell.
With these came they, who from the bord'ring flood
Of old Euphrates, to the brook that parts
Egypt from Syrian ground, had general names
Of Baalim and Ashtaroth; those male,
These feminine.——————
————————————in troop
Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians call'd
Astarte, queen of heaven, with crescent horns;
To which bright image nightly by the moon
Sidonian virgins paid their vows and songs;
In Sion also not unsung, where stood
Her temple on th' offensive mountain, built
By that uxorious king, whose heart, though large,
Beguil'd by fair idolatresses, fell
To idols foul. Thammuz came next behind,
Whose annual wound in Lebanon allur'd
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
In amorous ditties all a summer's day;
While smooth Adonis from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea, suppos'd with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded.——
———————— Next came one
Who mourn'd in earnest, when the captive ark
Maim'd the brute image, head and hand lopt off
In his own temple, on the grunsel edge,
Where he fell flat, and sham'd his worshippers:
Dagon his name, sea-monster, upward man
And downward fish: yet had his temple high
Rear'd in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
Of Palestine, in Gath, and Ascalon,
And Accaron, and Gaza's frontier-bounds.
Him follow'd Rimmon, whose delightful seat
Was fair Damascus, on the fertile banks
Of Abana and Pharpar, lucid streams.
———————————— After these appear'd
A crew, who under names of old renown,
Osiris, Isis, Orus, and their train,
With monstrous shapes and sorceries abus'd
Fanatic Egypt and her priests, to seek
Their wand'ring gods disguis'd in brutish forms
Rather than human.——————
Belial came last, than whom a spirit more lewd
Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love
Vice for itself:——————————
———————————— when night
Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
Of Belial, flown with insolence and wine—
Witness the streets of Sodom."

We cannot defile our pages with details of the abominations practised in the ceremonies of idolatrous worship. Who can conceive the horrible enormities at Diana's temple, with a thousand women devoted to uncleanness? The portrait drawn by the pen of inspiration in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, can be fully illustrated only by referring to their vile and outrageous practices.

Human victims in sacrifice were commonly offered in the idolatrous worship of the ancients; and as our forefathers in Britain are believed to have derived their dreadful custom of immolating men in their idolatry from the Carthaginians, or Phœnicians, trading to the coast of the Mediterranean, we will give a short account of the former of these people from Rollin's Ancient History.

"The Carthaginians retained the barbarous custom of offering human sacrifices to their gods till the ruin of their city: an action which ought to have been called a sacrilege rather than a sacrifice. It was suspended only for some years; from the fear they were under of drawing upon themselves the indignation and anger of Darius I, king of Persia, who forbad them the offering up of human sacrifices, and eating the flesh of dogs. But they soon resumed their horrid practice; since, in the reign of Xerxes, the successor to Darius, Gelon, the tyrant of Syracuse, having gained a considerable victory over the Carthaginians in Sicily, made the following condition, among other articles of peace he granted them, viz. that no more human sacrifices should be offered to Saturn. And doubtless the practice of the Carthaginians on this very occasion made Gelon use this precaution. For during the whole engagement, which lasted from morning till night, Hamilcar, the son of Hanno their general, was perpetually offering up to the gods sacrifices of living men, who were thrown on a flaming pile; and seeing his troops routed and put to flight, he himself rushed into the pile, in order that he might not survive his own disgrace; and to extinguish, says St. Ambrose, speaking of this action, with his own blood this sacrilegious fire, when he found that it had not proved of service to him.

"In times of pestilence, they used to sacrifice a great number of children to their gods, unmoved with pity for a tender age, which excites compassion in the most cruel enemies; thus finding a remedy for their evils in guilt itself, and endeavouring to appease the gods by the most shocking kind of barbarity.

"Diodorus relates an instance of this cruelty which strikes the reader with horror. At the time that Agathocles was just going to besiege Carthage, its inhabitants, seeing the extremity to which they were reduced, imputed all their misfortunes to the just anger of Saturn; because, that instead of offering up children nobly born, who were usually sacrificed to him, he had been fraudulently put off with the children of slaves and foreigners. To atone for this crime, TWO HUNDRED CHILDREN of the best families in Carthage were sacrificed to Saturn; besides which, upwards of THREE HUNDRED CITIZENS, from a sense of their guilt of this pretended crime, voluntarily sacrificed themselves. Diodorus adds, that Saturn had a brazen statue, the hands of which were turned downwards; so that when a child was laid on them, it dropt immediately into an hollow, where was a fiery furnace."

"To the Glory of God!—This is the impress that a sincere and humble Christian sets on all his actions." —Leighton.

EVIL OF DRUNKENNESS.

Among the numerous sins which corrupt mankind, and disorder our world, there is none more pernicious than drunkenness. It is the door to almost every other. It is an evil pervading more or less all classes of society, and throughout our country. It is a crime, committed not so much under the visionary idea of happiness, as it is the gratification of a sensual lust.

The savage in the desert seeks a beverage simply to satisfy the natural desire—thirst: while the inhabitant of a civilized land indulges to a beastly excess. Whether or not the various beverages, to which the populace have easy access, are necessary and beneficial, on certain occasions, and to a limited extent, is a point foreign to our subject. We readily allow that there are strong beverages, which, if taken moderately, contribute to the vigour of the constitution. The grand evil arises from giving way to an unrestrained passion for strong liquor; which is the cause of innumerable disorders of the mind and body, and frequently produces the most overwhelming consequences. That there are few sins more hateful in the sight of God than drunkenness, or more degrading in the eyes of man, is a sentiment which we presume few will doubt.

Consider the effects which drunkenness produces on the constitution.

Health is the greatest temporal blessing which man can possibly enjoy; but to impair it by gratifying an evil desire must be highly criminal. We often perceive the lamentable effects of drunkenness in those whose countenances once bloomed with health and vigour, but now they indicate langour and disease:—whose constitutions were once strong and robust, but now languishing under this destructive vice. And it is not strange to suppose that drunkenness is the harbinger of disease, and the cause of desolating mortality among men.

Consider the effects of this vice on the estate or circumstances.

Wherever we find this habit cherished by an individual, we behold poverty encircling his abode. Alas! we have too many instances to prove this fact, that it is the fruitful cause of poverty, want, and misery. Can we be surprised at so much distress in the land, when we cast our eyes at the "Liquor Shops" on the last evening of the week, and view the thousands eager for the stupifying draught? In this manner, then, are the earnings of our working population squandered, by which many thousands of their families are reduced to suffer the want of common necessaries.

Consider the effects of this habit on the character.

Sobriety is a virtue which adorns a man; but if he is wanting in this, his character is immediately defaced. We cannot trust our property with that man who disorders his senses by this lust, which in numerous instances has led men to violate the sacred rules of honesty. In a state of inebriation, a man is sunk beneath the dignity of civilized society; and therefore deservedly loses that respectability which is attached to persons of soberness and integrity.

Consider the effects of it on the family.

We might suppose that it would be an argument sufficiently weighty to prevail with a drunkard to turn from his evil habit—viewing the sorrows in which he has involved his children, suffering at times the smarts of poverty, and hearing the cutting reproaches made against their worthless parent. They cannot rejoice at the hour of his return from business; nor greet him on hearing the cheerful sound of his voice: they tremble at the thought of his entering their wretched abode! All this is still more embittered by the reflection, that if he forsake not his evil ways, he will fall a victim to his lust, and they must become orphans, cast on a frowning world, without a father's protection. Thus they, who might have lived happily and contentedly on the sufficient earnings of their parent, must wander the children of sorrow and the suppliants of charity!

Consider the influence of drunkenness on the intellectual faculties.

When we reflect upon the goodness of God in lighting up the soul with such noble capacities, and so greatly exalting man over the other animals, it must be ignorance indeed for men to suppose, that, destroying these high powers, and lowering themselves beneath the beasts which perish, they commit a little sin. For a man to be deprived of reason by the afflictive visitation of Providence, is a calamity most appalling. For a person to possess reason and to apply it to a bad or unprofitable purpose, is greatly to be deplored. But for a man to deprive himself of the use of reason, though but for a time, by excessive drinking, abuses the blessings of Heaven, violates all the rules of decency and moral order, and degrades the man below the brute. This habit weakens the judgment, impoverishes the understanding, and, in a word, destroys those noble capacities of man, which so particularly display the infinite wisdom and benevolence of God.

Consider the effects of this habit on the morals.

From a drunkard we expect nothing truly virtuous, or worthy of imitation. His looks become unsightly, his manners disgusting, his language coarse, and his temper irritable. He has rendered himself unfit to fulfil with propriety any of the functions of civilized life, either public or private; so that it may be said of him, he is neither a virtuous husband, an upright tradesman, or a true patriot; but a miserable blot in society. All these considerations show, in some degree, why this habit is so criminal, and its consequences so fatal. But, strong as these considerations are, there is another that outweighs them all—the future and eternal prospects of the drunkard!

Surely no one who lives in the indulgence of any sin, and especially of that sin which is depriving him of his very existence, can reasonably expect to enjoy the felicity of that world where sin—where any thing that defileth—can never enter; but where

> "Every shape, and every face
> Look heavenly and divine."

Then what happiness is there for the drunkard in this world—in that hour when the pangs of dissolution commence—or when he passes the boundaries of time? How important is it that Christian sympathy should be more awakened to stem this torrent of iniquity, which we perceive hurrying our poorer population to destruction, and to lead men to consider the sinfulness of this worse than beastly habit!

Drunkenness is an evil more injurious to a land than "the pestilence that walketh in darkness." Drunkenness is most pernicious to our well-being as a nation, sapping the very foundations of society. Never can any people be prosperous and happy, while this debasing habit prevails: it is equally opposed to the nature of man—to morals—and to pure religion.

May our gracious God pour forth his Holy Spirit, to lead men to seek the salvation of Christ in the Gospel, teaching them, that "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, they may live soberly, righteously, and godlily in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people." Titus ii, 12, 14.

Inspiration has strikingly pourtrayed drunkenness and its deadly fruits—"Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babblings? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." Prov. xxiii, 29—32.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

CAIN AND ABEL.

The Persecution and Murder of Abel.

> "The earliest death a son of Adam died
> Was murder! and that murder fratricide!"
> MONTGOMERY'S WORLD BEFORE THE FLOOD.

MANKIND have been in all ages divided into two distinct classes; and in the Scriptures they are distinguished by appropriate appellations. These two descriptions of persons are spoken of as righteous and wicked,—believers and unbelievers,—saints and sinners,—the children of God and the children of the devil. This difference and distinction we observe in the family of Adam, and even in the two brothers, Cain and Abel. Cain regarded with envy the preference given by God to his brother, yet sought not to be a partaker of the same divine grace. Instead of admiring his holy life he cherished a deadly hatred against it, and on account of it persecuted him with implacable bitterness. He could not bear the continual reproof which he received from Abel's godly conversation; and this was the ground of that enmity, the issue of which was so terrible,—"because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous." 1 John iii, 12.

Here we observe the commencement and the real cause of persecution; and we need not wonder, as the same cause remains, that the same spirit appears at this time, which has been discovered in every other age from the days of Cain. Do our young friends consider this difference, the origin and criminal nature of it, and seek to be made the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ?

When true religion reigns not in the heart, enmity to God and man will prevail. Thus it was in the present case. Cain, jealous of the preference which God manifested to his brother, gave full licence to the spirit of persecution which he cherished, the natural fruit of his malevolent mind. Uninfluenced by the fear of his benevolent Creator, whom he hypocritically professed to worship, and regardless of the powerful ties of fraternal affection, he determined on the destruction of him whom he looked upon as his rival; and, hurried by Satan, he soon embrued his hands in the blood of his innocent brother! Infidelity produced impiety,—impiety generated envy,—envy proceeded to hatred,—hatred inflamed revenge,—and revenge terminated in the most atrocious murder! Such is the progress of sin when cherished in the heart.

We are unable precisely to ascertain in what manner the Divine regard for Abel's offering was manifested, unless we refer to those of Abraham and Elijah: but it must have been by some visible token from God;—the fire descending from the skies, to consume the sacrifice; while the devout serenity of Abel's countenance, arising from the love of God shed abroad in his heart, was accompanied with the voice of thanksgiving, adoration, and praise. Cain beheld his brother's sacrifice flaming at a distance, and the sacred cloud ascending to the skies,—while his own offering remained as it was at first laid on the pile, a sad and monitory proof of its rejection, on account of the iniquity and unbelief of the offerer. "And Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell." Gen. iv, 5.

The natural jealousy of Cain was powerfully excited, lest his younger brother should be regarded as a greater favourite of Heaven than himself. He might suppose, that by right as the first-born, he must necessarily be entitled to a precedence in the Divine mercy, and now his depraved heart swelled with rage, and his gloomy countenance became darkened with malevolent sullenness.

"Abundant in goodness and truth," the LORD God called Cain before him; and in terms the most gentle and persuasive, condescended to reason with him. "And the LORD said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt not thou also be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door." Gen. iv, 6, 7.

Many learned men understand this language as an inviting intimation of mercy. "If thou doest not well, sin," that is the sin offering, "lies at thy door and thou mayest take the benefit of it." The same word signifies both sin and a sacrifice for sin. As if God said, "Though thou hast not done well, yet do not yield to despair: the remedy is at hand, the propitiation is near: lay hold upon it, and the iniquity of thy life shall be forgiven thee." Well may it be said of Jehovah, "He delighteth in mercy." Mic. vii, 18. Himself has confirmed it, and he solemnly swears, "As I live, saith the LORD God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live." Ezek. xxxiii, 11. "He is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." 2 Pet. iii, 9. God abandons no sinner, until in unbelief he casts off his allegiance to his Maker, and hardens his heart against repeated admonitions.

It seems probable, that Abel was not out of sight when the LORD called Cain before him; he therefore added, "And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him." Ver. 7. The meaning of this part of the address to Cain appears to be, "Behold thy brother! he loves thee: he anxiously wishes thy present happiness, thy everlasting welfare. He honours thee as his elder brother, to whom he looks up for friendship and counsel, and to whose direction he submits as far as it is reasonable for one brother to be governed by another: in that respect thou shalt rule over him." But spiritual blessings are those peculiar favours, which the righteous and eternal Sovereign bestows, not according to our works: he grants them "as it seems good in his sight."

The haughty spirit of Cain was wounded by a rebuke, though given in goodness and wisdom infinite, and by the Almighty Creator himself! Wretched man! his wickedness and folly led him to be angry, even with his Maker! Regardless of the solemn admonition, and the merciful intimations of the LORD God, Cain cherished in his bosom the seeds of a deadly malignity. His pious brother is still the object of his settled hatred. But for what cause? Has he been more favoured by his indulgent parents than Cain? Or has he assumed the privileges of the first-born? No, neither of these. He hates him for his piety: "because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous."

Those who delight in iniquity, hate the pious servants of God, because their dispositions and their habits are condemned by the holiness of the godly. Abel appears the mild, the candid, the unsuspecting, devout worshipper of God; Cain the malicious, the treacherous servant and agent of Satan.

"Righteous Abel," as our blessed Saviour emphatically styles him, conscious of his own integrity, would not indulge unkind suspicions concerning the dark designs of Cain. He freely enters into discourse with his brother, who in the midst of conversation rises up against him, and gluts his vindictive spirit. Deaf to the earnest entreaties, and hardened against the affecting tears of Abel,—regardless of the poignant grief with which he was about to pierce the hearts of his venerable parents,—and forgetting the omnipresence of God Almighty, "Cain rose up against Abel his brother and slew him." Ver. 8.

This dreadful crime was marked with peculiar aggravations. Cain was the elder brother; and therefore should have been the protector of Abel. He had received no provocation. He had been admonished by the voice of God himself; and Abel, as he knew, feared God, and was accustomed to pray for the Divine blessing to rest upon him. Yet, under the appearance of friendship, he seeks a conversation with him—he takes him aside into a solitary place, and there deliberately and maliciously executes his diabolical purpose of assassination!

The murder of Abel, in martyrdom for the truth of God, afforded a terrible exemplification of the treatment which true religion was to expect from infidels and false professors to the end of the world. And such has ever been the disposition of ungodly men. "Cain may be considered as the father, the patron, and the archetype of proud infidels, Pharisees, formal worshippers and bloody persecutors, of every age and nation, from the beginning to the end of the world."—Scott.

This same spirit inflamed the wicked hearts of the unbelieving Jews, who persecuted virtue itself, in the person of our blessed Redeemer. "They filled up the measure of their iniquity," when they betrayed and "crucified the Lord of glory."

Behold the wretched Cain, standing speechless over the bleeding body of the brother whom he had murdered! The guilt of innocent blood penetrates and terrifies his depraved soul! while the disembodied spirit of the pious martyr is carried by ministering angels into the kingdom of glory, to enjoy unspeakable felicity in the presence of God his Saviour!

PROVIDENTIAL DELIVERANCE FROM SHIPWRECK.

The following narrative is an instance of the great and imminent dangers to which whale fishers are exposed, and is a most striking example of Divine providence.

A North American, Captain Smith, sailed in the year 1820, in a three-masted ship, the Albatross, for the South Sea, in pursuit of the spermaceti whale. When nearly under the line, west of Washington's Island, they perceived a whale of an extraordinary size. The boats were all immediately lowered, and to make the capture more sure, they were manned with the whole crew: the cook's mate alone remained at the helm, and the ship lay to. The monster as it peaceably floated on the surface of the water was eagerly followed and harpooned. On feeling the stroke of the weapon, it lashed its powerful tail with fury, and the boat nearest it was obliged to dart with all speed out of the way to avoid instant destruction. The whale then turned its vengeance on the ship, swam several times round her with prodigious noise, and then struck her so violently on the bows, that the cook's mate could compare the effect of the blow only to the shock of an earthquake.

The fish disappeared, but the tremendous leak the ship had sprung, sank her in five minutes with all that she contained. Her solitary guardian was with difficulty saved. The crew were now left in four open boats, several weeks' voyage from the nearest land, and with no provision but the little biscuit they happened to have with them. After a long discussion on the best course to be pursued, they separated. Two of the boats steered for the Washington or Marquesas Isles; and the other two, with the captain in one of them, towards the south, for the island of Juan Fernandez.

The former have not since been heard of; but the latter were a fortnight afterwards picked up by a vessel, when the captain and four only of his men were found alive: the other ten had died of hunger, and their corpses had afforded nourishment to the survivors.—Kotzebue's Voyage.

INDIAN ILLUSTRATION OF 1 KINGS XVIII, 46.

"And the hand of the Lord was on Elijah; and he girded up his loins, and ran before Ahab to the entrance of Jezreel."

Mr. Statham, in his "Indian Recollections," recently published, mentions a circumstance remarkably illustrative of the conduct of Elijah on the occasion referred to. He says, "On the dismissal from office of the Jemadar of a Thannah (gaol), in a village a few miles distant from the place where I resided, a very respectable native waited upon me, and solicited my recommendation to the magistrate of the district, as a fit person to fill the vacant situation. Knowing him to be greatly superior in many respects to the generality of the natives, I promised that when I had an interview with the magistrate, which would be in a few days, I would speak a word in his behalf. In the mean while, having occasion to pass through the village, I was much surprised at beholding him, the moment he recognized me, tighten his cummerbund (or gird up his loins), and proceed to run before my palanqueen. I said nothing until we had cleared the village, thinking that he would return; but as he still continued to run before me, I called to the bearers to stop the palanqueen, and entreated him to go back. This he positively refused to do, saying, nothing should prevent his paying this mark of respect, at the same time overwhelming me with the most extravagant compliments; and in this manner he preceded me the whole distance of four miles, until we arrived at the gates of my compound, when, with a profound salaam, he took leave and returned.

"In this manner I consider that Elijah, although he detested the crimes of Ahab, was desirous of paying him all that respect which his exalted station as king of Israel demanded; thus affording a practical comment on the apostolic precept, 'Honour the King.' By this means the prophet showed his deep humility, in not assuming to himself any glory because of the mighty works which God had performed by him; and at the same time evinced his entire dependence on the protecting hand of God, by thus accompanying the king to the very place where his greatest enemies, Jezebel and her prophets, dwelt."

INDIAN ILLUSTRATION OF GEN. XXIV, 9.

"And the servant put his hand under the thigh of Abraham his master, and swore to him concerning the matter."

"The same man," Mr. Statham remarks, "afforded me an illustration of Gen. xxiv, 9.

"On having communicated to him at a subsequent period his appointment to the situation, and exhorted him to fill it with fidelity, so that I might not be blamed for having recommended him, he dropped on one knee, and laying hold of my knee with one hand, and placing the other at the back of the thigh, he solemnly vowed to be faithful in the discharge of his duties, and professed entire submission to myself."

THE BRITISH OAK.

Among the traditions of this wonderful tree, the following will, we have no doubt, prove interesting to our readers.

The large Golenos Oak, which was felled in the year 1810, for the use of his Majesty's navy, grew about four miles from the town of Newport, in Monmouthshire; the main trunk, at ten feet long, produced 450 cubic feet; one limb 355, one ditto 472, one ditto 235, one ditto 156, one ditto 106, one ditto 113, and six other limbs of inferior size averaged 93 feet each, making the whole number 2,426 cubic feet of sound and convertible timber. The bark was estimated at six tons; but as some of the heavy body bark was stolen out of the barge at Newport, the exact weight is not known. Five men were twenty days stripping and cutting down this tree; and a pair of sawyers were five months converting it, without losing a day (Sundays excepted). The money paid for converting only, independent of the expense of carriage, was 82*l.*, and the whole produce of the tree, when brought to market, was within a trifle of 600*l.* It was bought standing for 405*l.* The main trunk was nine feet and a half in diameter, and, in sawing it through, a stone was discovered, six feet from the ground, above a yard in the body of the tree, through which the saw cut; the stone was about six inches in diameter, and completely shut in, but round which there was not the least symptom of decay. The rings in its butt were carefully reckoned, and amounted to above four hundred in number, a convincing proof that this tree was in an improving state for upwards of 400 years; and as the ends of some of its branches were decayed, and had dropped off, it is presumed it had stood a great number of years after it had attained maturity.—Time's Telescope.

THE BLIGHTED ROSE.

How gay was its foliage, how bright was its hue,
  How it scented the breeze that blew round it!
How carelessly sweet in the valley it grew,
  Till the blight of the mildew had found it!

Now faded, forlorn, scarce the wreck of its charms
  Remains e'en for Fancy's renewing;
Its branches are bare, like its thorny alarms,
  And it lies the pale victim of ruin.

Discontent is the mildew that feeds on the mind,
  That robs the warm cheek of its roses;
That cankers the breast of the rude or refin'd,
  Where'er it a moment reposes.

'Tis a wizard, whose touch withers beauty away,
  And forbids every pleasure to blossom;
Insidiously creeps to the heart of its prey,
  And invites cold despair to the bosom.

THE MORNING LARK.

Feathered lyric! warbling high,
Sweetly gaining on the sky,
Opening with thy matin lay
(Nature's hymn) the eye of day,
Teach my soul on early wing
Thus to soar, and thus to sing.

While the bloom of orient light
Gilds thee in thy tuneful flight,
May the day-spring from on high,
Seen by faith's religious eye,
Cheer me with his vital ray,
Promise of eternal day!

THE BEAR WITH THE TEA-KETTLE.

The following anecdote evinces the hardihood of the bears. Fish, which forms their chief nourishment, and which they procure for themselves from the rivers in Kamtschatka, was last year (1823) excessively scarce. A great famine consequently existed among them, and instead of retiring to their dens, they wandered about the whole winter through, even in the streets of the principal town. One of them finding the outer gate of a house open, entered, and the gate accidentally closed after him. The woman of the house had just placed a large tea-machine*, full of boiling water, in the court; the bear smelt to it and burned his nose; provoked at the pain, he vented all his fury upon the kettle, folded his fore paws round it, pressed it with his whole strength against his breast, to crush it, and burnt himself, of course, still more and more. The horrible growl which rage and pain forced from him brought the whole neighbourhood to the spot, and poor Bruin was soon dispatched by shots from the windows. He has however immortalized his memory, and become a proverb amongst the town people; for when any one injures himself by his own violence, they call him "the bear with the tea-kettle."

* A kind of urn in use throughout all Russia, called a Samowar, or self-boiler. It generally stands in the middle of the tea-table, and is furnished with a large kettle for water, and a space filled with fire to keep it boiling.

ADMONITION.

Mr. Editor,

The following lines were sent to me in an admonitory note, at the period when I had just embarked on the "busy scenes of life" as an apprentice. They were committed to memory as a treasure. It would be presumptuous to say how I have advantaged by them, but I feel especially desirous to recommend your young readers to follow my example.

A. F.

" ———— Be obstinately just:
Indulge no passion, and deceive no trust:
Let never man be bold enough to say,
Thus, and no farther shall my passion stray.
The first crime past compels us on to more,
And guilt grows pale that was but choice before."

Against listening to evil speaking.—"Far be it from you to take pleasure in hearing others spoken against, whether unjustly, or it may be some way deserving, let it be alway grievous to you. It is the devil's delight to be pleased with evil speaking. The Syriac calls him Akal-Kartza, eater of slanders or calumnies. Did the law of love possess our hearts, it would regulate our tongues, and make them most tender of the name of our brethren. It would teach us the faculty of covering their faults, and blunting the edge of our censures upon ourselves"—Leighton.

HOEMADOO, THE TEMPLE OF GUADAMA AT PEGU.

EMADOO, or the Golden Supreme, is a splendid oda at Pegu, a kingdom in the East Indies. Symes, in his account of the "Embassy to Ava," ribes Shoemadoo as an extraordinary pile of dings, erected on a double terrace, one raised upon ther. "The lower and greater terrace is about ten above the natural level of the ground, forming an et parallelogram: the upper and lesser terrace is ilar in shape, and rises about twenty feet above the er terrace, or thirty above the level of the country. dged a side of the lower terrace to be 1391 feet; of upper 684. The walls that sustained the sides of terrace, both upper and lower, are in a ruinous e; they were formerly covered with plaster, wrought various figures; the area of the lower is strewed the fragments of small decayed buildings, but the er is kept free from filth, and is in tolerable good er.

The terraces are ascended by flights of stone steps, ch are now broken and neglected. On each side dwellings of the Rhahaans, raised on timbers four ive feet from the ground; these houses consist only a large hall; the wooden pillars that support them turned with neatness; the roofs are covered with tiles, and the sides are made of boards; and there are a number of bare benches in every house, on which the Rhahaans sleep; but we saw no other furniture.

"Shoemadoo is a pyramidical building, composed of brick and mortar, without excavation or aperture of any sort; octagonal at the base, and spiral at top; each side of the base measures 162 feet; this immense breadth diminishes abruptly, and a similar building has not unaptly been compared in shape to a large speaking trumpet.

"Six feet from the ground there is a wide projection that surrounds the base, on the plane of which are fifty-seven small spires of equal size, and equidistant; one of them measured twenty-seven feet in height, and forty in circumference at the bottom. On a higher ledge there is another row, consisting of fifty-three spires of similar shape and measurement.

"A great variety of mouldings encircle the building; and ornaments somewhat resembling the fleur-de-lys surround the lower part of the spire; circular mouldings likewise girt it to a considerable height, above which there are ornaments in stucco, not unlike the leaves of a Corinthian capital; and the whole is crowned by a tee, or umbrella, of open iron-work, from which rises a rod with a gilded pennant.

"The tee or umbrella is to be seen on every sacred building that is of a spiral form; the raising and consecration of this last and indispensable appendage is an act of high religious solemnity, and a season of festivity and relaxation. The present king bestowed the tee that covers Shoemadoo. It was made at the capital; and many of the principal nobility came down from Ummerapoora to be present at the ceremony of its elevation.

"The circumference of the tee is fifty-six feet; it rests on an iron axis fixed in the building, and is farther secured by large chains strongly rivetted to the spire. Round the lower rim of the tee are appended a number of bells, which, agitated by the wind, make a continual jingling.

"The tee is gilt, and it is said to be the intention of the king to gild the whole of the spire. All the lesser pagodas are ornamented with proportionable umbrellas of similar workmanship, which are likewise encircled by small bells.

"The extreme height of the edifice, from the level of the country, is 361 feet, and above the interior terrace, 331 feet.

"At each angle of the interior and higher terrace there is a temple sixty-seven feet high, resembling, in minature, the great temple: in front of that, in the south-west corner, are four gigantic representations, in masonry, of Palloo, or the evil genius, half beast, half human, seated on their hams, each with a large club on the right shoulder. The Pundit who accompanied me, said that they resembled the Rakuss of the Hindoos. These are guardians of the temple.

"Along the whole extent of the north face of the upper terrace, there is a wooden shed for the convenience of devotees who come from a distant part of the country. On the north side of the temple are three large bells of good workmanship, suspended nigh the ground, between pillars; several deers' horns lie strewed around; those who come to pay their devotions first take up one of the horns, and strike the bell three times, giving an alternate stroke to the ground: this act, I was told, is to announce to the spirit of Guadama the approach of a suppliant.

"There are many small temples on the areas of both terraces, which are neglected, and suffered to fall into decay. Numberless images of Guadama lie indiscriminately scattered. Some of those idols are made of marble that is found in the neighbourhood of the capital of the Birman dominions, and admits of a very fine polish; many are formed of wood, and gilded, and a few are of silver; the latter, however, are not usually exposed and neglected like the others. Silver and gold is rarely used, except in the composition of household gods."

The Peguers are said to be among the most superstitious people of the East, and their manners correspond with their modes of worship. Their abominations are too gross to be mentioned in our columns; and which may be inferred, not only from their idolatry, but from the facts, that "the men here, as in most eastern countries, buy their wives—offer their daughters to strangers, and hire them out for a time: some say they hire out their wives in the same manner."

Who can estimate the value of the Gospel of Christ, and the advantages of Christianity, which not only command, but secure the practice of "whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report?"—"If there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." Phil. iv, 8.

"In yielding ourselves to events, we leave ourselves in the hands of Providence; in opposing them, we throw ourselves into our own."—Anon.

IDOLATRY OF THE ISRAELITES.

Human apostacy and depravity are demonstrated and illustrated by the history of every nation. But it is doubtful whether any proof can be adduced more striking and humiliating than that which is afforded by the Idolatry of the Israelites, the chosen people of God.

Divine revelation had been granted to them, and ordinances of divine worship had been appointed for them; yet they frequently abandoned the service of Jehovah, the only living and true God, Creator of the universe, and their special benefactor as a nation, to prostrate themselves before the works of their own hands!

Egyptian idolatry had corrupted many of the sons of Israel: but confusion and destruction fell upon that guilty land, on account of their impiety. And to his chosen people God said, "Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt: I am the Lord your God. But they rebelled against me, and would not hearken unto me," saith the Lord; "they did not every man cast away the abominations of their eyes, neither did they forsake the idols of Egypt." Ezek. xx, 7, 8.

On the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, although Moses, by the Divine command, had solemnly forbidden that practice, and given them such a religion as no other nation possessed, and notwithstanding all their laws were directed to prevent it, yet almost immediately after their deliverance from captivity, they turned to the worship of idols. "They made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the molten image. Thus they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass." Psal. cvi, 19, 20.

Following their history, after their entrance into Canaan, under the Judges, we find the Israelites from time to time sunk in the absurd abominations of idolatry. "They forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashtaroth, and followed the other gods of the people round about them." Judg. ii, 12, 13.

Solomon's folly and shame, in marrying so many wives, led to the worship of numerous false deities by the people of Israel. "For it came to pass, when Solomon was old, that his wives turned away his heart after other gods: Solomon went after Ashtaroth, the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Milcom (called Moloch), the abomination of the Ammonites. Then did Solomon build an altar for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem." 1 Kings xi, 4—7.

Idolatry occasioned the extravagant exactions which led to the revolt of the ten tribes from the house of David; after which, that accursed evil was made the established religion of Israel. Nineteen kings in succession reigned over the ten tribes, neither of whom was a man of piety; and the nation was therefore destroyed by the Assyrians, executioners of the righteous vengeance of God, seven hundred and twenty-one years before the incarnation of Christ.

Judah was but little more loyal to the true God; for though several pious monarchs reigned over that people, their efforts toward a reformation in religion were almost useless, so inveterate was the evil of idolatry among the people. Ahaz, the most impious prince that had sat upon the throne of Judah, was not content with "walking in the ways of the kings of Israel, and making molten images of Baalim" (2 Chron. xxviii, 2); but he carried his wicked inclinations still farther, and imitated the old inhabitants of the land in cruel and idolatrous practices; for it is said of him, that "he burnt incense in the valley of the son of Hinnom, and burnt his children in the fire." Ver. 3. Hezekiah, his pious son, destroyed the idolatries of his father: but his abandoned son Manasseh restored them, and "shed innocent blood very much, till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to another." 2 Kings xxi, 16.

The valley of Tophet and Hinnom, on the east of Jerusalem, was the principal scene of the horrid rites performed in honour of Moloch, which is thought to be the same as the Baal, Bel, or Belus of the Carthaginians, Sidonians, Babylonians, and Assyrians. Jeremiah testified with floods of tears against these abominations; on account of which, the weeping prophet lived to see Jerusalem, with its glorious but profaned temple, levelled with the ground. "Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils, and shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons, and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan: and the land was polluted with blood." Psal. cvi, 37, 38.

Jeremiah records part of his ministerial complaints in the following passage. "Hear ye the word of the LORD, O king of Judah, and inhabitants of Jerusalem: thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, Behold I will bring evil upon this place, because they have filled this place with the blood of innocents; they have built also the high place of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt offerings unto Baal!" Jer. xix, 3, 4, 5.

Rollin describes the manner of this diabolical mode of sacrificing human beings, as follows: "This custom prevailed long among the Phœnicians and Canaanites, from whom the Israelites borrowed it, though forbidden expressly by Heaven. At first, children were inhumanly burnt, either in a fiery furnace, like those in the valley of Hinnom, so often mentioned in Scripture; or in a flaming statue of Saturn. The cries of these unhappy victims were drowned by the uninterrupted noise of drums and trumpets. MOTHERS made it a merit and a part of their religion to view this barbarous spectacle with dry eyes, and without so much as a groan!"

For these abominations Jerusalem was destroyed, and its guilty people carried captive to Babylon, which was the means of correcting their idolatrous propensities. There they poured forth that divine prayer, which we should use in relation to the Heathen—"Have respect unto the covenant: for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." Psal. lxxiv, 20.

After the seventy years' captivity in Babylon, the Jews, except in a few cases, never again fell into the sin of idolatry.

"THIS IS NOT YOUR REST."

SUCH is the language of divine admonition, which the Christian at all times addresses to his soul. It includes a promise of eternal rest. The vanity of life, the vicissitudes of fortune, and all that numerous catalogue of human sufferings which it is the portion of many to undergo, have power to wean him from the world: and as he looks upon the miseries and distresses to which flesh is heir, a fervent ejaculation proceeds from his heart, thanking the all-wise Ruler of the universe for having promised him some more secure habitation.

It is however of infinite importance rightly to understand who they are to whom this promise is made. Many deceive themselves most grossly in this point; and by striving to effect a compromise between God and the world, barter away their own eternal happiness. It will therefore, I think, be profitable to inquire who are, and who are not the persons, who in truth and sincerity say to their soul—"This is not your rest."

1. Those who place no dependence, and seek no consolation from pleasure (falsely so called). It is a grievous sight to watch the progress of a son of dissipation through all the stages which lead to his final destruction. The syren Pleasure has for him mixed up a poisonous draught, and greedily does he drain it to the very dregs. Life to him is a scene of torpor and inquietude, save when "the harp, the viol, the tabret, lute, and wine are in his feasts," and he wonders how the simple plodding man can endure the insipidities of a regular life in the active discharge of the duties of his station. Time, however, before whom all things must fall, renders by repetition all his imaginary pleasures dull and heavy. Dissipation, which he once thought would last for ever, takes to itself wings, and flies away; and health, ruined by innumerable and fatal excesses, has also vanished. Friends, who hovered round him in the heyday of his recklessness, and joined in all his mad pursuits, fall away in the time of adversity; and all the gilded prospects which led him astray from the paths of rectitude are found to be no more than the imaginations of a heated fancy. Sickness, poverty, and distress have come upon him, and there is no arm outstretched to administer consolation. In this wretched and agonizing condition the remaining period of his existence is spent. The past presents only the fairy vision of joys gone by, never to return; and the future seems to be a confused mass of dark and dreary forebodings. Such is the effect which the world has on its votaries—such the consolation which it administers: we are surely then entitled to argue, that the being who is fettered down to such transitory enjoyments, is not the character fitted for heaven. Oh no! The Christian, knowing that the world must end in vanity, has been led to look for happiness beyond its narrow confines. Having never sought out the pleasures of dissipation, he is able to look back on them with contempt; and when old age and gray hairs cover him, to smile and say, "This never was my rest, and therefore the separation which must shortly take place, is to me joyous rather than grievous. The gay-spent festive night to me had no delights. I have loved to meditate on the works of my God, rather than on those of vanity. I have loved to sing his praises, in preference to the noisy and tumultuous chorus of the bacchanals: my talking hath been of his wondrous works, and not of the doings and the sayings of some weak inconstant man; and now that the solemn realities of eternity will shortly be opened before mine eyes, I find no cause to repent of my course of life, and shall willingly quit this world to go to my rest—for "this is not my rest."

2. But we well know that men need not run to all the extremes of vice to bring themselves under the curse, since actions, in themselves right and proper, may by misuse become most detrimental. Such is the case with those whose affections are placed on amassing wealth and procuring honour, who long to rise in the world, and to prosper. Now sentiments such as these are very well in their place; but it is in their place alone, and under proper restrictions, that they can be considered harmless. For the commission of crimes men have always an excuse at hand, and seem to think that God deserves less attention than any of his creatures. The wants of their families and their own necessities are an adequate excuse for sabbath-breaking, and neglecting the ordinances of religion. Who but infidels can act thus? I wish not to speak with harshness, or to seem more severe than necessary; but in all reason and calm expostulation, I repeat the inquiry, who but infidels can do this? For shall, nay, can a being, who believes that it is in the power of God to make all things work together for good to them that love him, at the same time act so inconsistently with his belief, as to do those things which God disapproves? Will the Almighty sanction attention to business on Sunday, in opposition to his commandment, on the weak and paltry excuse of the wants of our families?

Is the great Creator of the universe so weak that he is unable to assist those who need his help: or is he so unjust as to promise his aid, and then refuse to administer it? Men deceive themselves most grievously on this point, and therefore it is that I would earnestly and humbly desire to set them right. No excuse can justify disobedience. Men who believe the providence of God, must surely believe also that he will bless no work which is carried on in opposition to his will; and "except the Lord build the house, their labour is but lost that build it." Men therefore, who, knowing this, still persist in their frivolous excuses, can be called by no lighter name than that of hypocrites: though I fear infidel is their real character, for who but an infidel would rush fearlessly into the hands of the living God.

There was a time (recorded in the book of God), when the descendants of Abraham forsook their Almighty Father, and made to themselves an idol to worship before. Full oft, alas! did these delinquencies recur: but were they unnoticed by the Creator of the universe? Let the history of that ill-fated people speak—let that warning voice be heard, which their presence in every part of the habitable globe loudly proclaims. "For unbelief they were cast out." And what does that voice say to us? Does it not teach a lesson of faith, humility, and trust in God? He who spared not his chosen people, will assuredly not spare you if you neglect his ways. You think, mayhap, that fortune is smiling upon you—that you cannot be so very bad, because you are prosperous; and in your mind you are resolving how best to pull down the old barns, and erect new ones, that you may have room where to bestow all your fruit and your goods. Pause! Behold "he that dwelleth in heaven shall laugh you to scorn: the Lord shall have you in derision:" from the towering height of your imaginary greatness, the breath of the Lord shall hurl you down, and put to flight all your fairy dreams, and nicely-woven webs of sophistry. Doubtless the builders of that tower which was destined to force an entrance to the habitation of Deity itself, rejoiced as they gradually beheld their immense pile hide its head in the clouds; but dire was the tossing, and deep were the groans, when the Lord sware in his wrath that these blasphemous people should not enter into his rest. Remember their sad fall, and be wise;—consider these things, and provide for your own safety. He whose resting place is not below, will never let the things of earth prevent his attention to those of heaven. When great calamities appear, and times of deep distress, he will place his whole trust in God. Earthly joys and earthly dependencies are fickle, transitory, and insecure: that which wears the brightest appearance, may resemble those sepulchres which outwardly looked white and cleanly, but which were full of dead men's bones; and surely on such an uncertain foundation, no man of sense would be disposed to build his hopes for futurity. He therefore may conclude that he is walking in the road to Zion, who,

3. Depends on Christ. A perfect conviction of our state by nature, is of itself enough to lead a reasonable being to conclude, that of himself he is unable to help himself: and when such a one finds in Christ the very Saviour and Helper whom he needs, doubtless he will most cheerfully rely upon him. Let this be the chief study of us all. How often shall we be forced to repeat that awful saying, Life is short, eternity is long? Will men never listen to the admonitions of conscience before they are wrung in their ears in trumpet blasts, which the groanings of the lost shall neither drown nor interrupt? It is easy enough for me to write, We live in awful times—it is far more difficult to make men think so. Nevertheless, let the sinner tremble now, lest it should be his fearful doom to tremble at the judgment day. Let him weep now the bitter tears of repentance, that he be not forced to weep and lament when none shall be able to comfort him. Let him now seek the Lord, and feel after him, if haply he may find him; for there is neither knowledge, nor device, nor repentance in that tomb which ere a century is elapsed shall have closed upon every human being now living in the world. Well indeed may it be said, "This is not your rest!"

But the Christian says, "This is not my rest." As much as to say, that something else is. And will he be deceived in this? When the trumpet of the archangel sounds on the resurrection morn, and when all the now still, cold inhabitants of the tomb are in the presence of their God, ONE shall say, whose face exceedeth the sun in brightness, to those who by patient continuance in well doing, have fought the good fight, COME UP HITHER! And he shall point upwards to a blissful region, where the spirits of the just made perfect dwell—where the angelic hosts choir the praises of God; and as the humble Christian ascends to his REST, a sound as of the rushing of mighty waters shall be heard—every tongue in heaven shall sing, and what? a song of welcome to the humble follower of the Lamb.

"Soldier of Christ, well done,
Praise be thy new employ;
And while eternal ages run,
Rest in thy Saviour's joy."

B. Z.

ELEGY ON A GRAVE-DIGGER

Of Bunhill Fields, who died in 1806. He caught his death from infectious air in opening a tomb, after having been fifteen years in that employment.

I weave not now the cypress-wreath,
To deck the bust of hero dead;
Nor mourn that in the dust beneath,
A son of science rests his head.

The humbler work of Death I tell,
Who snatched this menial drudge away:
How into earth at last he fell,
Who earth'd up many a lump of clay.

Fifteen long years his delving spade
Had pierc'd old Bunhill Fields around;
And many a nonconformist laid
Beneath unconsecrated ground.

From Death he earn'd his daily bread,
And liv'd midst monumental stones;
To their last home had thousands led,
And heap'd the sod above their bones.

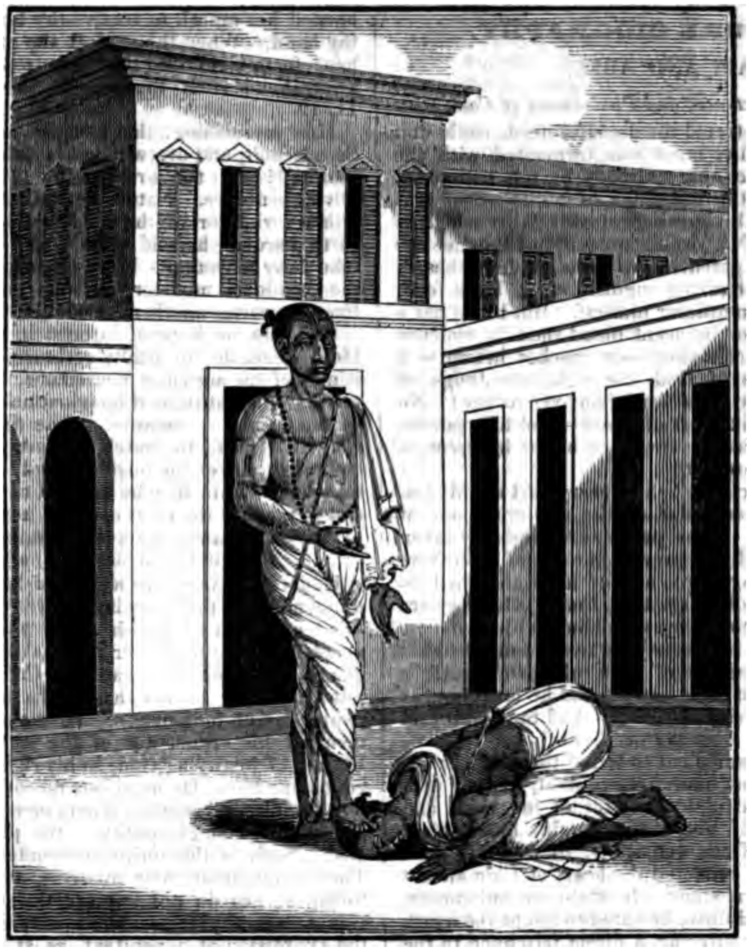
Ye men of blood, ye warlike train,
Less honour'd your employ is found;
Ye strew the crimson'd earth with slain;—
He hid the dead beneath the ground.

At length his mortal hour was come,
Nor Death would his old servant spare;
But from the ambush of a tomb,
Pour'd on him pestilential air.

He fearless op'd the gate of death,
Suspecting nought of danger nigh;
Drew in the poison with his breath,
And took his turn at last to die.

He enter'd oft the grave before,
And quitted soon the dark domain;
But now he lies to rise no more,
Till dust and ashes live again.

Thus all must follow, soon or late;
But how or when we cannot know,
That each might Death's approaches wait,
Prepar'd to triumph o'er the foe!



BRAHMINICAL HAUGHTINESS.

ɪɴᴄᴇ produces superstition in the lofty mind of ınd superstition degrades him below the dignity ational being. Priests, in all ages, have taken ıge of the ignorance of mankind; and, by ing the consequent superstition, have trampled ıe reason and honour of their fellow creatures, ıey have elevated themselves as a kind of divinities.
Engraving above represents a Hɪɴᴅᴏᴏ ᴘʀᴏꜱɢ ʜɪᴍꜱᴇʟꜰ at the feet of his spiritual teacher, man. The Brahmans, or Bramins, are the priests dostan; who are regarded by the deluded Pagans ind of divinities! "The Hindoo writers affirm ıe Brahmans proceeded from the mouth of a, their supreme god. Agreeably to this fable, ɔut persons of this caste are admitted to the ood, or have any thing to do with making laws; ɪy have taken care to turn this privilege to their count. No Brahman can be put to death, by ıw, for any crime whatever; while, on the other to kill a Brahman is one of the greatest sins ın be committed; and every offence committed them is to be punished with rigorous severity."
drink the water into which a Brahman's toe has ipped, is considered a very great privilege. Per-ıay be frequently seen carrying water in a cup, treating the first Brahman they meet to put his o it; after which they drink the water, and prosemselves before the Brahman, who bestows his g on them. Others are to be found who endeavour ect the dust from the feet of a lack (100,000) of Brahmans; one mode of doing which is, by spreading a cloth before the door of a house where many are assembled at a feast; as each Brahman comes out, he shakes the dust from his feet upon this cloth. Many miraculous cures are said to have been performed on persons swallowing this dust."—Bapt. Miss. Papers.

From these passages an idea may be formed of the degradation of the common people in India, and of the despotic influence of the priests. How unlike the jealous piety and the genuine benevolence of Christianity, as seen in its chief ministers, the Apostles of Christ! To Cornelius, about to do him homage, Peter said, "Stand up; I myself also am a man." Acts x, 26. And Paul with Silas at Lystra, when, their miracles having demonstrated their divine mission, the priest of Jupiter astonished, "with the people would have done sacrifice," "rent their clothes, and ran in among the people, crying out, and saying, Sirs, why do ye these things? We also are men of like passions with you, and preach that ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God." Chap. xiv, 13, 14, 15.

Lord Teignmouth, President of the British and Foreign Bible Society, formerly occupied an official station in India, and having mentioned some horrid practices encouraged by the Brahmans, says, "It may perhaps seem strange to some, who have been taught to consider the Bramins as a sect of saints, venerable for learning and piety, to find them denounced by the British Government in Bengal, as the author of inhuman practices; but the truth is, that many of the Bramins in Hindostan are as grossly ignorant and uneducated as the meanest peasant in England."

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

CAIN AND ABEL.

The Trial, Sentence, and Punishment of Cain.

Cain, having perpetrated the dreadful deed, could find no peace. His guilty mind was tormented with the most piercing reflections. Already he felt within his awakened bosom, the gnawings of "the worm that never dieth," and the burnings of that "fire which is never quenched." No witness appears to announce the horrible deed to his parents. No human sound is heard, except the groans of raving anguish, which burst forth from the miserable murderer himself. But blood has a voice—every drop of innocent blood shed by violence has a tongue—it cries aloud—it reaches heaven—it penetrates the ears of God, the righteous Judge of all the earth, and it cries for Divine vengeance! No cry pierces heaven like that of blood—and how powerful must be the voice of the blood of an innocent, a pious, a murdered brother!

The eye of Omniscience beheld every part of this diabolical procedure, and marked the accumulations of its increasing guilt. Some pains were probably taken by the wicked wretch, to prevent the eye of man from discovering the mangled remains of his righteous brother's corpse; stupidly forgetting, that "all things are naked and open unto the eyes of Him, with whom we have to do." But a righteous judgment soon overtakes the abandoned transgressor. The inhuman culprit is summoned by a voice from heaven, and he must appear at the tribunal of divine justice. "And the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother?"

This demand was sufficient to strike through the inmost soul of the most hardened criminal, and to produce "a certain fearful looking-for of judgment and fiery indignation," if not of penitential humiliation. But the influence of the evil spirit, to whom he had yielded up his mind, rendered the heart of Cain almost as impenetrable as a stone. In stubborn sullenness, and shameless insensibility, he dared to tempt the wrath of the Almighty, by uttering a direct falsehood to the face of his Maker! "And he said, I know not." His conscience being "seared as with a hot iron," he farther insults the Lord God, by asking, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

How shocking the reply! How full of the grossest hypocrisy and iniquity! Surely the wickedness of a human being never appeared with such dreadful aggravations! He even reflects upon God himself, as if He had failed in his care of Abel! He is dead to every feeling of shame. He feels no remorse for his own atrocious crimes. He grieves not for the injury done to his parents. He regrets not his murderous passion. He fears not the vengeance of the Almighty, whom he had so daringly provoked.

Cain exhibits to us the most affecting example of an Infidel matured in his unbelief, and lost to all sense of religion, of honour, and of humanity.

The gentleness of divine mercy having no beneficial effect upon his impenitent heart, the Lord God proceeds to penetrate and awaken his hardened mind with the piercing arrows of conviction. "And he said, What hast thou done?" Ah! what indeed! This was sufficient to harrow up his soul. This question had been put to Eve, after eating the forbidden fruit; and it will sooner or later be addressed to every transgressor—by whom it must be answered fully, and with the testimony of a quickened conscience.

Cain refuses to speak: but innocent blood has already uttered its voice to be heard at the judgment seat of God! The Lord therefore added, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground. And now thou art cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand. When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth." Gen. iv. 11, 12.

How astonishing, that God did not strike him with a thunderbolt, and overwhelm his malevolent, guilty soul into hell! But the earth is to be the executioner of the Divine sentence. Nature herself rises against the sanguinary violator of the tenderest fraternal ties. The earth hardens herself against the wretch, who could take away a brother's life. Divine vengeance pursues the abandoned monster, and the ground which he cultivates receives another malediction.

Cain has no hope of interest in the mercy of God. How miserable the guilty creature, terrified with the stings of an accusing conscience, and a prey to the terrors of an affrighted imagination. O, what a lesson to the young, to beware of the first risings of a revengeful spirit, to watch against the beginnings of envy; lest, under the beguiling influence of their watchful enemy Satan, they be deluded to forget their Maker, and to commit the most dreadful acts of iniquity.

"So wicked Cain was hurried on Till he had killed his brother."

Under the oppressive weight of his guilt, and feeling unquenchable fire burning in his troubled soul, he cried out in his anguish. The tremendous sentence necessitates the murderer to speak: but it is the language of sullen desperation. Cain exclaims, "My punishment is greater than I can bear." This is the expression of indignation. He makes no acknowledgment of his crime, nor of the enormity of his guilt. Instead of justifying God, in his righteous sentence, he condemns him. He manifests no sorrow for sin—he is not humbled by genuine repentance—nor does he supplicate, in a single petition, the pardoning mercy of God. Such is the universal conduct of the wicked. They complain of their miseries, and curse their misfortunes; but do not implore the sovereign mercy of God to sanctify their unholy natures. How different the expression of a penitent, as exhibited in the fifty-first Psalm. In that instructive piece, the evil deplored is sin, in its unspeakable offensiveness to the holiness of God;—in Cain, it is only the complaint of its punishment.

The voice of Cain is once more lifted up to God—but not in prayer. "Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth: and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me," ver. 14. How natural was it for Cain to be filled with fear: for being a murderer, he had forfeited the privileges of social life, and even of life itself. He is justly apprehensive that the hand of every man would be raised against him, to avenge the innocent blood of righteous Abel, his brother!

The goodness of God still appears in the measure of relief afforded to this wretched outcast "Vengeance is mine: I will repay, saith the Lord." "And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him." This appears to have been done, not only to warn every one against touching him; but as a token of disgrace, to distinguish him from the rest of mankind, and to exhibit him to all as the cruel murderer of his own, his younger, his religious brother!

Cursed of God, whom he now regarded as his enemy, "Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east of Eden," ver. 15. What a picture of a wicked man! In impenitent despair, "he willingly renounced God and religion, and was content to forego its privileges, so that he might not be under its precepts. He forsook Adam's family and altar, and cast off all pretensions to the fear of God, and never came among good people, nor attended God's ordinances any more."—Henry.

Our young readers may desire to know more of the land of Nod. To them it is to be observed, that the word Nod, in the Hebrew language, signifies vagabond, or restlessness; and the meaning is, that Cain led a restless, wandering life, in the east country, a prey to the terrors of an accusing, a guilty conscience.

They may also desire to be informed, what the mark was, which God set upon Cain: to which we reply, it is not possible for us to ascertain; and as it does not concern our edification to know, God has not been pleased to direct Moses to gratify our curiosity.

Some infidel cavillers have asked, How could Cain be afraid of being killed, by any man finding him, when there was no man besides Adam, his father, living? Our young friends should regard such an objection as betraying extreme ignorance: for Adam had many sons and daughters. Gen. v, 4. Now, as Cain was about one hundred and thirty years of age, and as many being born soon after him and Abel, supposing them to marry at the age of twenty, the family of Adam must have increased in several generations, to many—it is calculated by learned men, from the increase of the Israelites in Egypt, to one hundred thousand inhabitants, at the time of this awful affair. Cain might therefore reasonably utter such an expression of fear.

MALTA.

THE Maltese term their island "the flower of the world." To the patriot, his first best country is always home: but I have gazed on the Malta landscapes till I have really thought them pretty. Sea-views they ought rather to be termed, for the dark blue Mediterranean, calmly sleeping in its bays, or dashing furiously over the rocks, generally meets the eye wherever it is turned.

This little barren rock, in the midst of the ocean, with no fresh water but that which falls from heaven, no indigenous production but a few jujube trees, and no soil but what is brought from afar, has by the hand of man been covered with magnificent edifices, almost impregnable fortifications, and by the prowess of its brave knights its name has been enrolled high in the annals of glory.

The name of La Valette alone would be enough to consecrate this spot in the imaginations of all to whom valour and mental courage are dear; but it has higher claims to interest, for in holy writ, under the name of Melita, it is famed for the shipwreck of St. Paul, and for his sojourn of three months. The bay which was the scene of his escape is still pointed out and retains his name; and there is also shown the spot where "he shook off the viper and felt no harm," since which time it is said neither snake nor venomous animal has dared to enter Malta.

The celebrated order of the Knights of Malta, derived its origin from the charity of some rich citizens of Italy, who in 1050, by presents to the caliph of Egypt, obtained his permission to erect a church and two hospitals at Jerusalem, which were originally supported by alms and contributions. Godfrey (a Norman conqueror) endowed them with an estate in Brabant, and many of his brethren devoted themselves to the perpetual service of way-worn pilgrims. As the association acquired importance, the brethren took a religious habit, and in the twelfth century, the friars first became soldiers, and the great men of Europe sent their sons to Jerusalem to be trained up in religion, and in knightly discipline and feats of arms.

In the year 1260, the order was divided into the seven principal languages of Europe; and in the reign of Henry I, the Hospitallers (as the knights were then termed) came into this country, and their first priory was erected at Clerkenwell, and burnt by the rebels in 1381. On the expulsion of the knights from Rhodes by the Turks, Charles V presented Malta to the Grand Master of the order of Jerusalem, and they then assumed the name of Knights of Malta, which their brave acts have rendered illustrious in the page of history.

But, alas! for them, where are they now? Well might Burke exclaim, "The days of chivalry are over!" Of them whose deeds once kept the world alive with lustre and with noise, nought remains but splendid tombs and stupendous fortifications, to tell us such men once existed.

The Maltese, though they have lost the barbarity, have not lost the hospitality for which they are famed in holy writ; they indeed showed us no little kindness, and for courtesy to strangers their island richly deserves to be termed "the flower of the world."

To those, however, who are anxious for the spread of Christianity, this little barren insulated rock, which is said to have been colonized by the Phœnicians 1500 years before Christ, is in many points of view particularly interesting, being the head-quarters of the Missionary labours in the Mediterranean. The excellent and highly respected Mr. Jowett, was then (1827) on the station, and labouring most earnestly in his vocation; and we procured some Arabic spelling books of him, which we subsequently distributed to some of the wild Arabs we met with in our journey.

REMARKABLE ATTACHMENT OF A DOG.

A FEW days before the overthrow of the dreadful Robespierre, a revolutionary tribunal in the north of France had condemned to death a Mr. R., an ancient magistrate and most amiable man, on a pretended conspiracy. He had at that time a spaniel about twelve years old, which had been brought up by him, and had scarcely ever quitted his side. This faithful dog was with him when he was first seized, but was refused admittance into the prison. Every day however the dog returned to the door of the prison, which was still shut against him. Such ceaseless fidelity at last won the heart of the keeper, and the dog was allowed to enter: his joy at the sight of his master was unbounded, and it became difficult to separate them; but the jailor fearing for himself, carried the dog out of prison, and he returned to his place of retreat. For some weeks his visit was daily repeated, and admission as regularly granted. When the day of receiving sentence arrived, the dog forced his way into the hall, and couched himself between the legs of the unhappy man, whom he was about to lose for ever. At the fatal hour of execution, this faithful animal alone, dared, even under the eye of a tyrant, to own a dying friend; and when the body was interred, he spread himself upon the grave; on that cold pillow he passed the two first days, but a neighbour of his deceased master's, who had sheltered him during the imprisonment, caressed him, and by kindness induced him to eat; three months passed away, during which the mourner went every morning to the house of his protector, merely to receive his food, and then returned to the grave. Means were at length essayed to wean him; he was first tied, and then chained; but what manacle is there that can ultimately triumph over nature? He escaped from his bonds and returned to the sepulchre, which he never again quitted. It was in vain that all kind measures were used once more to bring him back; he could not even be induced to eat; each day he became more meagre and more languishing, till at length his attached and generous heart gave way, his whole frame became convulsed, and he breathed out his last gasp upon the grave of his lamented master.

On Viewing a Relic of Old St. Dunstan's Church, Fleet Street, London, which was recently pulled down.

Thou to dust art crumbling now,
Once of English oak a bough,
But in times so far remote,
That thy growth we cannot note.

From thy native forest brought,
By the workman's chisel wrought,
A noble destiny was thine,
In the house of God to shine.

Since thou wast fix'd within its wall,
A noble prop that did not fall,
Though time hath worn both wood and stone,
And fire* hath raged, and winds have blown,—

Hadst thou a voice to tell of all
The changes thou hast seen befal,
Since first was pealed the marriage bell,
Since first was tolled the solemn knell,—

Deep would the warning be, but vain,
And to the winds thou wouldst complain;
But thus with all it would not be;
For I have interest deep in thee.

'Twere vain to seek, since record none
Exists, who laid its earliest stone;
'Twere vain his name or state to prove
Who there first preach'd a Saviour's love:

What pilgrims here were shown the way,
From this dark world to endless day;
Or martyrs cheer'd to meet the fire,
In those dread times of popish ire.

My interest springs from later days,
And voices heard in prayer and praise;
Romaine! an ever-honoured name,
Grace! sovereign grace! I've heard proclaim.

Since, loud and sweet was heard a voice†,
Bidding a ruin'd world rejoice;
Proclaiming life through Jesus' blood,
And calling sinners home to God.

And some who heard have passed away‡,
Who through a long and glorious day
Will ne'er forget the time and place
Where they receiv'd renewing grace.

The writer of these lines can prove
How he displayed a Saviour's love.
Thus, relic dear, I'll prize thee more
Than brightest gems from India's store.

A nobler temple may arise,
But none so lov'd shall charm these eyes;
For dearer is thy dust to me,
Than all the future pile can be.

ADVENTURES OF A POUND OF COTTON.

"Labour is wealth," is an axiom which may be admirably illustrated by the "adventures of a pound of cotton," while in the most instructive manner it shows the importance of trade to Great Britain. India furnished the wool, and from the interior, perhaps a distance of 500 miles, it was brought to Calcutta; from that port it was conveyed by ship to London; from London it went to Lancashire, where it was manufactured into yarn; from Manchester it was sent to Paisley, where it was woven; next it was sent to Ayrshire, where it was tamboured; afterwards it was conveyed to Dumbarton, where it was hand-sewed; and then returned to Paisley, whence it was sent to a distant part of the county of Renfrew to be bleached, and again returned to Paisley; whence it was sent to Glasgow, and was finished; and from Glasgow it was forwarded to London. It is difficult to ascertain precisely the time taken to bring this article to market; but it may be pretty near the truth to reckon it three years, from the time it must have been packed in India, until in a finished state it arrived at the merchant's warehouse in London, whither it must have been conveyed at least 10,000 miles by sea, 1,000 by land, and contributed to reward no less than 150 people, whose services were necessary in the carriage and manufacture of this small quantity of cotton, and by which the value has been advanced 2,000 per cent.

METHOD OF STUDYING THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

We must place ourselves in the point of view from which the Bible contemplates surrounding objects, that we may see all things in the clear light of revelation. We must feel as well as think with the inspired writers; and, entering into their sentiments and reasonings, be carried along with the main stream of their argument, till we arrive at all their conclusions, and find their thoughts possessing our minds, and their very words arising to our lips. Thus shall we be cast into the mould of Divine Revelation, and take the stamp of its godlike and immortal image. In taking the Bible to be our guide to sacred truth, we may enter with equal clearness into the Divine thoughts, and make it the standard of our judgment and feeling, even in things remotely connected with Revelation; bearing its tone of sentiment upon our hearts, like a strain of music, which blends with the imagination long after the instrument is silent.—Douglas's Errors of Religion.

RUINS OF PALMYRA.

PALMYRA.

THE TADMOR OF KING SOLOMON.

Palmyra, whose magnificent ruins now strike every traveller with astonishment, was a noble city of Syria, about ten miles in circumference, on the borders of Arabia Deserta. Historians of the highest authority agree that it was one of the store cities which Solomon built for the purpose of carrying on his surprising commerce with India; 1 Kings x, 14—29; 2 Chron ix, 13—28. Its Syrian name, Tadmor, 1 Kings ix, 18; 2 Chron. viii, 3, 4, and its Greek one, Palmyra, are both descriptive of its situation in a spot abounding with palm trees.

Tadmor was originally a water station, in the desert between Syria and Mesopotamia, at a convenient distance between the Persian Gulf and the Mediterranean Sea; it was frequented by the caravans which at that period conveyed the rich commodities of India to Western Asia and Europe. It was situated in a most delightful spot, surrounded by a vast sandy desert, and enclosed with mountains on the east, north, and west sides.

Josephus, speaking of Solomon, says, "When he had therefore built this city, and encompassed it with very strong walls, he gave it the name of Tadmor; and that is the name it is still called by at this day among the Syrians; but the Greeks name it Palmyra"

Dr. Robertson, in his "Historical Disquisitions concerning Ancient India," says, "Its happy position at the distance of 85 miles from the river Euphrates, and about 117 miles from the nearest coast of the Mediterranean, induced its inhabitants to enter with ardour into the trade of conveying commodities from one of those to the other. As the most valuable productions of India brought up the Persian Gulf, are of such small bulk as to bear the expense of a long land carriage, this trade soon became so considerable, that the opulence and power of Palmyra increased rapidly."

Towards the close of the seventeenth century, as Dr. Robertson remarks, "some gentlemen of the English factory at Aleppo, incited by what they heard in the East concerning the wonderful ruins of Palmyra, ventured, notwithstanding the fatigue and danger of a journey through the desert, to visit them. To their astonishment they beheld a fertile spot, of some miles in extent, arising like an island out of a vast plain of sand, covered with the remains of temples, porticoes, aqueducts, and other public works, which in magnificence were not unworthy of Athens or Rome in their most prosperous state. Allured by their description of them, about sixty years thereafter, a party of more enlightened travellers, having reviewed the ruins of Palmyra with greater attention and more scientific skill, declared that what they beheld there exceeded the most exalted ideas which they had formed concerning it."

Messrs. Wood, Dawkins, and Bouverie, travelled to Palmyra in 1751, and in 1753 Mr. Wood published the result of their observations in the form of an Atlas: the ruins of this once mighty city were represented on 57 copper plates, 16 inches by 12, admirably executed. Captain Mangles, Bruce, Volney, and others, have since visited that scene of desolation, and confirm the accounts previously given of these celebrated ruins.

RUINS OF PALMYRA.

These astonishing ruins consist of temples, palaces, and porticoes of Grecian architecture; and lie scattered over an extent of several miles. They may be said to consist of a forest of Corinthian pillars, erect and fallen, amounting to many thousands. The most remarkable of them is the Temple of the Sun, of which the ruins are spread over a square of 220 yards. It was encompassed with a stately wall, built of large square stones, and adorned with pilasters within and without, to the number of 62 on a side. Within the court are the remains of two rows of noble marble pillars, 37 feet high, with their capitals of most exquisite workmanship. Of these only 58 remain entire, but they appear to have gone round the whole court, and to have supported a double piazza. The walks opposite the castle appear to have been spacious. At each end of this line are two niches for statues, with their pedestals, borders, supporters, and canopies, carved with the utmost propriety and elegance. The space within this enclosure seems to have been an open court, in the middle of which stood the temple, encompassed with another row of pillars of a different order, and much taller, being 50 feet high; but of these only 50 remain. The whole space contained within these pillars is 59 yards in length, and about 28 in breadth. The temple is 33 yards long, and 13 or 14 yards broad. It points north and south, and exactly in the middle of the building, on the west side, is a most magnificent entry, on the remains of which are some vines and clusters of grapes, carved in the most masterly imitation of nature that can be conceived. Just over the door are discerned a pair of wings, which extend its whole breadth; but the body, whether of an eagle or an angel, is destroyed. The north end of this temple is adorned with the most curious fret-work and bas-relief; and in the middle there is a dome or cupola about 10 feet in diameter. North of this place is an obelisk, consisting of 7 large stones, besides its capital. It is about 50 feet high; and just above the pedestal, is 12 feet in circumference. About a quarter of a mile from this pillar, to the east and west, are two others, besides the fragments of a third. About 100 paces from the middle obelisk, is a magnificent entry to a piazza, which is 40 feet broad, and more than half a mile long, enclosed with two rows of marble pillars, 26 feet high, and 8 or 9 in compass. Of these there still remain 129; but there must have been originally no less than 560. The upper end of the piazza was closed by a row of pillars. To the left are the ruins of a stately banqueting-house, built of better marble, and finished with yet greater elegance than the piazza. The pillars which supported it were of one entire stone. It measures 22 feet in length, and in compass 8 feet 9 inches. In the west side of the piazza are several apertures for gates into the court of the palace. Each of these was adorned with 4 porphyry pillars, placed by couples in front of the gate facing the palace, two on each side. Only two of these remain entire. They are 30 feet long, and 9 in circumference. On the east side of the piazza stands a great number of marble pillars, some perfect, but the greater part mutilated. At a little distance are the remains of a small temple, without a roof. Before the entry, which looks to the south, is a piazza supported by six pillars, two on each side of the door, and one at each end. The pedestals of those in front have been filled with inscriptions, both in the Greek and Palmyrian language, which are become totally illegible. Among these ruins are many sepulchres: they are all square towers, 4 or 5 stories high. There is a walk across the whole building: the space on each hand is subdivided into six partitions, each wide enough for the largest corpse; and in these niches there are 6 or 7 piled upon one another. Many of the inscriptions found at Palmyra have occupied the attention of the learned. Nothing relating to the Jews is found in those which are Greek; and the Palmyrian inscriptions are entirely unknown, as well as the language of that country.

Tadmor retained its original name until the time of Alexander the Great, when it received the Greek name Palmyra, which it preserved for several centuries. During this period, it is supposed by Gibbon, "the wealthy Palmyrians constructed those temples, palaces, and porticoes of Grecian architecture." It became a Roman colony during the reign of Trajan, in the beginning of the second century. It continued in this relation to Rome for about one hundred and fifty years, when Odenathus and his famous queen Zenobia, made it the seat of their empire in the East. It became indeed the rival of Rome; in the time of Gallienus the emperor, Gibbon observes, that, "with the general applause of the Romans, and the consent of Gallienus, the senate conferred the title of Augustus on the brave Palmyrian."

Odenathus was assassinated by his nephew Mœonius: but Zenobia, by her extraordinary talents, continued to maintain her dignity and her throne, until the emperor Aurelian besieged and took her capital, A. D. 272. Longinus, a celebrated Greek writer, fell a sacrifice to "the cruel vengeance of Aurelian," of whom Gibbon says, "the fame of Longinus, who was included among the numerous and perhaps innocent victims of her fear, will survive that of the queen who betrayed, or the tyrant who condemned him. Genius and learning were incapable of moving a fierce unlettered soldier, but they had served to elevate and harmonize the soul of Longinus. Without uttering a complaint, he calmly followed the executioner, pitying his unhappy mistress, and bestowing comfort on his afflicted friends."

When the Saracens became masters of the East, they restored the ancient name of Tadmor, which this place has ever since retained. Thirty or forty families of miserable Arabs are now the only inhabitants of this once splendid city.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

CAIN AND ABEL.

Abel a Type of Christ.

"RIGHTEOUS ABEL," as our Saviour called him, has always been considered, by the wise and pious, as bearing a resemblance to our blessed Lord. That resemblance may be perceived in many instructive particulars, a few of which it will be important for our young readers to notice. Like a flower of the field, young Abel sprang up and flourished. Fair was the appearance and sweet the odour of his virtues. But a brother's envy, like a blighting wind, went over him and smote him to the earth. The days of his pilgrimage were quickly ended, and he hasted away to an abiding city. Disinherited of the earthly paradise, from a wilderness grown over with thorns, he departed to the garden of everlasting delights. And so the holy Jesus, that King of saints and Prince of martyrs, made but a short stay among us in the days of his flesh. The envy of his brethren pursued him even unto death; and the fairest flower that ever bloomed on earth, borne down by the stormy tempest, bowed his head and died.

1. Abel was a type of Christ in the low human estimation in which he was held. Though the most lovely of the sons of Adam, he was called Abel, vanity—a vapour—a thing of no account. So our Divine Lord was disesteemed. Though he was "fairer than the children of men"—the perfection of human nature—virtue itself embodied—"holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners"—"who went about doing good as his only business, and as his meat and drink;" yet he was "despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." The foulest names were applied to him: he was called even Beelzebub, a title of the prince of the devils.

Let our young readers reflect upon this particular in the life of their Lord, when at any time they may be reviled or ridiculed for the name of Christ their Saviour. He said to his disciples, "If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household?" Matt. x, 25. "If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you." 1 Pet. iv, 14.

2. Abel was a lively type of Christ in the nature of his occupation. Abel was a shepherd: so is our blessed Lord. He says of himself, "I am the good shepherd—and I lay down my life for the sheep. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand." John x, 11, 15, 27, 28. He is "the great Shepherd of the sheep;" Heb. xiii, 20, "the Shepherd and Bishop of souls;" 1 Pet. ii, 21; and in this encouraging character, the people of God have delighted to confide in Him. May every one of our young readers rejoice in this inviting office of Christ; and, delighting to hear him still speaking in his precious Gospel, sing continually—

"I love my Shepherd's voice;
His watchful eye shall keep My wandering soul among
The thousands of his sheep:
He feeds his flock—He calls their names:
His bosom bears the tender lambs."

3. Abel was a type of Christ in the nature of his death. Abel fell by the violent hands of his murderous brother, and that "for righteousness' sake." Christ was incessantly persecuted by his brethren, the Jewish people. Those who bore the sacred name of priests, and who, like Cain, pretended to worship God, conspired against him. They wickedly corrupted and hired one of his attendants to deliver him into their hands. He was basely betrayed by one of his disciples, on whom inestimable favours had been conferred; and, though the Roman governor testified his innocence, the nation of his "brethren according to the flesh" manifested their Cain-like malice, in crucifying him as the vilest malefactor!

4. Abel may be considered a type of Christ in the prevailing efficacy of his blood.

"Blood has a voice to pierce the skies,
Revenge the blood of Abel cries:
But the dear stream when Christ was slain
Speaks peace as loud from every vein."

"We are come to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel." Heb. xii, 24. The voice of the blood of Abel cried to Heaven for vengeance upon the murderer; but the blood of Christ secures pardon for every penitent believer: such indeed is its efficacy, that "repentance and remission of sins was preached at Jerusalem," before any other place, to those who were "both the betrayers and murderers" of the Lord Jesus! If we are the true disciples of Christ, we are "translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son, in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins." Col. i, 13, 14. No one, therefore, however guilty his conscience may declare him to be, need despair of mercy and salvation with God, for "the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth from all sin." 1 John i, 7.

Happy is he beyond expression, whether young or old, who follows the example of Abel, in faith, in worship, and in patience; for though he may be persecuted by those who should be his brethren in affection and sincerity, his sufferings shall terminate in glory everlasting: and when the evil days of his pilgrimage are ended, the "Shepherd and Bishop of souls" shall give him the reward of Abel, in the mansions of his heavenly kingdom.

The Family of Cain, and their Scientific Inventions.

"Cain went out from the presence of the LORD," and deserted the appointed ordinances of his worship. Having abandoned the society of his father's house, and the place where the symbols of the Divine glory were often visible, he wandered in the east country, his children increasing into a vast multitude. The heads of the several families of his descendants for seven generations, are distinctly recorded in the word of God.

For the purpose of diverting his restless mind, Cain soon began to build a city, which he called by the name of his son Enoch. This erection would necessarily call forth the inventive powers of its builders, and from this the arts and sciences were cultivated.

The earth being cursed on account of man's transgression, and no longer yielding its luxuriant fruit without toilsome labour, the sons of Cain, by various experiments, discovered several arts and sciences of the greatest utility. Implements of husbandry and tools for building were indispensable, but those of the first age must have been exceedingly simple: probably they were all made of wood, and not of very convenient application. It is reasonable to conclude that the nature and use of metals were revealed to Adam, and that he availed himself of some of the benefits which they afforded: but to what extent they were improved, we have no means of ascertaining, beyond the few brief notices given by Moses, and which relate to the family of Cain.

Lamech, the fifth in descent from Cain, took unto himself two wives; therein transgressing the divine law of marriage. Himself indeed appears to have been an imperious tyrant in his family; yet his children were eminently distinguished—not for their goodness, but for their ingenuity and skill. Three sons of Lamech are particularly mentioned as famous in their generations.

Jabal was a celebrated grazier: his chief delight was found in keeping cattle. His ingenuity and skill were successfully employed, in devising methods of rearing and feeding them to the best advantage. So great were his knowledge and experience in this occupation, that others profited by his instructions, and he was called "the father of such as have cattle."

Jubal was distinguished as a musician: he is noted as an organist and a harper. He was the first that reduced music to a science, and formed rules for the regulation of that delightful means of recreation and devotion. It is supposed that from his name, the jubilee trumpet of the Israelites was so called: whether this be correct or not, the Hebrew jubilee was a blessing, and the trumpet that announced it was worthy of a peculiar name. But the most joyful sound, the sweetest music, is that which makes known the gospel jubilee of our eternal redemption by Christ.

Tubal-Cain was a brass and iron-founder, an artificer capable of producing the most extensive good or evil. The implements of husbandry, and, it is probable, instruments of cruelty, if not of war, were of his manufacture.

"Here was a father of shepherds, and a father of musicians, but not a father of the faithful: here is one to teach in brass and iron, but none to teach the good knowledge of the LORD: here are devices how to be rich, and how to be mighty, and how to be merry: but nothing of God, or of his fear and service among them. Worldly things are the only things that carnal wicked people set their hearts upon, and about which they are most ingenious and industrious."—Matthew Henry.

From what is recorded of these skilful artificers in the apostate family of Cain, we may learn, that those who are destitute of the fear of God, may yet be exceedingly wise in the things of this world. It is also truly remarkable, that in modern times, many of the most ingenious mechanics and scientific engineers have been found in ungodly families; and they have been themselves men whose dispositions and habits proved them in a state of alienation of heart from God, and enmity against him.

Let our young readers, therefore, beware of putting ingenuity in the place of godliness; lest they be found among this class of skilful, but irreligious men, rejecters of Christ and exposed to condemnation. Even in this case, God deals mercifully with his church: for while the ungodly are busily occupied in the things of this world, they are prevented from doing that mischief, to which their alienated minds would naturally incline them; and their inventions and discoveries are now being rendered subservient to promote the blessed knowledge of the great salvation of Christ to all the nations of mankind.

ON THE COMMERCE OF ANCIENT INDIA.

THE Indian trade, in all ages a source of wealth to those by whom it has been carried on, seems to be very distinctly mentioned in numerous places in the Bible; indeed, the more one is in the East, the more is one astonished at the correctness of the delineations of oriental productions, customs, and countries, and with the spirited and graphical descriptions which abound in Holy Writ.

At this period vessels from India, Arabia, and Persia, sail to distant countries, coasting along as in the days of King Solomon, whose ships were three years going to and returning from Tarshish. "For the king's ships went to Tarshish with the servants of Huram; every three years once came the ships of Tarshish, bringing gold and silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks."

This is so exact a description of a native voyage, and of the commodities produced in India, that I believe King Solomon actually traded there; and indeed coasting along in the country vessels, and stopping for the different winds and monsoons in the Red Sea, Arabian Gulf, and Indian Ocean, it would not be easy to make the voyage shorter now.

In the twenty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel, there is a sort of inventory of the principal articles of the Indian trade, as carried on with Tyre, 588 years before Christ. The passages, "Many isles were the merchandize of thine hand—they brought thee for a present horns of ivory and ebony," would almost appear to refer to India, to the islands of Ceylon and of the Eastern Archipelago. "Cassia and calamus were in thy markets;" if these articles be, as some suppose, cinnamon and sugar-cane, they are both productions of the East, as are "all spices, precious stones, and gold."

Moses, as mentioned in the thirtieth chapter of Exodus, was commanded to make "an holy oil of ointment of pure myrrh, sweet cinnamon, sweet calamus, and cassia," and to make a perfume of "sweet spices, stacte, onycha, and galbanum, with pure frankincense;" and these all seem to be Indian articles of commerce. Even still earlier, in the days of Joseph, the Ishmaelites are represented as "with their camels, bearing spicery, and balm and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt;" so that by caravans, or by merchant ships, the productions of India seem to have been from the earliest ages transported to all parts of the then civilized world.

It has been said, that commerce is, in the hands of Providence, only one of the means by which distant nations are brought together, in order to the eventual spread of Christianity over the face of the earth; and it would be a pleasing idea, that the coffee of Arabia, the spices of India, and the tea of China, humble plants and shrubs in themselves, but which have now become necessaries of life to all the civilized inhabitants of the world, may ultimately lead to the introduction of the knowledge of the Gospel in the benighted countries that produce them, by inducing the Christian merchant to frequent their shores for the purposes of worldly traffic.

THE BLACK EWE.

As a gentleman was passing over one of the extensive downs in the west of England, about mid-day, where a large flock of sheep were feeding, observing the shepherd sitting by the road-side, preparing to eat his dinner, he stopped his horse, and entered into conversation with him to this effect: "Well, shepherd, you look cheerful and contented, and I dare say have very few cares to vex you. I, who am a man of pretty large property, cannot but look at such men as you with a kind of envy." "Why, sir," replied the shepherd, "'tis true I have not trouble like yours; and I could do well enough, was it not for that black ewe that you see yonder amongst my flock. I have often begged my master to kill or sell her; but he won't, though she is the plague of my life; for no sooner do I sit down to look at my book, or take up my wallet to get my dinner, but away she sets off over the down, and the rest follow her; so that I have many a weary step after them. There! you see she's off, and they are all after her!" "Ah! friend," said the gentleman to the shepherd before he started, "I see every man has a black ewe in his flock to plague him, as well as me!"

HICH IS THE HAPPIEST DEATH TO DIE?

A real occurrence in a circle of friends.

Which is the happiest death to die?
"Oh," said one, "If I might choose,
Long at the gate of bliss I'd lie,
And feast my spirit ere it fly
With bright celestial views.
Mine were a lingering death without pain,
A death which all might love to see,
And mark how bright and sweet would be
The victory I should gain!
Fain would I catch a hymn of love
From angel harps that ring above,
And sing it as my parting breath
Quiver'd and expir'd in death;
So that those on earth might hear
The harp-notes of another sphere;
And mark when nature faints and dies,
What springs of heav'nly life arise;
And gather from the death they view
A ray of hope to light them through
When they shall be departing too."

"No," said another, "so not I,
Sudden as thought is the death I'd die,
I'd suddenly lay my shackles by;
Nor bear a single pain at parting,
Nor see the tear of sorrow starting,
Nor hear the quivering lips that bless me,
Nor feel the hands of love that press me,
Nor the frame with mortal terror shaking,
Nor the heart where bands of love are breaking—
So would I die!
All bliss without a pang to cloud it,
All joy without a pain to shroud it;
Not slain, but caught up as it were
To meet my Saviour in the air—
So would I die!
Oh how bright
Were the realms of light
Bursting at once upon my sight!
Even so
I long to go!
These parting hours, how sad and slow!"

His voice grew faint, and fix'd was his eye,
Gazing on visions of extasy.
The hue of his cheek and lips decayed,
Around his mouth a sweet smile played.
They looked—he was dead!
His spirit had fled
Painless and swift as his own desire:
The soul undrest
From her mortal vest,
Had stepp'd in her car of heavenly fire,
And proved how bright
Were the realms of light
Bursting at once upon her sight!

iis city is certainly one of the most beautiful, though t the largest, capitals in Europe. Its situation in a h country, and surrounded by the picturesque Ap-nnines, is delightful. It is built on both sides of the er Arno, and joined by four handsome bridges. e houses are lofty, and of handsome architecture. palaces are magnificent. The streets are paved en-ely with flag stones. The markets are abundantly plied, not only with all the comforts, but all the xuries of life. The arts and sciences long made this ce their favourite residence; and for many years the protection of the magnificent princes of the house of Medici, and after them that of Leopold and his worthy successors, contributed to bring them to their highest perfection.

It is the seat of plenty, hospitality, and politeness. To men of letters it recals a thousand delightful ideas, as the spot where learning first revived; to those whose pursuit is pleasure, it offers at an easy expense all the conveniences and elegances of life, accompanied with those of polished society; and students and admirers of the fine arts find in this city every thing which taste can require, or genius produce.

As to the inhabitants, they are generally civil, honest, and obliging, and even the lower classes are distinguished for urbanity of manners. The higher orders are still remarkable for their hospitality to strangers.

The cathedral is a very handsome building, being formed entirely of black and white marble. Florence is adorned with statues scattered about the streets; La Loggia, a kind of open portico, is decorated with several celebrated figures. The gallery of Medici, that celebrated collection, is well known in every part of Europe. The different cabinets contain several valuable pictures. There is a museum of natural history. The anatomical collection is dreadfully fine, and perhaps unequalled in the world. The collection of insects, worms, shells, coral, petrifactions, seeds, fruits, minerals, and flowers, is magnificent: attached to this institution is a good botanical garden. The celebrated mausoleum of the princes of the house of Medici is adorned with the rarest and most precious stones: it has never yet been finished, yet the family whose honours it was intended to commemorate is extinct. Such is the history of human vanity! Addison seems to have foreseen this circumstance. "The chapel of St. Lawrence, says he, will perhaps be the most costly piece of work on the face of the earth when completed; but it advances so very slow, that 'tis not impossible but the family of the Medicis may be extinct before their burial place is finished."

There is an academy of arts, in which three hundred young men are brought up in the study of the fine arts. Among the grandest peculiarities of this city, must be ranked the manufactories of alabaster and marble. The statues, lamps, and vases made here are indeed beautiful, and being modelled after the finest originals of antiquity, attract unrivalled admiration.—Lemaistre.

An English lady, a recent traveller, says, Florence, the Etrurian Athens, the capital of Tuscany, possesses in an eminent degree that nameless charm, that indescribable fascination which is derived from the associations connected with departed genius. Her churches are consecrated to the imagination by the ashes of the mighty dead which they contain, whilst her swelling domes and splendid palaces, canvass that glows and marble that breathes, show what mind has done and can do. She is rich in reminiscences of the middle ages, and

> "Not a stone
> In the broad pavement, but to him who has
> An eye and ear for the inanimate world
> Tells of past ages."

Surrounded by a majestic range of hills, she stands in a fertile plain, on the banks of the poetical Arno, whose clear and placid waters add considerably to the beauty of her situation.

Advantages of trials.—"Afflictions weaken sinful affections; temptations promote humiliation and love to the Saviour."—Anon.

"Can we contemplate Gethsemane, and hesitate to say, 'Thy will be done?'"—Newton.

POPISH HAUGHTINESS.

MANY instances of priestly haughtiness might be readily adduced, illustrative of the same principle as that represented in the Engraving in our last Number; we select the following from Timpson's "Church History." "The lofty pretensions of the pope were still maintained, and those ecclesiastical usurpers arrived in this century (the eleventh) at the most elevated point of their dominion. They now received the extravagant titles of 'Universal Fathers,' and 'Masters of the World.' Notwithstanding vigorous opposition from several sovereigns, they carried their insolent pretensions so far, as to proclaim themselves 'Lords of the universe, arbiters of the fate of nations, and supreme rulers of the kings and princes of the earth!' To notice a particular instance of the abominable assumption of the pope cannot fail to be instructive, however it may shock the feelings of a Christian. From among others, we select the ignominious degradation of the emperor Henry IV. For opposing the arrogant claims of Hildebrand, or, as he is called, Gregory VII, the emperor was excommunicated. The haughty pontiff excited the princes of the neighbouring states to make war upon their monarch. Being terrified at the anathemas of the pope, he was persuaded to throw himself into his holy hands, to yield to his clemency, and await his decision. Filled with the superstition of the times, Henry consented; and as it was prescribed to him, he submitted to stand, with his empress and family, at the gates of the fortress of Canusium, during three days, in the open air, in a severe February, A.D. 1077, with his feet bare, his head uncovered, and with no other raiment than a piece of coarse woollen cloth thrown over his body to cover his nakedness. The fourth day, he was with difficulty admitted to the presence of that lordly priest, who with much ceremony granted him absolution; but forbid him ever after to assume the title or ensigns of sovereignty! Such a daring outrage upon humanity as well as royalty excited universal abhorrence; but none had the courage to utter a reproof directly to the terrible antichrist!"

REFLECTIONS ON THE JEWISH RELIGION.

OF the diversified systems of theology that have been adopted, since the world, on the dispersion after the great deluge, degenerated from the pure worship of the Deity, Judaism must be considered the most ancient. Devotional exercises were, till its introduction, obscured by the mists of ignorance and superstition, and dictated by the arbitrariness of temporal domination or fanaticism. The theogony of Hesiod is so obscured by fable, and mixed up with the groundless vagaries of philosophic speculation, as to be rendered most absurd and incredible. Other authors increase in the stead of elucidating the mystery, while every pretender to science and sagacity vaunts forth some new romantic conjecture, till in the end all becomes benighted in the impervious mazes of idolatry.

It is not till the conversion of the patriarch father of the faithful, that we are enabled to trace out any evidences of a system of religious worship, which have feasible pretensions to authenticity.

It was then, when God revealed himself to Abraham, that the bright Sun of righteousness first dawned on minds before immersed in the unfathomable depths of superstition.

This doctrine, limited to one family, became in a few years the characteristic feature of a mighty nation, and retained its ascendancy over the minds of its disciples, with a vigour which time could not impair, nor prosperity effectually relax.

Of the numerous other systems of religion that have swayed the human heart, and enrolled their countless votaries, all have experienced the vicissitudes of life; and from the co-operation of contingencies, have vanished away as visions of the night; the remembrance of them has perished, and they are but as a tale that is told. They have survived not the ruins of their temples, and their fall has evinced their terrestrial imperfections.

"Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up," is a prophecy which Heaven is still occupied in accomplishing.

Where is Diana of Ephesus? and that long list of divinities which policy and priestcraft united to establish? Their worshippers have long since too fatally discovered their delusion—the cup of their iniquity has overflown—they have fallen before the fierce anger of the Almighty—their polluted temples have become the abodes of desolation and solitude, or disappeared from the face of that earth which their impurities contaminated!

It is only by the protection of Omnipotence that this religious distinction has survived the shock of so many ages, and risen more illustrious from every persecution. Any system originating in man, would be liable to the mutability of earth, and succumb to superior power; but no interdicts or excommunication have prevailed against this; and no extraneous power has been able to effect its subversion, for the most righteous God has made bare his arm in its defence, and He alone has been the lion of the tribe of Judah.

But the Jewish religion acquires its most pleasing feature by its close connection with Christianity, of which it is as it were the groundwork; and when we reflect that the antiquity and long duration of Judaism is so closely allied to its internal evidences, as to form an inseparable chain of argument in its favour, how great must be our adoration of that providence which ordereth all things aright; and how unbounded a display is opened to our view of that divine wisdom, which worketh out good from evil, renders the devices of man of none effect, turns back the fury of malignant persecutors on their own heads, and causes that circumstance which has been urged most strenuously against the divinity of Christianity, to become its most important defence and fundamental pillar!

COURTESY.

A SWEET word not only turneth away wrath, but it leads to knowledge, to wisdom, to honour, pleasure, and repose. It conducts to the best felicities of life, and attains the most gracious ends by the least laborious means.

Yet what is it, but that engaging demeanour, proceed-from a disposition alike liberal to give as to receive what ought to be acceptable to the loftiest mind and proudest spirit? What is it but to gild our home with the smile of peace; and in our excursions abroad, to make the best of what we see and hear by the way?

Where our road through life is rugged, it softens its asperities by temper or forbearance; and amidst the sullen silence of the brooding tempest, whether a storm of the elements over us, or the more furious and destructive hurricane of man's bosom, it is wonderful of what importance is this courteous amenity. It steals a sunbeam over the most gloomy parts of nature and society, and adds a ray to their brightest splendours.

It is everywhere of inestimable price. Like the divine quality of mercy, it is twice blessed. It blesses him that gives, and him that takes.—Pratt's Gleanings.

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

JUSTIN MARTYR, SUFFERED AT ROME, A. D. 163.

24. Justin Martyr was born in Samaria, and educated a pagan. Thirsting for knowledge, he gave himself to study, and was eminent in all the learning of those times. By travelling he became acquainted with the most distinguished scholars of that age; but he sought in vain for truth and happiness among all the sects of philosophers. Alexandria, being a city of great literary fame, invited his residence: and here he pursued his studies of the systems of pagan philosophy, with much dissatisfaction and increasing doubts.

Walking one day alone by the sea side, he met a venerable stranger, with whom he entered into a free conversation, expressing, after some time, his solicitude to become acquainted with God. Justin was eloquent in the praises of philosophy, which nevertheless had yielded him but little consolation. The stranger recommended him to seek God, and truth, and happiness in Christianity: referring to the sacred writings, as superior in antiquity and wiser in sentiment than those of the wisest heathen philosophers. The stranger departed.

"A divine flame," says Justin, "was immediately kindled in my soul, and I felt a sincere affection for those prophets and excellent persons who were friends of Christ." Considering the pious tranquillity and lively hope enjoyed and manifested by the disciples of Christ, he entered upon the study of the Scriptures, and found the way of salvation by the light of divine truth. He retained the habit and the title of a philosopher, while he devoted himself with active zeal to serve the cause of the Saviour. Justin was a man of sterling piety and enlarged benevolence of heart. He wrote several "Apologies" for the Christians, and for the doctrine of eternal life by faith in Christ Jesus.

There is something so respectful and dignified in the introductory inscription to the First Apology, written about A. D. 150, that we give it here. "To the Emperor Titus Ælius Adrianus Pius Augustus Cæsar; and to his son Verissimus, the philosopher; and to Lucius, the philosopher, the natural son of Cæsar, but the adopted of Pius, the lover of learning; and to the sacred Senate, and to all the people of Rome; in the behalf of men of all ranks and nations unjustly loaded with public odium and oppression;—I, Justin, the son of Priscus, and grandson of Bacchius, natives of Flavia Neapolis of Palestine Syria,—I, who am one of this suffering multitude, humbly offer this apology." He then proceeds to justify the Christians against their accusers and persecutors, and to show the agreement of the gospel with the dictates of sound reason. "We are called Atheists," says Justin, "and indeed, as it respects your false gods, we confess the charge; but we acknowledge the true God, the father of righteousness, of purity, and every virtue, who is infinitely removed from all mixture of evil. Him, together with the Son, and the prophetic Spirit, we reverence and adore with the worship of truth and reason."

Crescens, a philosopher at Rome, having been vanquished by the arguments of Justin, in several public disputations, plotted against his life, and procured his imprisonment, in which he suffered grievous torture. No threats or pains could induce Justin to sacrifice to the idol gods of Rome, when Rusticus, the prefect of the city, condemned him, and six pious companions with him, to be beheaded. They went to execution triumphantly, and in their last moments brought honour to the Redeemer!

"Making the effort of faith, is realizing the dispensation and acting accordingly."—Rev. J. H. Stewart.

DESCRIPTION OF THE CAMSEEN.

This terrible wind prevails more or less for fifty days in Egypt, during the spring, and its effects are so dreadful, that were it to continue for more than two or three days in succession, all animated nature would be destroyed. It possesses the enervating and dispiriting nature of the Sirocco, and sweeping across the deserts of Africa, brings with it dense clouds of sand. Though every window and door was closed, all parts of the house were filled with it, and it penetrated into our hair, our food, and our dress.

Fancy to yourself the most dense and gloomy November London fog, with a dark and lurid atmosphere impregnated with dust, and accompanied by a hollow mournful sound, and you will have a faint idea of the Camseen; but the blast heats instead of cooling, the skin is parched, and a violent thirst ensues, which it is almost impossible to assuage. This wind is most unhealthy, and is generally the precursor of that dreadful scourge the plague—during which the Europeans entirely confine themselves to their houses, holding no communication but what is absolutely necessary with the exterior world; their houses are barricadoed with as many precautions as if the city were besieged;

"The sullen door
Yet uninfected, on its cautious hinge
Fearing to turn, abhors society."

And the months of seclusion, when the "pestilence walketh in darkness, and the sickness destroyeth in the noonday," appear to be of the most awful and appalling nature.—Mrs. Elwood.

HILL OF IRON.

This hill is situated in Brazil, on the left of the road from Queluz to Villa Rica, rather more than a league from the former place. It is described by Mr. Luccock as "one entire mass of iron, so perfectly free from any mixture of common soil as to produce no vegetable whatever, being covered with a complete coating of rust, or oxide of iron. The hill is so lofty and steep that its top was not discernible; but, from its more elevated part, nodules of corroded metal had rolled down, and greatly embarrassed the road. At the foot of the mountain, the soil is red clay mixed with ponderous brown dust. As we advanced, the metal seemed to become less pure, until after an extent of two leagues and a half, it altogether vanished, and was succeeded by the common clayey land. I had often heard of this immense mass of metal, but none of the reports had presented an adequate picture of it to the imagination. The very core of the hill, as far as we could judge, appeared to consist of vast blocks of iron in tables; and it is so singularly free from alloy, as to produce, when smelted, 95 per cent. of pure metal."

A Hint to more Missionary Efforts.

"Three means of raising money easily:—

"I. A trifling increase of industry: making saleable articles.

"II. By a little more frugality and self-denial in way of living.

"III. By appropriating a small part of the annual income to the object.

"Is it not possible to persuade Christians to do so much for the universal praise of their Redeemer, and the salvation of all nations?"

From "The Conversion of the World; or the claims of six hundred millions of heathens, and the ability and duty of the churches respecting them," by the Rev. Gordon Wall and Rev. Samuel Newell. A book strongly recommended to be perused by all who love the Lord Jesus Christ.

BOOKS OF STERLING MERIT.

Lives of Eminent Missionaries. By John Carne, Esq. Vol. I. 12mo. cloth, pp. 348. Fisher, Son, and Jackson, London.

Eminent Christian Missionaries are the greatest benefactors of the world. Their instructions include the present and the eternal interests of mankind, and effectually promote civilization, and the comforts of this life, as well as the enjoyments of religion, and the possession of immortal bliss.

Divine inspiration has declared, "The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance." This declaration has been gloriously illustrated in the case of the first missionaries of Christianity, the Apostles of Christ. They were the greatest benefactors of mankind: blessed themselves of their gracious Master, they were constituted the means of inestimable blessings to all the kingdoms of the earth. Men of God who have followed in their footsteps, entering into their labours, next to them deserve our highest veneration: and though the most "eminent missionaries" were only as "earthen vessels," in which they carried "this treasure" of the gospel of Christ, they are entitled to our most grateful remembrance.

With sincere pleasure, therefore, we introduce to our readers this volume before us, rejoicing to find so much valuable and edifying information compressed into so small a compass, and published in so cheap a form. We find in this beautiful work, an ample account of John Eliot, whose surprising labours among the Indians of America entitled him to be called, "The Apostle of the Indians,"—of the early Danish mission to Tranquebar—of Christian Frederick Swartz—of Hans Egede, of the Moravian Mission—of John Kiernander—of Hocker, and Antes. Without extracting from this volume at present, we are sure that the names of these eminent missionaries will alone be a sufficient recommendation of it to the public.

A Visit to the South Seas, in the United States ship Vincennes, during the years 1829 and 1830; with notices of Brazil, Peru, Manilla, the Cape of Good Hope, and St. Helena. By C. S. Stewart, M. A., Chaplain in the United States' Navy; and Author of "A Residence in the Sandwich Islands in 1823 and 1825." Edited and abridged by William Ellis. 12mo. cloth, pp. 440. Fisher, Son, and Jackson, London.

Mr. Stewart became known from his visit to this country, on his return from his missionary labours in the Sandwich Islands. From his intelligence and piety we were prepared to expect an interesting volume in the work before us: but it is superior to what we anticipated. It contains a great variety of information relating to the improvement of the South Sea Islands by means of the labour of our Missionaries. Many islands are still without the ministers of the gospel of peace; among which, licentiousness and murder reign, as formerly in Tahiti. Of this island and others, where missionaries have laboured, Mr. Stewart remarks, "the last wars in the islands were previous to any influence gained by the missionaries, over either chiefs or people. Since the establishment of Christianity, there has been an uninterrupted peace; and as to other bloodshed, the Rev. Mr. Nott assured me, that he had not heard of a murder among the natives for fifteen years."

LINES TO AN INFANT.

When born, in tears we saw thee drown'd,
While thine assembled friends around
With smiles their joy confess'd:
So live, that at thy parting hour,
They may the flood of sorrow pour,
And thou in smiles be dress'd.

TO-MORROW.

How sweet to the heart is the thought of to-morrow,
When Hope's fairy pictures bright colours display!
How sweet when we can from futurity borrow
A balm for the griefs that afflict us to-day!

When wearisome sickness has taught me to languish
For health and the comforts it bears on its wing,
Let me hope! oh! how soon it would lessen my anguish,
That to-morrow will ease and serenity bring.

When trav'ling alone, quite forlorn, unbefriended,
Sweet hope! that to-morrow my wanderings will cease.
That at home then with care sympathetic attended,
I shall rest unmolested, and slumber in peace!

Ah! when from the friends of my heart long divided,
The fond expectation with joy how replete,
That from far distant regions, by Providence guided,
To-morrow may see us most happily meet!

When six days of labour each other succeeding,
With hurry and toil have my spirits depress'd,
What pleasure to think, as the last is receding,
To-morrow will be a sweet Sabbath of rest!

And when the vain shadows of time are retiring,
When life is fast fleeting and death is in sight,
The Christian believing, exulting, expiring,
Beholds a to-morrow of endless delight!

But the infidel then! O, he sees no to-morrow,
Yet he knows that his moments are hastening away;
Poor wretch! can he feel, without heart-rending sorrow,
That his joys and his life will expire with to-day?

Miss Parkes.

BELIEF.

Belief, an act upon which, from its frequency, we scarcely reflect, so rapidly does it pass across our consciousness, but by successive repetitions of which [illegible] arrive at all truth—becomes the humble, and in fact the inadequate, but, by the power of the Divine Spirit, the mighty instrument of a change, the magnitude of which eternity alone can discover. He who believes [illegible] believes to the end; and the acts of faith though [illegible] are yet many. He who believes must be for ever choosing between the visible and the invisible,—preferring the future to the present, and postponing that world which [illegible] visibly spread around him to that larger sphere of existence which the Scriptures hold out to him, but which lies dim and shadowy, unpeopled by present interests, and unshaped by our earthly imaginations. "This is the victory which overcometh the world, even your faith." By the faith of Jesus "we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen," and thus, to us faith becomes "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

NORTH EAST FRONT OF HIGHBURY COLLEGE, ISLINGTON.

HIGHBURY COLLEGE, ISLINGTON.

Highbury College, Islington, near London, is the largest seat of learning among the English Dissenters, for the education of their ministers. It belongs to the Congregational Independent denomination. This elegant edifice was completed in 1826, for the accommodation of forty students, with suitable buildings for library and the residence of its tutors.

Highbury College originated in the exertions of some zealous lay gentlemen, who in 1778 established an institution, called "the Evangelical Academy." An academical house was taken at Mile End, and the students were placed under the instruction of the Rev. Stephen Addington, D.D. In 1791, the establishment was removed to Hoxton, where it flourished under the care of the Rev. Robt. Simpson, D.D., the Rev. William Harris, LL.D., the Rev. Henry Foster Burder, D.D. and other eminent men. The growing importance of this institution rendered a more commodious situation necessary; and the treasurer, Thomas Wilson, Esq. with his accustomed liberality, gave the munificent donation of TWO THOUSAND GUINEAS, the price of an eligible piece of ground at Islington, to commence the erection of a new College, which has been completed, at an expence of 20,000*l.*, raised by voluntary contributions.

OPENING OF HIGHBURY COLLEGE.

Highbury college was opened on Tuesday, Sept. 5, 1826, for the sacred purposes for which it was erected. According to previous appointment, the Rev. Thomas Morell, Theological tutor of Wymondley College, commenced with prayer. Then followed, from the Rev. H. F. Burder, M.A., Philosophical Tutor of the Institution, an interesting and eloquent address, on the history of the Seminary, and on the circumstances and views that had led to the erection of the new College. After the close of the address, the Rev. John Pye Smith, D.D., Theological Tutor of Homerton College, offered up a most fervent and comprehensive prayer for the blessing of God on the Institution, and on all who may hereafter teach or study within the walls of this most commodious building. The Rev. W. Harris, LL.D., Theological Tutor of the College, then delivered a solemn address on the spirit and principles that should govern all the future proceedings of those who have the management of this school of the prophets. And the whole was closed by a fervent prayer offered up by the Rev. George Collison, who presides over the Academy at Hackney for the education of young men for the ministry. The service was conducted in the area of the building, in which an awning had been erected for the accommodation of the company.

PRINCIPLES OF THE TUTORS AND STUDENTS OF HIGHBURY COLLEGE.

Our readers will naturally desire to know the principles which are inculcated at Highbury College; that it may be seen whether they are worthy of propagation through the nation, and whether the Institution is deserving of public support. There are no "Articles of Religion" published by the friends of this Institution, which its students are required to subscribe, as in the Church of England: but we believe the doctrines of the Protestant Reformation are taught upon its foundation—the principles for which the British Martyrs died—the great points in which Luther and Calvin, Cranmer and Knox, were agreed. We are happy in being able to give that information from the Trust Deed of the College. In the clause relating to "the Students," it states, "That the Students shall be Protestant Dissenters of the Congregational or Independent denomination, holding the doctrines hereinafter set forth, that is to say:—

"That there is only one God, the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of all things, revealed under the mysterious distinctions, commonly called Persons, of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; to each of whom the distinguishing properties and glory of the Divine Nature are equally in the highest sense attributed.

"That through the transgression of Adam, human nature is entirely depraved; and all mankind becoming sinners, are justly liable to all the punishment of sin, both in this world and in the world to come, throughout eternity.

"That in such a state of misery would all men have remained without exception, had not God in his love purposed to show mercy to the fallen race of Adam, through the mediation of Jesus Christ his only begotten Son, who being truly God and truly Man in one person, made a proper and sufficient atonement for sin, by doing and suffering all that was necessary to manifest and honour the righteousness of God, in the forgiveness of sin.

"That such atonement is the sole ground or consideration on which any one is saved from everlasting punishment due to his sin, and is brought at length to everlasting happiness.

"That every one, who, believing in the efficacy of that atonement, makes it the sole ground of his hope for eternal salvation, becomes, through the grace of God, a partaker of all its blessings.

"That, in order to overcome the criminal indisposition to obey the will of God, and to accept of his saving mercy, which is in all men as sinners, the Holy Spirit disposes and inclines those, whom God has from eternity chosen to everlasting life, to trust in Jesus Christ the Mediator, and also to study and obey the will of God in all things until death.

"That it is the duty of all men to obey the commands of God, respecting the dispositions of the heart, and the conduct of the life.

"That not only persons of adult age professing their faith in Christ, but also the infant children of professing Christians, ought to be baptized by the application of water, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; and that all who believe in Jesus Christ for salvation, ought from time to time to celebrate the ordinance, commonly called the Lord's Supper, in commemoration of his death."

STUDIES PURSUED AT HIGHBURY COLLEGE.

The studies pursued at Highbury College are such as are included in the idea of a "liberal education;" but those branches especially, which are peculiarly suited to the office and duty of a well-instructed minister of the gospel. Perhaps the best exhibition of their studies will be given by the report of an annual examination: we transcribe the following for 1829.

"We, the undersigned, having attended the usual examination of the students at Highbury College, have the greatest pleasure in bearing testimony to the diligence and proficiency which they have displayed in the Classical and Hebrew languages. The proceedings of the day were such as to reflect the highest credit on the Institution; on the ability of the excellent Tutors by whom it is conducted; and on the talents and application of the students.

"Copious portions of the books professed were read, at the option of the chairman, vis.

"Class of the first year.—The four Georgics; the first six books of the Æneid; the Analecta Minora; and the first book of the Odyssey.

"Class of the second year.—The Odes and Epistles of Horace; the books of the Odyssey; and an Oration of Lysias.

"Class of the third year.—In Cicero, the Orations against Catiline; the 1st, 2d, and 9th Philippics; the first book of Herodotus; and the Œdipus Tyrannus of Sophocles.

"Class of the fourth year.—The 10th, 13th, 15th, and 16th Satires of Juvenal; the first and second books of Thucydides; and the book of Job in Hebrew.

"E. Henderson, Ph.D.
"W. J. Hope, A.M.
"Eben. Miller, A.M.
"Jos. Berry.

"On July the 1st, the students were examined in theology and several branches of literature, before the Rev. Samuel Rooker, in the chair, Rev. Dr. Bennett, and other ministers and gentlemen. Several essays were read, and questions answered upon philosophical and theological subjects; when it appeared, that the classes of students had respectively pursued a course of study in Mental Philosophy and Ethics, the Elements of Algebra, Civil and Ecclesiastical History, the Interpretation of Scripture, the Evidences of Christianity, Systematic Theology, and Hebrew Antiquities and Philology.

"In the evening, the annual meeting was held at the College, T. Wilson, Esq. in the chair; when the report of the past year was read and adopted; and theological essays were read by two of the senior students; one on the Doctrine of the Incarnation, the other on the Mediatorial System."

QUALIFICATIONS OF THE STUDENTS AT HIGHBURY COLLEGE.

We have no connection with Highbury College; but we understand that the students who are admitted upon the foundation, are required to possess the following qualifications.

Physical strength and intellectual capacity, as indispensably necessary to prosecute a course of study, and to discharge the active studies of the ministry.

Personal piety, as essential to the Christian character; and purity of morals, as especially requisite in a minister of the Gospel.

Decision of mind on the important doctrines of the Gospel, as already stated—holy zeal to serve Christ—compassion for the souls of men for the Redeemer's sake—and aptness to teach and preach the word of everlasting life. Besides a tolerable measure of grammatical knowledge.

These qualifications are required to be testified by the minister under whose pastoral care each candidate has been united in church fellowship; and before he is admitted to the College, the candidate undergoes an examination by a sub-committee of ministers, and other gentlemen, they having been previously satisfied with his testimonials, as to personal piety, moral character, and the soundness of his religious principles. Students are required to be under twenty-eight years of age, and the term of study includes four years, besides in some cases one or two years previous study under some minister in the country.

EMINENT MEN FROM THE COLLEGE AT HIGHBURY.

Regarding this Institution as the same as that formerly carried on at Hoxton, many ministers of distinguished eminence might be named, who were introduced into the field of the Gospel by its operations. But it may be sufficient to mention only Dr. Morrison, who has been honoured by the blessed God, more perhaps than any scholor of ancient or modern times (unless we except Dr. Carey at Serampore), in being enabled to translate the Holy Scriptures into the Chinese language.

BISHOP ANDREWES ON THE NATIVITY.

"For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham."—Heb. ii, 16.

"It was much, even but to look after us; to respect us so far, who were not worth the cast of his eye; much to call us back; but more, when we came not for all that, to send after us. For if He had but only been content to give us leave to come to him again; but given us leave to touch but the hem of His garment, (Himself sitting still, and never calling to us, nor sending after us); it had been favour enough: far above that we were worth. But not only to send by others, but to come Himself after us; to say, 'Get me a body, I will myself after him;" this was exceeding much. But yet, this is not all; he gave not over His pursuit, though it were long and laborious, and He full weary; though it cast Him into a sweat, a sweat of blood. He spared not Himself; but followed His pursuit, through danger, distress, yea through death itself: followed, and so followed, as nothing made him leave following till He overtook."

"For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given."
Isa. ix, 6.

"The Child, to import His human; the Son, His Divine nature. All along his life, you shall see these two. At His birth, a cradle for the Child; a star for the Son. A company of shepherds viewing the Child; a choir of angels celebrating the Son. In his life: hungry Himself, to shew the nature of the Child; yet feeding five thousand, to show the power of the Son. At His death; dying on the cross, as the son of Adam; at the same time disposing of Paradise, as the Son of God."

"But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel."—Micah v, 2.

"O thou little Bethlehem! and O thou little Bethlemite! how do you both (both place and person) confound the haughtiness of many, that (yet) would be called Christians, and even near Christ himself! There is in both of you (if it were well taken to heart) enough to prick the swelling, and let out the apostheumed matter of pride from a many of us, whose look, gesture, gait, and swelling words of vanity are too big for Bethlehem: whose whole carriage and course is, as if they were to be saved by one that came out of the great city Nineveh, or Grand Cairo, rather than out of the little hamlet of Bethlehem.

For little Bethlehem's sake, love the virtue that is like it (i. e. humility); and for the virtue's sake, honour it. Honour it: there is a star over it; there is a Saviour in it. Honour it for that which comes out of it; for the fruit it yields; more good comes forth out of the poor town (to us) than from all the great and glorious cities in the world. Good Nazianzen tells us, it gives us our introduction to Paradise: it gives us a guide, if we will follow Him that will bring us thither, to our original happiness."

A TRUE FRIEND.

Concerning the person you call your friend, tell me, will he weep with you in the hour of distress? Will he faithfully reprove you to your face, for actions which others are ridiculing or censuring behind your back? Will he dare to stand forth in your defence, when detraction is secretly aiming its deadly weapons at your reputation? Will he acknowledge you with the same cordiality, and behave to you with the same friendly attention, in the company of your superiors in rank and fortune, as when the claims of pride and vanity do not interfere with those of friendship? If misfortune and losses should oblige you to retire into a walk of life in which you cannot appear with the same distinction, or entertain your friends with the same liberality as formerly, will he still think himself happy in your society; and instead of withdrawing himself from an unprofitable connection, take pleasure in professing himself your friend, and cheerfully assist you to support the burthen of your affliction? When sickness shall call you to leave the busy scenes of the world, will he follow you into your gloomy retreat, listen with attention to your tale of symptoms, and minister the balm of consolation to your fainting spirit? And finally, when death shall burst asunder every earthly tie, will he shed a tear upon your grave, and lodge the dear remembrance of your mutual friendship in his heart, as a treasure never to be resigned? The man who will not do this—he may be your companion, your flatterer, your seducer; but depend upon it he is not your friend. Amicus Causa.

"There are some persons, who so long as they fancy you look upon them as all perfection, will be amazingly pleased with you: but if they have let out their corruptions before you, and they think you see them in their true colours, they immediately dislike. When this temper appears, it proves to a certainty that all their seeming love to you was only love to themselves: and that as the pride of their being thought something first begat it; so when they are conscious that you can no longer have the same opinion of them which you had at first, pride meeting with a mortification, they can no longer bear you, because you know them. As the whole train of evils proceed from within, what need have all to be earnest at the throne of grace, that they may obtain that precious faith, by which alone the heart can be purified, and be made a fit temple for the sweet spirit of love to dwell in!"—Sir R. Hill's Deep Things of God.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

SETH.

BORN A. M. 130. DIED A. M. 1042. AGED 912 YEARS.

Seth, the son of Adam, was the second in order of the antediluvian patriarchs. He was the first-born after the murder of Abel, and granted in mercy to his parents, to be an eminent supporter of religion in the enlargement of the church of God. When Eve became the mother of this promising child, she called his name Seth: "For God," said she, "hath appointed me another seed, instead of Abel, whom Cain slew." Gen. iv, 25. By her speaking in this manner, it seems that Eve regarded him as the deliverer promised by the Lord, and that by him they should regain a place in Paradise.

Seth signifies settled, or placed; and this name appears to have been by a prophetic spirit; because in his seed mankind should continue to the end of time, and from him the Messiah should descend. While Cain, the head of the apostacy, is made a wanderer, Seth, from whom the true church was to come, was fixed; and in his family, godliness remarkably flourished.

"And to Seth, to him also there was born a son, and he called his name Enos; then began men to call upon the name of the Lord," ver. 26.

The birth of Enos was in the two hundred and thirty-fifth year of Adam's life; at which time, it appears, there was a happy revival of religion. "Those who served God and those who served him not" were distinguished before that time, as we see in the difference between Cain and Abel: but then, about the period that Enos was born, the sincere worshippers of God, by faith in his gracious promises, began to stir up themselves to manifest their belief in the Divine word, by a more regular observation of public worship in solemn assemblies.

The defection from godliness appearing more confirmed in the family of Cain, Seth and his family took measures for the more effectual establishment and advancement of religion among themselves, lest they should be corrupted by those evil examples of infidelity and profaneness.

The marginal reading of the passage deserves particular notice, as that gives the literal meaning of the Hebrew words, and affords us the true idea in a more extended point of view. "Then began men to be called by the name of the Lord." While Cain and his children were fortifying themselves in their newly-erected city, boasting of their greatness as the "sons of men," Seth and his children, avowing more decidedly their adherence to the service of their Creator, and their hope in his revealed mercy and salvation, called themselvss the "sons of God." Thus began the significant distinction, which has ever since been preserved between the professors and the profane. That difference still exists; and it will continue, till "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea;" or even to the awful judgment day of God, when we shall clearly "discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not." Mal. iii, 18.

Seth, it is believed, continued through life a firm believer and a devoted man of God, though the inspired historian has recorded no particulars concerning him, except his death and age. "And all the days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years, and he died." Gen. v, 8.

May all our young readers especially be numbered with the sons of God in this world, and bear the holy image of the Saviour on their hearts. May they be "the living epistles of Christ, written not with ink with the Spirit of the living God; not in tabl stone, but in the fleshly tables of the heart, known and read of all men," 2 Cor. iii, 2, 3; a length shine with their blessed Lord in everla honour and glory.

ON A CHILD.

To the memory of Emma, only daughter of Heald, Esq. who died July, 8, 1832: her m deceased in childbirth some years before.

Home to thy mother, little one!
This world hath strife and care
Too grievous for a form so soft
And frail as thou to bear.
Home to thy grave! a happy home
For those who shrink from grief to come.

Repose thy little head by hers,
Who did not live to see
The opening bloom, the smiles, the tears
Of thy sweet infancy.
Home to the grave! a sacred home
For those who shrink from guilt to come!

Tell her what bitter tears were shed
Upon thy cradled face;
Tell her what yearning looks were spent,
Her smiles in thine to trace;
Tell her what anguish seem'd to come,
When she forsook her mortal home!

Tell her what tender watchfulness
Thy baby cares beguil'd;
Tell her that those she left behind
Still lov'd her in her child;
And that thou hadst a happy home,
Ere summon'd to the life to come!

Tell her thy guiltless soul returns
As pure to heaven and her,
As when amid the tempest's rage,
A dove-like messenger,
From brighter lands it seem'd to come,
To call her gentle spirit home!

Home! sweet one, home! a radiant crown
Shall twine thy sinless brow;
A father's arms have held thee here,—
A mother's wait thee now.
A mother's arms! ah, happy home!
Ah, happy summons! "Sweet one, come!"

ANECDOTE OF Mr. BEDDOME.

The late venerable Mr. Beddome, minister of

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER I.

Dear Madam;

It is with much pleasure that I comply with your request, to offer you some advice respecting the education of that child, of which you have recently become the mother. In addition to solicitude for your happiness as a friend, I feel intense interest in the subject of education generally; and any peculiar earnestness in my language, or copiousness in my suggestions, which you may observe, you will I trust ascribe to the operation of these feelings.

I shall not hesitate to descend occasionally into very minute detail; and with the greater confidence, since I have the pleasure of believing, that you have long ago known that the greatest consequences often spring from apparently insignificant causes, and that mankind are indebted both for their character and happiness to the influence rather of little than of extraordinary circumstances.

I am glad too, that as you expect advantage from my remarks, you have applied for them so early, being of opinion that the great error in education generally is that it begins too late, and that the treatment of a child is of great importance to its future happiness, even while it is generally regarded as little more than an animated being.

The term education will be used by me in a far more extended sense than it usually obtains; and instead of restricting it to certain species of knowledge only, communicated at a certain period, it may be better understood as applicable to the entire process of educing all those powers and qualities of human nature, upon the exercise and regulation of which mankind depend for ensuring the ends the Creator intended them to serve, and for attaining that measure of happiness which he wills them to enjoy.

A due regard to those original qualities of human nature, which it is the office of education to cultivate, induces me to distribute my observations under the several particulars of physical, moral, intellectual, and religious education. Under these four principal particulars a variety of topics range themselves, upon each of which I hope to devote a letter.

Should any of these observations appear to you of an unusual character, you will not regard them as less worthy of attention on that account, since you are aware that there are no principles of conduct, which, however confidently now received, did not present themselves to some former generation under the aspect of novelty. The only just recommendation of any rules of conduct that may be proposed is, not their antiquity, or their having been already adopted, but their agreement with the perceptions of an enlightened judgment.

Neither will you feel any difficulty arising from the circumstance, that my observations professedly aim at what I deem the most perfect system of education, since with no propriety could any person propose a defective standard for adoption. It is always of importance to aim at perfection, since although we shall assuredly fall short of it, we shall nevertheless attain a higher degree of excellence than if we had chosen an inferior standard.

The experience and observation of every day may convince us, that when the hearts of mankind are really interested in any object, and when they adopt right methods in the pursuit of it, they attain more than even their most sanguine expectations might have dictated, and so much as absolutely to amaze the indolent or desponding. You have the most powerful motive for activity and hope. You doubtless feel how vast a charge is confided to your keeping. A member of society is consigned to your care, whose good or evil conduct will hereafter affect multitudes of human beings, and whose immediate influence on society will be propagated, and extend and widen till the termination of the world. An heir of immortality is confided to your training, and you are no doubt convinced that his happiness through eternity is naturally associated with the direction which his mind will receive through your instructions. He will, indeed, as he grows up into life, come under the influence of many different persons, all standing in different relations to him more or less remote. Those persons will all be answerable for the effect which their conduct may have upon his conduct and happiness; but the influence of a parent being more immediate, more powerful, more constant than that of any, or of all other beings, renders the parent the most responsible being in the universe for the welfare of his child to his own conscience, to society, to the child himself, and to his Creator. But though you may feel the weight of your responsibility, you will not suffer it to overwhelm you, so as to dishearten or diminish your efforts. Yours will be the pleasing recollection, that in endeavouring to educate your child you are attempting a duty in which you may confidently expect the gracious assistance of God. Should it be his will that your child should be early removed from you, you will have the consolatory reflection that you had assiduously laboured to prepare him for the presence of his Redeemer. Should you witness him arrived to manhood, yours will be the happy consciousness that you have bequeathed a most valuable blessing to society—a well-educated child, prepared in his turn to become a happy, useful parent, transmitting to his children and to all around him the benefits of the good instructions he had received at your hands.

That this happy privilege may be yours, is the sincere wish of your, &c.

Clericus.

PSALM XV, 15.

"My times are in thy hand."

Since, O my Father! in thy hands
Is my appointed way;
Teach me to keep thy blest commands,
And make thy love my stay.

Thy precept bids my spirit trust
The Lord Jehovah's might;
And tells me, though a child of dust,
To triumph in his sight.

Thy love, through every varied scene
Of life, shall still extend;
Shall crown with blessings all between,
And glory at the end.

For if I die! my soul with God
Eternally shall be:
And whilst I live—Oh, blessed thought!—
Then God shall be with me.

WIT EMPLOYED FOR RELIGION.

The late eminent Mr. Bradbury, when preaching one day in Salter's Hall, London, upon the Divinity of Christ, was hissed at by several present. The good man's friends were affected with such daring insolence, and afterwards expressed their sorrow to Mr. Bradbury; to which he ingeniously replied, "I have been bruising the head of the old serpent, and no wonder you heard the hisses of the generation of vipers." It is well when wit can be employed in the service of religion.

SCENERY OF THE NILE.

At Beni Hassan, on the banks of the Nile, is a range of ancient Egyptian temples, literally excavated out of the solid rock. We counted twenty-six: some of them are of considerable dimensions, and communicate with each other in a strangely romantic and mysterious manner. The walls are covered with paintings and hieroglyphics, the colours of which were very vivid. The prospect from the interior of the principal temple, through the massy pillars of the portico, was singular and magnificent. The setting sun cast a flood of golden radiance on the fertile plain beneath and its boundary hills. Far as the eye could reach, the windings and meanderings of the Nile were distinctly visible, with a solitary white sail gliding on its peaceful bosom. The wild air of our Arab attendants seen amid the gloom, stealing cautiously along the ruins, now lost in the darkness of the caverns, then emerging into light, the occasional flash of fire arms, the hollow echoes that reverberated around, together with the noble chambers and the fallen pillars, all combined to make the scene highly impressive. In imagination we flew back some thousand years, when these temples were first excavated in honour of false deities, "the likeness of things in heaven, of things in earth, and of things under the earth."

We then thought of the saintly fathers of the desert, who among these fallen fanes and forsaken shrines, in the early ages of Christianity, retired hither from the temptations and persecutions of a heathen world, to serve the only true God in solitude and peace. The evening was lovely, as indeed they almost ever are in Egypt; when after a sultry and oppressive day, a cool and refreshing breeze springs up, and the air assumes a peculiar purity, which is unknown to our northern climes.

> "In the still hour to musing dear," when the daylight gradually faded into a softened twilight, there was something very delightful in gliding on the surface of this vast river, abandoning the mind to all the soft reveries of fancy, the past, the present, and the future all melting in one bright chaos: Oriental scenery and European imagination combining to form a fairy scene of enchantment.

How many interesting reminiscences are connected with the Nile! By its waters have wandered the steps of the patriarchs Abraham and Moses, and it has been the witness and the subject of the numerous miracles which were wrought when "the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart. Though Persian, Grecian, Roman, Saracenic, and Turkish potentates have in turn held sway over the devoted land, on which the awful voice of prophecy has uttered such dreadful denunciations of woe and vengeance, yet still onward flows the majestic stream, undisturbed by the flight of time, or the ruin of dynasties, or the fall of empires.—Mrs. Elwood.

ON WEARING A HORN.

The most remarkable feature in the costume of the Maronite women (a race of people dwelling in Assyria) is the tantoora, perhaps the most singular head-dress in the world. This is a long silver or wooden horn, about twelve or fourteen inches in length, shaped something like a speaking trumpet, and projecting upward from the forehead. Over this unicorn-looking instrument a veil is thrown, which, closing across the face, and falling down the shoulders behind, has not altogether an ungraceful appearance. The wives and daughters of the Emirs and great Sheiks have the tantoora richly gilt, and in some instances embossed.

This singular custom may be traced to very remote antiquity. The lifting up of horns is a common figure of speech in the scriptures. "Lift not up your horn on high, speak not with a stiff neck.—All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off; but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted. Psalm lxxv, 5, 10.

In Abyssinia the men wear two horns, or tantooras; and I have heard, that upon a coin commemorative of Alexander the Great's visit, either to the high priest of Jerusalem or the high priest of Jupiter Ammon in the Libyan desert, the Macedonian king is represented as wearing two horns. He was commonly styled in the figurative language of prophecy, "him of the two horns;" whereby some commentators suppose to be meant the horns of the crescent, and others the horns of the Eastern and Western world, but which probably have reference to the circumstance of his wearing two horns, or tantooras.

Also the statue of Moses by Michael Angelo, upon the Quirinal Hill at Rome, represents the prophet as wearing two horns.—Frankland's Travels.

A MOTHER'S GIFT—A BIBLE.

Remember, love, who gave thee this,
When other days shall come;
When she, who had thy earliest kiss,
Sleeps in her narrow home.
Remember, 'twas a Mother gave
The gift to one she'd die to save.

That Mother sought a pledge of love
The holiest for her son;
And from the gifts of God above,
She chose a goodly one:
She chose for her beloved boy,
The source of light, and life, and joy.

She bids him keep the gift, that when
The parting hour shall come,
They may have hope to meet again,
In an eternal home:
His cordial faith in that will be
Sweet incense to her memory.

But should the scoffer, in his pride,
Laugh that firm faith to scorn,
And bid him cast the pledge aside,
That he from youth has borne,
She bids him pause, and ask his breast,
If she, or he, has lov'd him best.

A parent's blessing on her son
Goes with this holy thing:
The love that would retain the one,
Must to the other cling.
Remember, 'tis no trifling toy;
A Mother's gift to her dear boy.

PROFANITY REPROVED WITH MEEKNESS OF WISDOM.

Dr. Gifford, as he was one day showing the British Museum to strangers, was very much vexed by the profane conversation of a young gentleman who was present. The doctor, taking an ancient copy of the Septuagint, a Greek translation of the Old Testament, and showing it to him—"O!" said the gentleman, "I can read this." "Well," said the doctor, "read that passage," pointing to the third commandment. The gentleman was so struck, that he immediately desisted from swearing.

THE LILY.

Lily is expressed by the term Shushan in Hebrew, which denotes light; and is said to have its name from the property it possesses, of reflecting light. One of the capital cities in Persia is named Shushan, from the abundance of lilies of a beautiful kind which grow in its neighbourhood. They were common in Judea, and grew in the open fields.

The amaryllis lutea, a plant of the lilaceous tribe, and which is thought to be noticed in Scripture, is singularly beautiful. The corolla is bell-shaped, and tubular at the base. Its flowers seldom rise above three or four inches high. The shape in some degree resembles that of the large yellow crocus, giving to the fields of the Levant, where they grow in profusion, a bright and dazzling appearance. In our own country the genus is exotic in its origin. If it be of spontaneous growth in some of the southern parts of Europe, it appears there but with a secondary splendour; in its full pomp and perfection it is only to be found in regions near or within the tropics. In his voyage to Abyssinia, Mr. Salt discovered a new and beautiful species of amaryllis, which bore from ten to twelve spikes on each stem, springing from one common receptacle; the general colour of the corolla was white, and every petal had a single streak of purple down the middle. It was sweet-scented, and its smell, though more powerful, resembled that of the "lily of the valley!" This latter plant (convallaria majalis) is well known by its snow-white drooping flowers, and the delicate odour which they emit.

> "Scatter'd wild, the lily of the vale
> Its balmy essence breathes."

The crown imperial (fritillaria imperialis), of the same class and order as the lily, and to which no doubt specific reference is made in Scripture, claims a portion of our attention. The flowers of this beautiful plant (which form a circle round the stem, disposed in the manner of a crown) are pendulous, and frequently of a bright red colour. The white glandular cavity of each petal is filled with a clear nectareous juice, resembling a pearl, which gradually distils pure drops of water.

The pancratium sol illyricum, cultivated in Alexandria, has been supposed to be the lily of the Jews, or "white lily," as the latter bears a striking resemblance to it in purity of colour. This plant excels the common lily; but as it is only known as a garden plant, its pretensions to be the lily of Scripture are very questionable.

There is a species of water lily, named Lotus, mentioned by Van Egmont, growing in Lower Egypt, and even in the Nile, not far from its influx into the Mediterranean, and by the inhabitants called Bashim. "Its leaves," to use his language, "float on the surface of the water; and it produces great numbers of flowers, which were anciently used in forming garlands for victors. This plant the ancient Egyptians considered as an emblem of Osiris, and particularly of the sun, having not only the form of that luminary, but attending upon it. It lies under water during its absence, but rises above the surface as soon as it appears."—Scripture Garden Walk.

ANCIENT CUSTOM OF ERECTING CROSSES.

The crosses of sculptured stone to be seen in many parts of the world, constitute an interesting class of antiquities. The practice of erecting single stones in commemoration of an important event, or as a symbol of pagan worship, prevailed in very remote periods of antiquity. It is also generally admitted, that the early teachers of Christianity, in a necessary condescension to the prejudice and ignorance of the multitude, collected their audience in places rendered fancifully sacred by these heathen erections; but changed the stone from a pagan to a Christian symbol, by carving on it the figure of the cross. As a knowledge of the arts increased, a progressive degree of elegance was bestowed on these emblematical pillars; the hand of pious taste was applied to the sculpture, and a variety of ornament was bestowed, in augmentation of the attractive character of the sacred memorial.

These crosses appear to have been erected occasionally for the purpose of boundary marks; but in most cases they are owing to the great incitement they presented in regard to devotional feelings. In many places they were endowed with a privilege of sanctuary, but that does not appear to have been the custom in this country.

Crosses also of sepulchral memorial appear to have been extremely frequent, and perhaps constituted the earliest Christian monument in honour of the dead. A cross was also often erected near the entrance of a church, to excite solemn emotions in the minds of those who approached the sacred pile. Battles and disastrous events were often commemorated by a cross raised upon the spot.

In past ages the cross was considered a necessary appendage to the market-place, acting as an emphatic warning against dishonest practices; and from steps surrounding its base, the assembly were sometimes harangued by the inmates of adjacent religious institutions. "The general intent of market crosses," observes Dr. Milner, "was to excite public homage to the religion of Christ crucified, and to inspire men with a sense of morality and piety in the ordinary transactions of life."

There still remain many beautiful architectural specimens of this kind in England, but a greatly superior number are to be met with in Ireland, some of them extremely rude, and in the last stage of decay; while others display a peculiar richness of sculpture, a plenitude of decorations, with fanciful devices and storied passages of Scripture, which exhibit an inconceivable degree of beauty when mellowed by the lenient touch of Time.

PROPOSAL TO ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

Stasicrates, a great architect, in a conversation with Alexander the Great, told him, that of all the mountains he knew, none would so well admit of being cut into the shape of a man, as Mount Athos in Thrace: that if he therefore pleased to give orders, he would make this mountain the most durable of all statues, and that which would lie most open to the view of the universe. In its left hand it should hold a city, consisting of ten thousand inhabitants; and from its right should pour a great river, whose waters would discharge themselves into the sea. One would have thought that this project would have pleased Alexander, who sought for the great and marvellous in all things; nevertheless, he rejected it, and wisely answered, that it was enough that there already was one prince, whose folly Mount Athos would eternize. This was meant of Xerxes, who, having endeavoured to cut through the isthmus of that mountain, wrote a letter to it in these most proud and senseless terms: "Proud Athos, who liftest thy head to heaven, be not so bold as to oppose to my workmen such rocks and stones as they cannot cut; otherwise I will cut thee quite to pieces, and throw thee into the sea." "With regard to myself," says Alexander, "Mount Caucasus, the river Tanais, the Caspian Sea, all which I passed in triumph, shall be my monument."—Rollin.

ON THE ALTAR PIECE AT ST. BRIDE'S CHURCH.

Written after viewing it on a fine Sabbath Evening in Summer.

What are my feelings, Son of God!
When I behold thy flowing blood,
As the last nail is drawn away,
And nerveless drops that arm of clay!
That arm was nail'd against the tree,
That rich blood flow'd in streams for me.

Behold! the setting sun retire,
He tips the distant hills with fire.
Never before, since time begun,
And he his annual course had run,
Never such deed of blood was done:
Couldst thou look on it, glorious sun?

Ah, no! he had retir'd in gloom,
And midnight darkness reigned at noon.
The graves had open'd at that hour:
Earth shook beneath Almighty power:
The sacred vail in twain was torn:
The rocks had rent that dreadful morn.

Th' astonish'd crowd had now gone home,
The faithful few were left alone,
And had with tender care remov'd,
The cold remains of him they lov'd,
And soon within the silent grave
Must rest the form they could not save.

But there is one, absorb'd in grief,
Whose anguish'd heart finds no relief;
Whose bosom answer'd groan for groan;
The dying sufferer was her own!—
Her own!—and sure a mother's woe,
None but a mother e'er can know.

Behold the Roman captain stand
With his fierce legion near at hand!
What can those soldiers have to fear,
The few weak women loitering near,
Bathing with tears each bleeding limb
While all their brightest hopes grow dim?

Yes, guards of Rome!—ye well may fear,
Not Cæsar's self could triumph here;
The King of kings shall burst the tomb,
And as a mighty conqueror come!
God over all! (though prostrate now)
To whom both heaven and earth must bow.

THE GODDESS TEOYAMIQUI,

A MEXICAN IDOL.

THIS colossal and horrible monster is hewn out of one solid block of basalt, nine feet high. Its outlines give an idea of a deformed human figure, uniting all that is horrible in the tiger and the rattle-snake: instead of arms, it is supplied with two large serpents; and its drapery is composed of wreathed snakes, interwoven in the most disgusting manner, and the sides terminating in the wings of a vulture. Its feet are those of the tiger, with claws extended in the act of seizing its prey; and between them lies the head of another rattlesnake, which seems descending from the body of the idol. Its decorations accord with its horrid form, having a large necklace composed of human hearts, hands, and skulls, and fastened together by the entrails, the deformed breasts of the idol only remaining uncovered. It has evidently been painted in natural colours, which must have added greatly to the terrible effect it was intended to inspire in its votaries."—Bullock.

BOOKS OF STERLING MERIT.

CHURCH HISTORY THROUGH ALL AGES, from the first promise of a Saviour to the year 1830. By Thomas Timpson, Author of a "Companion to the Bible," &c. &c. 12mo. pp. 527. London: Westley and Davis; and Paul, 19, Paternoster Row.

We should be wanting in our duty to our readers, to the religious public, and to ourselves, if we did not notice the valuable publication before us. Our limits will not allow us to enter upon elaborate criticism, but thus much we may say: it is impartial in its statements; striking in its selection of facts; while the general pithiness of its style cannot fail to recommend it to those, who wish to possess the marrow of Church History in a small compass. In short, it is the most useful compendium we have seen, and particularly suitable to be used as an introductory book to a course of Ecclesiastical History; at the same time affording a considerable fund of information for those who have no other opportunity of acquiring such knowledge.

The Author says in his preface, "that he is not conscious of having written a single sentence in the spirit of party, or a line on which he cannot continue to implore the Divine benediction;" and we must bear our willing testimony, that bigotry never can be charged upon him, nor a single paragraph be made to speak its language.

We particularly call the attention of the instructors of youth to this work, and sincerely hope it will be speedily put into the hands of young people. It ought to be introduced into every Sunday School library in the kingdom. The price is only 7*s*.

WISDOM IN A FOOL.

A Baronet of the last century, whose mansion was in Yorkshire, was supposed to be dead; when the following conversation took place between his jester, or fool, and his servants.

Serv. Our master is gone!

Fool. Ah! whither is he gone?

Serv. To Heaven, to be sure.

Fool. To Heaven! no, that he is not, I am certain.

Serv. Why so?

Fool. Why? because Heaven is a great way off; and when my master was going a long journey, he used, for some time, to talk about it, and prepare for it; but I never heard him speak of Heaven, or saw him make any preparations for going; he cannot, therefore, be gone thither.

The Baronet, however, recovered; and this conversation being told him, he was so struck with it, that he immediately began to prepare for his journey to that country "from whose bourn no traveller returns."

TRIUMPHAL ARCH OF TITUS, AT ROME.

ARCH OF TITUS, AT ROME.

ISTIANITY receives confirmation of its divinity almost every class of ancient monuments. Among e relating to the antiquities of Jerusalem, and of lory in the time of our Saviour's ministry, and of lestruction by the Romans, agreeably to our Sa-r's prediction, Matt. xxiv, Luke xxi, the Arch of s at Rome is peculiarly remarkable. For the par-ars of that most dreadful siege, we refer our ers to the account given by Josephus, who wit-ed its horrors, in his "History of the Jewish War," o Newton's "Dissertation on the Prophecies.'
t must have been the calamities of the wretched people, attending that fearful overthrow, imagination cannot conceive, even from the statement of Josephus, that 1,100,000 persons perished by the sword, famine, and pestilence, besides 97,000 sold for slaves, and an innumerable multitude destroyed in different parts of the country.

Jerusalem being reduced to heaps of ruins, A. D. 71, and the wretched survivors scattered upon the face of the earth, the treasures of its magnificent temple were carried to Rome, and publicly exhibited to the people for the honour of the conquerors, Vespasian and his son Titus. Vespasian built a new temple, dedicated to Peace, to celebrate his victories, and in this building were deposited most of the Jewish spoils: Titus had a Triumphal Arch, of great beauty and magnificence, erected to his honour; and on this were represented his exploits against the Jews. Within the Arch are still seen the representation of part of the procession carrying "the golden table of the weight of many talents, and the massy golden candlestick, with its seven lamps." This splendid Arch has continued through almost eighteen centuries, an instructive monument against the impiety and wickedness of the Jewish nation, who, on account of their rejection and crucifixion of Messiah, were abandoned by God.

Triumph of Vespasian and Titus.

Josephus describes the pompous triumph of Vespasian and his son Titus, on the return of the latter from Jerusalem, a part of whose account we shall here give to our readers:—

"When notice had been given beforehand of the day appointed for this pompous solemnity to be made, on account of their victories, not one of the immense multitude was left in that city, but every body went out so far as to gain only a station where they might stand, and left only such a passage as was necessary for those that were to be seen to go along it.

"Now all the soldiery marched out beforehand by companies, and in their several ranks, under their several commanders, in the night-time, and were about the gates, not of the upper palaces, but those near the temple of Isis; for there it was that the emperors had rested the foregoing night. And as soon as ever it was day, Vespasian and Titus came out crowned with laurel, and clothed in those ancient purple habits which were proper to their family, and then went as far as Octavian's Walks; for there it was that the senate, and the principal rulers, and those that had been recorded as of the equestrian order, waited for them. Now a tribunal had been erected before the cloisters, and ivory chairs had been set upon it, when they came and sat down upon them. Wherefore the soldiery made an acclamation of joy to them immediately, and all gave them attestations of their valour; while they were themselves without their arms, and only in their silken garments, and crowned with laurel: then Vespasian accepted of these shouts of theirs; but while they were still disposed to go on in such acclamations, he gave them a signal of silence. And when every body entirely held their peace, he stood up, and covering the greatest part of his head with his cloak, he put up the accustomed solemn prayers; the like prayers did Titus put up also; after which prayers Vespasian made a short speech to all the people, and then sent away the soldiers to a dinner prepared for them by the emperors. Then did he retire to that gate which was called the Gate of the Pomp, because pompous shows do always go through that gate; there it was that they tasted some food, and when they had put on their triumphal garments, and had offered sacrifices to the gods that were placed at the gate, they sent the triumph forward, and marched through the theatres, that they might be the more easily seen by the multitude.

"Now it is impossible to describe the multitude of the shows as they deserve, and the magnificence of them all; such indeed as a man could not easily think of as performed either by the labour of workmen, or the variety of riches, or the rarities of nature; for almost all such curiosities as the most happy men ever get by piece-meal, were here heaped one upon another, and those both admirable and costly in their nature; and all brought together on that day, demonstrated the vastness of the dominions of the Romans; for there was here to be seen a mighty quantity of silver, and gold, and ivory, contrived into all sorts of things, and did not appear as carried along in pompous show only, but, as a man may say, running along like a river. Some parts were composed of the rarest purple hangings, and so carried along; and others accurately represented to the life what was embroidered by the arts of the Babylonians. There were also precious stones that were transparent, some set in crowns of gold, and some in other ouches, as the workman pleased; and of these such a vast number were brought, that we could not but thence learn how vainly we imagined any of them to be rarities. The images of the gods were also carried, being as well wonderful for their largeness, as made very artificially, and with great skill of the workmen; nor were any of these images of any other than very costly materials; and many species of animals were brought, every one in their own natural ornaments. The men also who brought every one of these shows were great multitudes, and adorned with purple garments, all over interwoven with gold; those that were chosen for carrying these pompous shows, having also about them such magnificent ornaments, as were both extraordinary and surprising. Besides these, one might see that even the great number of the captives was not unadorned, while the variety that were in their garments, and their fine texture, concealed from the sight the deformity of their bodies. But what afforded the greatest surprise of all, was the structure of the pageants that were borne along; for indeed he that met them could not but be afraid that the bearers would not be able firmly enough to support them, such was their magnitude; for many of them were so made, that they were on three or even four stories, one above another. The magnificence also of their structure afforded one both pleasure and surprise; for upon many of them were laid carpets of gold. There was also wrought gold and ivory fastened about them all; and many resemblances of the war, and those in several ways, and variety of contrivances, affording a most lively portraiture of itself; for there was to be seen a happy country laid waste, and entire squadrons of enemies slain; while some of them ran away, and some were carried into captivity; with walls of great altitude and magnitude overthrown, and ruined by machines; with the strongest fortifications taken, and the walls of most populous cities upon the tops of hills seized on, and an army pouring itself within the walls; as also every place full of slaughter, and supplications of the enemies, when they were no longer able to lift up their hands in way of opposition. Fire also sent upon temples was here represented, and houses overthrown, and falling upon their owners: rivers also, after they come out of a large and melancholy desert, ran down, not into a land cultivated, nor as drink for men, or for cattle, but through a land still on fire upon every side; for the Jews related that such a thing they had undergone during this war. Now the workmanship of these representations was so magnificent and lively in the construction of the things, that it exhibited what had been done to such as did not see it, as if they had been there really present. On the top of every one of these pageants was placed the commander of the city that was taken, and the manner wherein he was taken. Moreover, there followed those pageants a great number of ships; and for the other spoils, they were carried in great plenty. But for those that were taken in the temple of Jerusalem, they made the greatest figure of them all; that is the golden table, of the weight of many talents; the candlestick also, that was made of gold, though its construction were now changed from that which we made use of: for its middle shaft was fixed upon a basis, and the small branches were produced out of it to a great length, having the likeness of a trident in their position, and had every one a socket made of brass for a lamp at the tops of them. These lamps were in number seven, and represented the dignity of the number Seven among the Jews; and the last of all the spoils, was carried the Law of the Jews. After these spoils passed by a great many men, carrying the images of Victory, whose structure was entirely either of ivory, or of gold. After which Vespasian marched in the first place, and Titus followed him; Domitian also rode along with them, and made a glorious appearance, and rode on a horse that was worthy of admiration.

"Now the last part of this pompous show was at the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, whither when they were come, they stood still; for it was the Romans' ancient custom to stay till somebody brought the news that the general of the enemy was slain. This general was Simon, the son of Gioras, who had then been led in this triumph among the captives; a rope had also been put upon his head, and he had been drawn into a proper place in the forum, and had withal been tormented by those that drew him along; and the law of the Romans required, that malefactors condemned to die should be slain there. Accordingly, when it was related that there was an end of him, and all the people had set up a shout for joy, they then began to offer those sacrifices which they had consecrated, in the prayers used in such solemnities; which when they had finished, they went away to the palace. And as for some of the spectators, the emperors entertained them at their own feast; and for all the rest, there were noble preparations made for their feasting at home; for this was a festival day to the city of Rome, as celebrated for the victory obtained by their army over their enemies, for the end that was now put to their civil miseries, and for the commencement of their hopes of future prosperity and happiness."

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

POLYCARP, MARTYRED A.D. 167.

25. Polycarp, bishop of the Christian church at Smyrna in Asia Minor, is deservedly famous in Ecclesiastical annals. He was a successful defender of the gospel during a long course of years, and at length sealed his testimony for Christ with the blood of martyrdom.

Polycarp was born, as is believed, at Smyrna, in the reign of Nero; but sold as a slave when a child: he was purchased by a Christian lady, named Calisto, and educated by her in the doctrines of her religion. He is supposed to have been a disciple of the Apostle John, and to have conversed with many who had heard discourses from the lips of Jesus Christ. Polycarp succeeded Bucolus in the pastoral office over the Christians at Smyrna, and laboured for many years, with persevering zeal, to preserve the purity of Christian doctrine, and to advance the saving knowledge of Christ among the people. Marcus Antoninus, the Roman emperor, was induced by the pagan priesthood to persecute the Christians, and Polycarp was called to the honour of martyrdom.

Being brought before the proconsul, that magistrate endeavoured to prevail upon him, but in vain, to recant. "Regard," said he, "thy great age—swear by the genius of Cæsar. Repent, reproach Christ, and say with us, Take away the impious," meaning the Christians. Polycarp resented the proposition, and replied, "Eighty and six years I have served Him, and he never did me any harm; how then shall I now blaspheme my King and my Saviour?" The proconsul still importuned him to swear by the genius of Cæsar: but he replied, "Since you are so vainly ambitious that I should swear by the Emperor's genius, as you call it, as if you knew not who I am, hear my free confession:—I am a Christian. If you have an inclination to learn the Christian religion, appoint me a time, and I will give you that instruction."

Arguments being in vain, the proconsul threatened him with the wild beasts. "Call for them," said Polycarp, "for we are immutably resolved not to change the better for the worse, accounting it fit and comely to turn only from vice to virtue." "Since thou makest so light of wild beasts," added the magistrate, "I have a fire that shall tame thee, unless thou repent." Polycarp replied, "Thou threatenest me with a fire that burns for an hour, and is presently extinct; but thou art ignorant, alas! of the fire of eternal damnation, and the judgment to come, reserved for the wicked in the other world. But why delayest thou? Bring forth whatever thou hast a mind!"

Astonished at his firmness, and regarding it as obstinacy, he called the cryer to proclaim, "Polycarp has confessed himself a Christian." Multitudes shouted, "This is the great Doctor of Asia, and the Father of the Christians! This is the destroyer of our gods, that teaches men not to do sacrifice, or worship the deities!" The cry being over, the crowd addressed the Asiarch, the Arch-priest of the idolators, at whose charge the public sports were provided, to entertain them with a lion let loose upon the Christian confessor: but, as he had gratified them with a hunting show in the amphitheatre a short time before, he refused; when they demanded that he should be burnt alive.

This brutal clamour was satisfied by the venerable bishop being led to the amphitheatre, and, in the presence of a multitude who eagerly fetched large quantities of wood and faggots, was sacrificed in the flames. Many Jews, it is said, were active in this murder. It is worthy observation, that when the officers came to nail the martyr to the stake, as was the custom, Polycarp desired them to omit it; assuring them, "He who gives strength to endure the fire, will enable me to stand immoveable in the hottest flames." Thus God was glorified in his faithful servant.

PRAYER OF POLYCARP AT THE STAKE.

"O Lord God Almighty, the Father of thy well beloved and ever-blessed Son, Jesus Christ, by whom we have received the knowledge of Thee; the God of angels, powers, and of every creature, and of the whole race of the righteous, who live before Thee; I bless Thee that Thou hast graciously condescended to bring me to this day and hour, that I may receive a portion in the number of thy holy Martyrs, and drink of Christ's cup, for the resurrection to eternal life both of soul and body in the incorruptibleness of the Holy Spirit. Into which number, grant I may be received this day, being found in thy sight as a fair and acceptable sacrifice, such a one as Thou thyself hast prepared; that so Thou mayest accomplish what Thou, O true and faithful God, hast foreshown: therefore I praise Thee for all thy mercies, I bless Thee, I glorify Thee, through the eternal High-Priest, thy beloved Son Jesus Christ; with whom to Thyself and the Holy Spirit be glory both now and for ever. Amen."

THE CHRISTIAN'S BADGE.

The Romans had a law, that every one should, wherever he went, wear a badge of his trade in his hat, or outward vestment, that might be known. Thus the Christian is never to lay aside the badge of his holy profession; but to let his light shine, and adorn the doctrine of God his Saviour in all things.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ENOCH.

BORN A. M. 623. TRANSLATED A. M. 988, AGED 365 YEARS.

The Parentage of Enoch.

"ENOCH, the seventh from Adam" in the line of Seth, was a person of extraordinary excellence and honour. In early years his parents devoted him to the service of God, and his eminent character corresponded with his name, which signifies dedicated.

This name, Enoch, was given by Cain to his eldest son; but we have every reason to believe, that the two were persons of very different dispositions, and of opposite courses of life. Their parents, their education, and their habits of life, were of a contrary character; and such contrarieties we still perceive in persons bearing the same name among ourselves.

The father of Enoch was Jared: but of him we have no particular information, beyond that which is contained in the book of Genesis,—the simple mention of his name,—his father Mahaleel,—his son Enoch,—his age and death,—and the fact of his having sons and daughters: yet the course of his life was greatly extended. "And all the days of Jared were nine hundred sixty and two years: and he died." Gen. v, 20.

We are not able to pronounce with confident assurance, but the probability is strong that Jared was a man of sincere personal religion, especially from the fact of the dedication to God of his son Enoch, whose exalted piety is celebrated, both in relation to his public and private life.

Entertaining this pleasing persuasion, a distinguished modern poet has eulogized both father and son, in these beautiful lines:

> "Jared, who full of hope beyond the tomb,
> Hallow'd his offspring from his mother's womb,
> And Heaven receiv'd the son that parent gave,
> He walk'd with God, and overstept the grave."
> MONTGOMERY'S WORLD BEFORE THE FLOOD.

There is a fragment of an ancient tradition respecting Jared, which has been preserved to our times. It states, that his name Jared, which signifies descending, was given to him on account of a hundred young men, of the posterity of Seth, having descended from the holy mountain, on which they dwelt, to marry the "daughters of men," and mingle with the Cainites, contrary to the counsel of Jared. The same tradition reports, that Jared was a prophet; and that, when he drew near his end, he called to him Enoch, Methuselah, Lamech, Noah, and their children: he gave them some pious counsel, and having appointed Enoch to be his successor, he blessed them in the name of the LORD, and died in the hope of a blessed immortality.

As Enoch was born in the six hundred and twenty-third year of the world, he must have been for more than three hundred years contemporary with his first parent, Adam. From his own lips, therefore, he would have the delightful opportunity of learning the wondrous story of the creation,—the terms of the covenant of obedience, according to which he was constituted lord of the whole earth,—the felicities of the consecrated Paradise,—the awful circumstances of the fall by his transgression,—the explained import of the Divine promise assuring a Saviour from deserved wrath,—the design of sacrifices,—and other sublime and inestimable truths and doctrines.

Although we have no particular account of the manner or frequency of the intercourse of these venerable patriarchs, which the brevity of the book of Genesis would not allow, yet we can have no doubt of their profitable conferences, and their frequent religious communications. Enoch, from his recorded habits and character, would certainly be inquisitive for the most precious information from his devout ancestors. Many a serene summer's evening,—many a consecrated festival,—many a memorable anniversary,—many a holy Sabbath would be improved, in treasuring up the instructive communications which fell from the lips of his ancestors, the distinguished "sons of God," especially from Enos and Seth, and from his venerable progenitor Adam, who had been so remarkably favoured in communion with God.

As Enoch is testified to have lived more than three hundred years contemporary with Adam, some of our young readers may feel disposed to inquire, what was the reason of the patriarchs living so long,—many of them to nearly a thousand years. To satisfy their minds it may be replied, that though we may not be able to declare the whole, yet there were several evident reasons for their long continuance on earth. First, it must be chiefly resolved into the sovereign power and goodness of God. He prolonged their lives for the more speedy peopling of the earth, and for the more effectual preservation of religion, while there were no written records of God's revealed will, the knowledge of which was handed down principally by tradition. As they lived to so extended an age, the father could instruct his children to the fifth or sixth generation, in the things which had been revealed to him from the "Father of lights" and fountain of grace.

All the recorded patriarchs until Noah, "were born before Adam died: so that from him they might receive a full and satisfactory account of the creation, Paradise, the fall, the promise, and those divine precepts, which concerned religious worship and a religious life; and if any mistakes arose, they might have recourse to him while he lived, as to an oracle, for the rectifying of it; and after his death, to Methuselah, and others, that had conversed with him: so great was the care of Almighty God to preserve in his church the knowledge of his will, and the purity of his worship."—Henry.

Natural causes also, no doubt, favoured long life in those early ages of the world. Man was indeed excluded from Paradise, which the LORD had planted; the earth was cursed with thorns and thistles; but still it was more fruitful, the productions of it more nutritious, and the air more pure and healthful than after the deluge. Besides, the cheerfulness of the pious, and the temperance of those simple ages, would unite with the blessings of a bounteous God to prolong their lives, and thus to secure the accomplishment of his holy and benevolent purposes in their families.

THE BANYAN, OR INDIAN FIG TREE.

THE glory of India is the sacred Banyan, or fig tree. This giant of the forest, or rather forest in itself, extends its branches in every direction, and throwing out new shoots, which fall to the ground and there take root without separating from the parent tree, it forms a continuous and delightful shade, and provides a home and shelter for the houseless native.

It is said to derive its name of Banyan from the adoration which that caste pays to it; who paint it daily, make offerings of rice, and pray to it.

Pennant says, it is called the pagod tree, and tree of councils, because idols are placed under its shade, and councils held beneath its branches.

In some places it is believed to be the haunt of spectres, as the ancient oaks of Wales have been of fairies. Pillars of stone, and posts elegantly carved and ornamented, with the most beautiful porcelain to supply the use of mirrors, are occasionally placed under its shade.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER II.

Dear Madam,

In my last Letter it was intimated, that the subject of Education naturally divides itself into four branches, corresponding to those qualities of human nature which it professes to educe, and to direct to the ends they were intended to answer; namely, the physical, moral, intellectual, and religious. That branch which may be called physical education first presents itself, and respecting which I now proceed to offer you my sentiments.

I shall confidently presuppose you to be fully convinced of the sympathy between the body and the mind; or, in other words, their natural tendency to assume the same state of feeling the one with the other. This has indeed been shown to be very natural, and the mode of it has been partly explained by many celebrated writers; but after all the most convincing proofs may be derived by every individual from his own experience and observation. It is also another principle, which we derive from the same sources, that in order to act upon the mental part of man's nature, you must immediately apply to the physical or corporeal; and that if you would increase the strength of the mental powers, or communicate cheerfulness and vivacity to the mind, you must strengthen the body, and provide for the due regulation of the animal functions. I beg also to presuppose you in possession of a third principle, that, in order to produce a habit or state, either of mind or body, in a human being, it is necessary to repeat those several acts and applications, which tend to produce that state or habit. Settle it therefore in your mind, that much of the mental and moral character of your offspring will depend upon the state of the physical part of his constitution, and the treatment it receives; and that if you wish him to have a sound mind, you will need to be very careful that he possesses a sound body. Attention to this as well as to all his interests, can scarcely begin too early, owing to the extreme susceptibility of his physical organization, and the intense sympathy which it possesses with the mind during the earliest years of existence. I have no doubt that the temper of a child especially, and therefore as much of the character of a child as depends upon his temper, may depend upon the treatment he receives during the first six months.

It is not difficult to decide as to the natural effect of uneasy and disagreeable circumstances. Suppose him to be swathed according to a method too barbarous even to have been admitted by barbarous nations; perpetually exposed to tight clothing; suddenly and roughly awaked from slumber; handled without tenderness by a nurse or attendant; laid in uneasy postures; distressed by the loud and absurd laughter or harsh voice of a nurse; washed by her careless hands, as if it were an inanimate being; often compelled to weep by these and many other species of absurd and irrational treatment;—what would be the natural result, but a fretful, distressed, gloomy, and desponding temperament, which would be fixed, and colour the career of future life, long before those around him had imagined it capable of being affected by external treatment? What, on the other hand, would be the natural result of loose, easy clothing; being awaked from slumber by the very gradual pressure of a finger upon his hand; handled with tenderness while awake; laid to slumber in a position by the attendant, which her own experience may have taught her is the most calculated for easy repose; spoken to throughout the day, not in nonsense or half words, but in a gentle, cheerful, intelligent tone, as if he were capable even of understanding what was said; the utmost efforts being used to prevent distressing him, or occasioning him to cry;—what, but a tranquil mind in a healthy body? Unaccustomed to be distressed, the process of mental development would proceed, neither being clouded nor liable to obliquity, and a happy temperament established, which might resist the influence of future circumstances calculated to produce despondency or ill-temper.

If you should doubt the dependence of the mental temperament upon early treatment, I might refer you to the case of the poet Cowper, who ascribes that despondency which rendered his life so miserable, that in the course of it he attempted twice to destroy himself, to the conduct of the elder boys to him when comparatively a child at Westminster school. The influence of external circumstances is, though not perhaps equal, yet of immense importance throughout the whole period of youth, and even of life itself. But the reality and the philosophy of their operation are far better attested and explained in the following quotation, with which I shall close my present Letter. It is from Paley's Moral Philosophy, in a note upon the sixth chapter, under the title "Human Happiness."

"If any positive signification, distinct from what we mean by pleasure, can be affixed to the term happiness, I should take it to denote a certain state of the nervous system in that part of the human frame in which we feel joy or grief, passions and affections. Whether this part be the heart, which the turn of most languages would lead us to believe, or the diaphragm, as Buffon, or the upper surface of the stomach, as Van Helmont thought, or rather a kind of fine network lining the whole region of the præcordia, as others have imagined; it is possible, not only that each painful sensation may violently shake and disturb the fibres for the time, but that a series of such may at length so derange the very texture of the system, as to produce a perpetual irritation, which will show itself by fretfulness, impatience, and restlessness. It is possible also, that a succession of pleasurable emotions may have such an effect upon this subtle organization, as to cause the fibres to relax and return into their place and order, and thereby to recover, or if not lost to preserve that harmonious conformation, which gives to the mind its sense of complacency and satisfaction. This state may be denominated happiness, and is so far distinguishable from pleasure, that it does not refer to any particular object or engagement, or consist, like pleasure, in the gratification of one or more of the senses, but is rather the secondary effect which such objects and gratifications produce upon the nervous system, or the state in which they leave it."

I remain, your, &c. &c.

DISCOVERY OF A SECRET.

A learned Bishop being one day in company with the celebrated David Garrick, their conversation turned on the influence of language, of action, of truth, and of representation, on the passions of men. "But how is it," said his Lordship, addressing himself to Garrick, "that you, who deal in nothing but fiction, can so affect your audiences, as to throw them into tears; while we, who deliver the most awful and interesting truths, can scarcely produce any effect whatever?" "My Lord," replied the actor, "here lies the secret:—you deliver your truths as if they were fictions; but we deliver our fictions as if they were truths."

CHOLERA IMPROVED.

EXCEPT intemperance and filthiness, probably nothing contributes to predispose for the cholera more than FEAR. Many have fallen both into disease and death by fear; and during the prevalence of the dire disease, with which our country has recently been afflicted, not a few, it is believed, have been its victims through this unhappy state of mind. Every effort, therefore, to allay that "fear which hath torment," and to tranquillize the minds of our neighbours and countrymen, must be worthy of the true philanthropist, and of the genuine Christian. Cheerfulness promotes health: and no one has so much reason for a cheerful frame of heart as the sincere Christian. Nehemiah acted most wisely and benevolently in exhorting the weeping Jews to cheerfulness, saying, "the joy of the LORD is your strength," chap. viii, 10. Such is our admonition to our readers.

The following series of "instructions" and of "daily resolutions," drawn up by a devoted Christian minister, after an attack of cholera, we think adapted to promote peace of mind, and worthy of making public at the present time. They have been published on a card, the "instructions" on one side, and the "daily resolutions" on the other.

INSTRUCTIONS

In the method of Salvation, revealed in the Gospel; with DAILY RESOLUTIONS, prepared on the bed of sickness, and recommended to his church and friends. By T.———

Admonitions of the Gospel.—1. Take heed what ye hear, Mark iv, 24. 2. Believe not every spirit—try the spirits, 1 John iv, 1. 3. By their fruits ye shall know them, Matt. vii, 20. 4. Take heed how ye hear, Luke viii, 10. 5. Examine yourselves, prove your ownselves, 2 Cor. xiii, 5. 6. Stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel, Phil. ii, 27.

Maxims of the Gospel.—1. Without faith it is impossible to please God, Hebrews xi, 6. 2. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord, Hebrews xii, 14. 3. If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature, 2 Cor. v, 17. 4. If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his, Rom. viii, 9.

Design of the Gospel.—1. To exalt IMMANUEL, the Saviour, Phil. ii, 9—11. 2. To humble the guilty but redeemed sinner, Romans iii, 19. 3. To originate and secure universal holiness, Titus ii, 11—14. 4. To prepare an innumerable multitude for heaven, Rev. vii, 9—14.

Order of the Gospel Salvation.—1. The merciful purpose of God in eternity, Eph. i, 4; 2 Tim. i, 9. 2. The manifestation of it, chiefly by Christ's mediation, 2 Tim. i, 10. 3. Regeneration by the grace of the Holy Spirit, John iii, 5; Tit. iii, 5. 4. Justification and pardon by faith in Christ, Acts x, 43; xiii, 38, 39. 5. Conversion to God both in heart and in life, 1 Thess. i, 5—8. 6. Godly sorrow for sin, confessing and forsaking it, Psalm xxxii, 5. Sanctification of the spirit in obedience to the will of God, 1 Pet. i, 3 and 22. 8. Witnessing of divine adoption by the Spirit, Rom. viii, 16; Gal. iv, 6. 9. Emancipation from the body to heavenly bliss, 2 Cor. v, 1—6. 10. Resurrection to eternal glory, John v, 29; 1 Cor. xv, 51—54.

Means of Grace, ordained by the Gospel.—1. Secret and family prayer, Matt. vi, 6; Jer. x, 25. 2. Self-examination, 1 Cor. xi, 28; 2 Cor. xiii, 5. 3. Reading the Holy Scriptures, Psalm i, 2; John v, 39. 4. Spiritual meditation, Psalm cxix, 97—99; Col. iii, 16. 5. Public worship, Psalm cxxii; Hebrews x, 25. 6. Commemorating Christ in the Lord's Supper, Luke xxii, 19—20; 1 Cor. xi, 23—28. 7. Religious conversation and social prayer, Malachi iii, 16; 1 Thessalonians v, 2; Acts xii, 12.

Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law, Psalm cxix, 18.

DAILY RESOLUTIONS.

By grace ye are saved, through faith, not of works, Eph. ii, 8, 9. We are his workmanship, created in Christ unto good works, verse 10. I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me, Phil. iv, 3. God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, Heb. vi, 10. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord—their works follow them, Rev. xiv, 13.

I. I will never lie down at night to rest without prayer; nor when I am in health, sleep longer than six, or at most eight hours.

II. I will never rise in the morning, to proceed to business, until I have first retired, at least for a few minutes, dedicating myself as an offering of thanks to God, and asking his blessing through Jesus Christ.

III. I will endeavour to preserve a constant disposition for prayer, relying upon the promise of God for his Holy Spirit.

IV. Knowing my own infirmities, I will take care not to magnify the faults of others; but to abstain from speaking of them, especially of those which mark my fellow Christians.

V. I will, with the Divine aid, accustom myself to do every thing in the name of Jesus Christ, and for his honour and glory.

VI. I will consider myself as bought with the precious blood of Christ, and seek to improve my soul in saving knowledge, and to preserve my body in health, that I may employ it, with all my property and powers, for his glory.

VII. I will, with the help of God, neither do nor undertake any thing of which I think that I shall repeat in the UNCERTAIN hour of my CERTAIN death.

VIII. Wherever I go, I will first pray to God, that I may commit no sin there, but be the means of doing some good to others.

XI. Every day will I read and study the word of God, as the means of salvation, and the rule of all my actions.

X. Every day will I be especially attentive to promote the spiritual interests of my own family in particular.

XI. I will take a conscientious interest in the cause of Christ as my Saviour, for the glory of his name in the salvation of men.

XII. Every evening will I examine my temper and conduct through the day by these rules, and labour in the strength of the Spirit of God, to correct my errors, and plead the blood of Christ for pardon.

"Thou, God, seest me," and knowest what I have resolved; enable me to read or repeat these Resolutions every morning with sincerity, and every evening with joy and an approving conscience.

LOVEST THOU ME?

"Lovest thou me?" I hear my Saviour say:
Oh! that my heart had power to answer Yea.
Thou knowest all things, Lord, in heaven above
And earth beneath; thou knowest that I love.
But 'tis not so in word, in deed, in thought:
I do not, cannot love Thee as I ought.
Thy love must give that power: Thy love alone:
There's nothing worthy of thee but thine own.
Lord, with the love wherewith Thou lovest me,
Shed in my heart abroad, would I love Thee.

THE WALDENSES.

It was about the middle of the twelfth century, and more than three hundred and fifty years before Luther's "Reformation," that Peter Waldo, a rich merchant of Lyons in France, set himself in opposition to the Roman Catholic apostacy. His followers, who were called Waldenses, probably from their connection with him, rapidly increased throughout various provinces in Europe; but the district most remarkable for the establishment of their worship was the valley of Piedmont, which skirts the base of the Alps and Pyrennees; there the word of the Lord went out at various times from among them, and there also, as well as elsewhere, to quote the words used a little while ago by one of their own ministers, the first thunderbolts of Rome were fulminated against them, and the baying of the blood-hounds of the Inquisition was heard, before we, Englishmen, knew even its name. The following account of what took place at Montalto in the year 1560, will serve as a specimen of the afflictions generally accomplished in their brethren. It was originally communicated in a letter to Ascanio Caraccioli from his servant, himself a Roman Catholic, and therefore not likely to overrate the crimes of the oppressor, or the virtues of the oppressed.

"Most illustrious Sir,—Having written you from time to time what has been done here in the affair of heresy, I have now to inform you of the dreadful justice which begau to be executed on these Lutherans* early this morning, being the 11th of June. And, to tell you the truth, I can compare it to nothing but the slaughter of so many sheep. They were all shut up in one house as in a sheep-fold. The executioner went, and bringing out one of them, covered his face with a napkin, or benda, as we call it, led him out to a field near the house, and causing him to kneel down, cut his throat with a knife. Then taking off the bloody napkin, he went and brought out another, whom he put to death after the same manner. In this way, the whole number, amounting to eighty-eight men, were butchered. I leave you to figure to yourself the lamentable spectacle; for I can scarcely refrain from tears while I write; nor was there any person, who, after witnessing the execution of one, could stand to look on a second. The meekness and patience with which they went to martyrdom and death were incredible. Some of them at their death professed themselves of the same faith with us, but the greater part died in their cursed obstinacy. All the old men met their death with cheerfulness, but the young exhibited symptoms of fear. I shudder while I think of the executioner, with the bloody knife in his teeth, the dripping napkin in his hand, and his arms besmeared with gore, going to the house, and taking out one after another, just as a butcher does the sheep which he means to kill. According to orders, waggons are already come to carry away the dead bodies, which are appointed to be quartered, and hung up on the public roads from one end of Calabria to the other. Unless his Holiness and the Viceroy of Naples command the Marquis de Buccianici, the governor of this province, to stay his hand and leave off, he will go on to put others to the torture, and multiply the executions until he has destroyed the whole. Even to day a decree has passed, that a hundred grown-up women shall be executed; so that we may be able to say, in well-sounding language, that so many persons were punished, partly men and partly women. Four other places in the kingdom of Naples are inhabited by the same race, but I do not know that they behave ill; for they are a simple unlettered people, entirely occupied with the spade and plough, and, I am told, show themselves sufficiently religious at the hour of death."

So far the quotation. Who can refrain from blushing, as he reads it, to think that the perpetrators of such atrocities were of the same form and substance with himself! Unhappy monsters! How vain as well as brutal was your rage! The flock which ye endeavoured to devour yet lives; poor and separated, it is true; but still worthy of the faith and firmness of their ancestors. Through the dreary lapse of centuries, the songs of Zion have never been quite hushed in Piedmont, and the 20,000 of her inhabitants are even now transmitting those principles to posterity, which shall reign and triumph in the earth when the throne of Babylon is demolished, and the fruits that her soul lusted after have departed for ever and ever!

FAREWELL.

A serpent 'mid a bed of flowers;
  A dark cloud in a summer sky;
A funeral knell in laughing hours;
  A tearful sound of agony.
Yes, pale-eyed Farewell, thou art this,
The witherer of human bliss!

The bitter dreg in Pleasure's cup,
  For, oh! though sweet the draught may be,
No sooner has Time drank it up,
  Then Farewell brings its poignancy.
But Time shall break its gloomy spell:
When he expires—adieu, Farewell!

Who has not felt thee, when a friend
  But feebly draws his dying breath,
When parting pangs the bosom rend,
  Farewell just whisp'ring forth from death.
From parent, brother, sister—Oh!
  It is too much—the heart will break—
'Tis speechless—yes, 'tis silent woe—
  'Tis grief that knows not how to speak.

But hark! I hear a heavenly voice
  Resounding from the vaulted sky;
It bids despairing hearts rejoice,
  And banish every farewell sigh.
It tells us of a happier home,
  Where roses bloom without decay;
Where bitter Farewell cannot come;
  Where all is everlasting day.
A peaceful, a celestial fold,
  Where friends will meet, and no more sever;
Bought with a dearer price than gold,
  Bought with His blood who reigns for ever!

ODE TO PITY.

Each sacred drop, a beauteous gem
  Falls soft from Pity's eye;
And dearer is the liquid pearl
  Than all that mines could buy.

Warm on the heart by sorrow chill'd
  Descends the vital dew,
And every sable cloud of grief
  Assumes a milder hue.

Refreshing as the tears of Heaven
  That wake the drooping flower,
The grateful heart the balm receives,
  And hails the genial shower.

ATTAINMENTS OF THE LATE DR. A. CLARKE.

Our limits would not allow us to give a Memoir worthy of the late Dr. Adam Clarke: and as we knew that due honour would be granted to him in various periodicals, we were content to postpone our nötice of that great man.

Considering his disadvantages in early life, and his early introduction to the Methodist ministry in his nineteenth year, his attainments must be regarded as extraordinary. "At an early age," as himself informs us, he took for his motto, "Through desire, a man, having separated himself, seeketh and intermeddleth with all wisdom" Prov. xviii, 1. This was a motto worthy of the adoption of the man who determined to become a scholar; and the success of Dr. Clarke in his studies remarkably exemplified and illustrated the sentiment of that passage. His acquirements in oriental learning have been characterized as "stupendous;" and his persevering industry is manifest in his "Concise View of the succession of sacred literature, in a chronological arrangement of authors and their works, from the formation of alphabetical characters to the year of our Lord 345," one vol. 12mo.; and his "Commentary on the Bible," in eight volumes 4to. Of this great work the Rev. Mr. Horne, in his invaluble "Introduction to the critical Study of the Scriptures," says, "the literary world in general, and biblical students in particular, are greatly indebted to Dr. Clarke for the light he has thrown on many very difficult passages."

Our object in this brief notice of that excellent and learned minister of Jesus Christ, is to render honour to the memory of a man so great and good; and especially to commend his example to our young friends, as a persevering, successful scholar, whose attainments were the fruit of his own diligent application.

Some of the friends of the Methodist connection, we perceive, are speaking with a degree of despondency, as if, with Dr. Clarke, "their glory had departed:" but with all respect for the talents and learning of that venerable man, we are persuaded that they have his superior by far, if not as a scholar and Biblical critic, yet as a Theologian, in the person of the estimable Richard Watson.

Dr. Adam Clarke on the Book of Genesis.

We cannot always agree with Dr. Clarke in his criticisms on the various parts of the Book of Genesis; but we admire the beautiful simplicity of his address to his reader, at the close of that wonderful portion of the divine word.

"Reader, thou hast now before thee the most ancient and the most authentic history in the world: a history that contains the first written discovery that God has made of himself to mankind: a discovery of his own being in his wisdom, power, and goodness, in which thou and the whole human race are so intimately concerned. How much thou art indebted to him for this discovery he alone can teach thee, and cause thy heart to feel its obligations to his wisdom and mercy. God made thee and the universe, and governs all things according to the counsel of his own will. While under the direction of this counsel thou canst not err; while under the influence of this will thou canst not be wretched. Give thyself up to his teaching, and submit to his authority; and after guiding thee here by his counsel, he will at last bring thee to glory."

"Hazard not thyself in the shadow of corruption," is one of the authoritative injunctions of that deep thinker and great philosophical reasoner, Sir Thomas Browne.

A DOVE ON THE CHURCH PULPIT.

On a dove, flying into a village church, and alighting on the pulpit just as the Clergyman was announcing a Sermon to be preached in aid of Missions.

Welcome, soft messenger of peace!
Let faith and hope the omen hail;
The moral deluge soon shall cease,
And truth, eternal rock, prevail.

'Twas thine with new-born hopes to fill
The sad survivors of a world;
And Fancy 'mid thy plumage still
Sees the bright arch of heaven unfurl'd.

Shrouded in thee from mortal sight,
The Spirit hallow'd Jordan's tide,
When with the sinner's healing rite
The sinless Son of God complied.

'Twas on thy rushing pinions sped,
The same all-conqu'ring Spirit came,
When wondering thousands saw with dread
The mystic tongues of living flame.

Who then shall blame, if Fancy seize
A presage hallow'd by the sky,
When, wafted on the joyous breeze,
The Spirit's type thus meets her eye?

She marks it, with confiding wing,
Settle on Truth's immortal shrine;
While hosts unseen of angels sing,
"The nations, Lord, shall yet be thine."

A HINT FOR MEN IN BUSINESS.

"I endeavour," says the late Dr. Fothergill, in a letter to one of his friends, "to follow my business, because it is my duty rather than my interest; the latter is inseparable from a just discharge of duty; but I have ever looked at the profits in the last place. At my first setting out I wished most fervently, and I endeavour after it still, to do my business with all the diligence I could, as a present duty, and to repress every rising idea of its consequences; knowing that there was a hand which could easily overthow every pursuit of this kind, and baffle every attempt either to acquire wealth or fame."—Lettsom's Life of Dr. Fothergill.

"BE JUST, AND FEAR NOT."

In the cathedral of Christ Church, in Dublin, is a tablet to the memory of "James Viscount Lifford, late Lord Chancellor of Ireland," who died in 1789, aged 73 years, with the following inscription:

"The unanimous sense of a grateful nation is the best testimony of the unblemished integrity with which, for a space of twenty-two years, he filled his high and important station; ever firmly adhering to the maxim he had originally assumed as the guide of his judicial decisions—'Be just, and fear not.'"

WHITFIELD'S CHAPEL, TOTTENHAM COURT ROAD, LONDON.

TOTTENHAM COURT CHAPEL.

ce we presented our readers with a Biographical ch of the Rev. George Whitfield, M A., in No. XI he "Christian's Penny Magazine," with a cut of celebrated TABERNACLE, we have been importuned give a cut of his large chapel in Tottenham Court d. This we are now enabled to do, with a few ices of its history.

n 1755, a lease was granted, by Captain Charles roy, of the family of lord Southampton, of a plot ground, near the "Field of Forty Footsteps*," and Lavenden Mills, in Coyes Garden, in the Totten- Road, for the term of 72 years, to the Rev. George itfield, M. A. Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford, the purpose of the erection of a chapel. The de- was drawn by himself, and begun in May 1756, finished so as to be opened November 7, in the e year. At the close of the year 1759, it was enlarged, by adding an octangular front, which gave it the appearance of two chapels.

This chapel is believed to be the largest place of worship in the kingdom, not immediately connected with the established church: its length is 126 feet; its breadth 76 feet; and its height to the crown of the dome and pinnacle 112 feet. The interior of the chapel is very neat; the roof is supported by 12 columns with caps; and in the centre is a large cupola, which serves as a ventilator: it is well constructed for hearing; and a moderate voice may be heard in every part of the building. This chapel will seat between 4,000 and 5,000 persons, and a great part of the accommodation is free for the poor. An extensive burial ground is attached to the chapel, with commodious catacombs, and vast numbers of pious persons have deposited the mortal remains of their departed friends in that enclosure.

The walls of Tottenham Court Chapel are ornamented with monumental tablets, in memory of our pious forefathers; among which, are those of the Rev. George Whitfield, M.A. its founder, and Elizabeth his wife; the Rev. Augustus Toplady, B. A. late of Trinity College, Dublin; Mrs. Mary Waring, a very beautiful tablet; and one to Miss Ann Cecilia Rhodes, of Chatham, Kent. One also to John Bacon, Esq., R. A. sculptor, with the following inscription written by himself:—

---

* An Historical Melo-Drama, entitled "The Field of Forty tsteps," founded on an event in the families of De Vere and chlove, in the time of the Commonwealth. The London versity is built on part of this field, at the end of Gower et.

What I was as an Artist,
Seemed to me of some importance
While I lived:
but
What I really was as a Believer,
Is the only thing of importance to me now.

Whitfield's lease of this chapel expired in 1828, and the place of worship was closed until 1831, when the freehold was purchased. At a meeting of the "Trustees and Provisional Committee," held Sept. 16, 1831, it was reported by them, that, "after much negociation and suspense, the chapel and burial ground, originally held by the Rev. George Whitfield, under a lease which had expired, and could not be renewed, had now been permanently purchased for 14,000*l.*, and conveyed, with the Tabernacle, for the benefit of the congregation and public, to fourteen trustees. That the chapel had been improved, and would be completely repaired and reopened for public worship on Thursday, Oct. 27, when it was hoped that the Rev. Rowland Hill, A. M. would preach in the morning, and in the evening the Rev. James Parsons of York. They also announced, that, when re-opened, the worship would be conducted with the forms previously used, and that they had continued to reserve several hundred free sittings for the accommodation of strangers and the poor. But they also announced, that the costs of the repairs and improvements would, with the purchase and incidental expenses, amount nearly to 20,000*l.*; and that, after appropriating towards that sum a congregational fund of 5,000*l.*, there would remain to be paid about 15,000*l.* for which there were no resources but in that Christian liberality, which they trusted the members of the connection, and the friends of religion throughout the empire, would kindly display."

It was also reported, that 3,300*l.* had already been subscribed by individual members of the Tabernacle and Tottenham Court congregations, and various friends.

On the 27th day of October 1831, the joyful event of the re-opening of this chapel took place; when, after the services in the church of England Liturgy had been read, the Rev. William Jay, of Bath, preached in the morning, from Rev. xxi, 22; and the Rev. James Parsons, of York, in the evening, from Jer. x, 3. Though the weather was unfavourable, the congregations were large, and the collections amounted to 262*l.*

Genuine religion has been eminently promoted by many of the services of a succession of the most eminent preachers, in this chapel; and we recollect having read reported from the congregation at Tottenham Court Chapel, about 500*l.* per annum contributed to the London Missionary Society: besides the generous support of very large Sunday Schools, and many benevolent institutions. May the Holy Spirit be poured forth, in all his rich gifts and graces, upon the pastor, and upon the congregation at this place; and may the ministry of the Gospel of Christ, by the occasional supplies, at Tottenham Court Chapel, be crowned with His efficient benediction, in the conversion of thousands of souls to God!

DR. PECKWELL PREACHING HIS OWN FUNERAL SERMON.

In the year 1787, in the month of August, a very singular incident took place in Tottenham Court Chapel:—a minister preaching his own funeral sermon. This was the Rev. Henry Peckwell, D. D. rector of Bloxham-cum-Digby, Lincolnshire. The occasion which led to this very affecting circumstance deserves notice. Dr. Peckwell studied medicine and anatomy, that he might be more useful in his cure, visiting the sick and poor: but while opening the body of a young person, who had died of a putrid fever, he wounded one of his fingers with a needle, which proved fatal by mortification on the tenth day! Faith in the atonement and righteousness of Christ enabled him to triumph over death and the grave! Dr. Peckwell was the founder of the charity called "The Sick Man's Friend."

DR. DODD PREACHING HIS OWN FUNERAL SERMON.

Besides Dr. Peckwell, we recollect having heard of no other preaching his own funeral sermon, except the unfortunate Dr. Dodd. This unhappy clergyman was a popular preacher in the British metropolis. His connection with the great, occasioned his extravagance, which led him to forge the name of his patron, Lord Chesterfield, to a bond for 4,200*l.*, the fraud of which being discovered, he was tried and condemned in Feb. 1777. Great interest was made to procure the mitigation of punishment to save his life, but in vain: he was executed at Tyburn, June 27, 1777, after having preached his own funeral sermon in Newgate.

There is every reason to believe Dr. Dodd died a true penitent, from his "Prison Thoughts," published after his death.

STATISTICS OF MIDDLESEX.

MIDDLESEX is almost the smallest county in England: but as it comprehends the two vast cities of LONDON and WESTMINSTER, it is the most populous, and by far the most wealthy. It is divided into 602 liberties, containing 200 parishes. Exclusive of the divisions in London and Westminster, and the Tower Hamlets, it is divided into 6 hundreds, and 98 parishes. It contains, besides the two cities, seven market towns, and BRENTFORD is considered the county town.

Middlesex derives its name from its situation amidst the three kingdoms of the East, West, and South Saxons. It is bounded on the North by Hertfordshire; on the South by the river Thames, which separates it from Surrey; on the West by the Colne, which divides it from Buckinghamshire; and on the East by the Lea, which separates it from Essex. Middlesex is about 24 miles long, from East to West; and 18 broad, from North to South. The air is very pleasant and healthy, to which a fine soil of gravel and loam greatly contributes. It produces plenty of corn, and the county abounds with fertile meadows and gardens. The greater part of the county is so prodigiously assisted by the rich compost from London, that the whole of the cultivated part is like a garden. The natural productions are cattle, corn, and fruit; and almost every manufacture established in Great Britain is found in this county. By Mr. Baird's report to the Board of Agriculture, in 1793, Middlesex contains "about 250,000 acres; of which 130,000 are in meadow and pasture; 50,000 in nursery, gardens, and pleasure grounds; 50,000 in tillage; and about 20,000 in commons," by which "the public loses about 200,000*l.* per annum." Since that period however much of the "commons" has been enclosed and cultivated. In the immediate vicinity of London, 10,000 acres are cultivated as kitchen gardens, a fourth part of which is in Middlesex. The average annual produce per acre, amounts in value to 200*l.*, 120*l.* of which is calculated profit.

Middlesex is not remarkable for picturesque beauty. It presents in general a gently waving surface, with considerable inequalities in some places, and extensive levels in others. From the Thames towards the north, the ground rises into eminences, Hampstead, Highgate, Muswell Hill, and others, which protect the metropolis from the northern blasts, and break the uniformity of the horizon. These heights afford many most delightful prospects.

Middlesex has about doubled its population during the last century, as will be seen by the following statement:—

In 1700 its inhabitants were	624,200
In 1750	641,500
In 1801	818,129
In 1811	953,276
In 1821	1,244,531
In 1831	1,358,541

SIR JOHN MASON.

Sir John Mason, in the reign of Edward the Sixth, being near his dissolution, and sensible he had but a short time to live, upon his death-bed called for his clerk and steward, and delivered himself to this purpose: "I have seen five princes, and have been privy counsellor to four: I have seen the most remarkable observables in foreign parts, and been present at most state transactions for thirty years together; and I have learned this, after so many years' experience:—that seriousness is the greatest wisdom, temperance the best physic, a good conscience the best estate; and were I to live again, I would change the court for a cloister, my privy counsellor's bustle for an hermit's retirement, and the whole life I have lived in the palace for one hour's enjoyment of God in the chapel." He concluded with saying, "All things else do now forsake me, besides my God, my duty, and my prayers."

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ENOCH.

The Character of Enoch.

Enoch has been commended to our admiration in a singular manner in an inspired encomium; short indeed, but the most honourable that could have been given to a human being;—"Enoch walked with God."

The accounts in the Scriptures of the pious patriarchs are most truly interesting; sufficient indeed to establish and satisfy our faith: but while we peruse the memorials of their invigorating belief in the promises of God, and their sincere obedience to his blessed will, we cannot but feel some regret that we know so little of their various excellencies.

The name of Enoch, the manner in which he was dedicated to God, and the circumstances in which he was placed among the patriarchs, lead us to expect in him an extraordinary character. He had the advantage of the long experience of Adam, which had been enriched by a large measure of divine inspiration, and by which he could not fail to be instructed.

It is affirmed by an ancient author, that Enoch was the father of Astrology, or rather Astronomy; and by Eusebius, a Christian historian of the fourth century, it is concluded that he is the same as the Greeks call Atlas, in their mythology. Certainly there is great reason to believe, that many of their fabulous divinities are only the Scripture patriarchs, whose history is grossly corrupted. But whatever the attainments of Enoch might be in knowledge, his lasting fame rests upon a basis far more solid and enduring than his real or supposed skill in the science of Astronomy.

That divine science is sublime and useful, and worthy of the study of mankind. It enlarges the understanding, and fills the mind with reverence for the Almighty Creator of the universe: yet the most profound acquaintance with the heavenly luminaries, is far less valuable to a sinful creature, than a knowledge of that revealed truth, which prepares the soul for the enjoyment of God, and makes its possessor wise unto salvation.

If a man were able to call all the stars by their names, when he beheld them,—to ascertain their amazing distances,—to determine their wondrous magnitudes and motions with the nicest accuracy;—could he enumerate all the plants of the earth, from the majestic forest oak to the minutest moss springing out upon the wall, class their different orders, and describe their medicinal virtues,—were he intimately acquainted with all the various tribes of animals, and the properties of minerals; and besides the most accurate familiarity with universal history and all the affairs of human life;—yet with all this treasure of useful knowledge, he might b estill ignorant of the value of his never-dying soul, having no acquaintance with the things that belong to his everlasting peace, nor enjoyment of fellowship with God as his Saviour. Were he able even to trace the footsteps of the Almighty in all the marvellous works of creation and providence, still, without repentance for sin, his qualifications would be far inferior to those recorded of Enoch, and his character incomparably beneath it. It could not be said of him, like that patriarch, by faith in the revealed Messiah "he walked with God."

Moses, with the instructive simplicity of divine inspiration, comprises the character of Enoch in one short observation, "And Enoch walked with God," Gen. v, 22. The apostle remarkes with equal beauty of language, expressive of his whole character; "He had this testimony, that he pleased God." Heb. xi. 4. In the former part of the verse, he directs us to the vital spring of Enoch's religion, obedience, and holy walking in that faith which he exercised in the revelation of Divine mercy.

In these passages Enoch is exhibited to us as the "friend of God" himself, like as Abraham in after-ages was acknowledged by Jehovah," Isai. xli, 8.

Whether Enoch were sanctified from his infancy or youth, or whether he became a monument of sovereign mercy in advanced life, we are not informed; but he seems to have served the LORD from his early years; for after the birth of his son Methuselah it is said, "he walked with God three hundred years;" before which he must have been comparatively a very young man.

"Enoch walked with God,"—"he pleased God." These are the most beautiful expressions of which language is capable, to denote a course of lively faith, of holy obedience, and of unspeakable happiness. He was truly religious,—eminent for his self-consecration to God, and active in zeal for his service. The doctrines of divine revelation were precious to his soul; and no less delightful were the precepts and requirements which had been enjoined by his gracious God. He "set the LORD always before him." He contemplated his omniscience and mercy; and felt the power of the apostle's direction, "whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."

How opposite is the character of infidels! They are "enemies in their minds by wicked works." How contrary the habits of the careless and ungodly! They walk "according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience:" they have "no hope, and are without God in the world." Eph. ii, 2, 12. They are, indeed, in the language of the Scripture, "fools," seeking death in the error of their ways; and in their hearts, and by their conduct, they say unto God, "depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." Job xxi, 14.

By the knowledge of God and the influence of his fear, the mind is impressed with an abiding sense of the Divine Majesty being ever present,—with confidence in the riches of his mercy, and with delight in his boundless goodness. Genuine piety opens and preserves intercourse between God and the soul, and produces a prevailing desire to please him. Thus it was with Enoch: possessing right principles, their natural fruit was an upright and holy conduct, as in the presence of God.

It is a maxim of the Scriptures, that "two cannot walk together, except they be agreed;" and a man cannot "walk with God," unless he be agreed with him. The holiness of the Divine law, and its spiritual requirements,—the humiliating methods of sovereign grace in the salvation of sinners, and the necessity of personal and entire resignation to the will of God, are all utterly offensive to wicked men. But on all these subjects, Enoch's mind was one with God.

Enoch was not satisfied with mere formality in religion, or with a general profession of his belief in the existence and providence of God: his soul was influenced with love to the gracious Author of his being, and a devout sense of the Divine presence occupied his renewed mind. He was constantly careful to govern his thoughts, his words, and his actions, in conformity with the holy law of God, in which, as the apostle professes, he "delighted after the inner man." His morning vows ascended to the throne of the heavenly grace, his busy hours were employed for the welfare of mankind, and the day was closed with grateful thanksgivings to the Father of mercies, the God of his salvation. Nor was he religious only in unencumbered life; "Enoch walked with God" after he became the father of a numerous family, and felt the burthen of its duties and cares.

A striking feature in the character of Enoch was, "he pleased God." It was his habitual endeavour, his settled purpose to please him. "But without faith it is impossible to please him: for "he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Heb. xi, 6. By the exercises of faith in the revealed purposes and merciful promises of God he pleased him. For nothing honours God more than believing him; it is giving credit to the revelation that he has made of himself, as the God of grace and salvation by the mediation of his Son Jesus Christ.

Enoch pleased God, by a diligent observance of the divine ordinances. He kept holy the Sabbath day. On that weekly festival, he united with "the sons of God," who called on the name of the LORD; and commemorated, with adoring gratitude, the wondrous work of God in creation, and his sovereign kindness in consecrating the day of rest for anxious and labouring man. He observed the appointed sacrifices. Like Abel, "at the end of the day," in the accustomed season, he offered the prescribed atonement; and while confessing his sins, and the sins of the people, he looked beyond the victim upon the altar, to "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

All the Divine precepts were respected by Enoch; and "he pleased God" by imploring "the Spirit of grace" to enable him to run in the way of God's commandments.

Do our readers, especially the young, perceive in their principles and habits a likeness to Enoch? Do they walk with God? Do they strive to please God? Do they believe his glorious Gospel? Do they trust in his dear Son? Do they thus put honour upon God in his word? Do they "believe with the heart unto righteousness?" O let them be instructed by the inspired testimony to the character of this holy man of God, and walk in his worthy footsteps! Let them receive, as Enoch did, the engrafted word of God, especially as we are far more fully favoured with it in the Scriptures, which are designed, as they are able, to make us wise unto salvation. May each one habitually say,

"O that I may walk with God!
Jesus my companion be,
Lead me to thy blest abode,
Through the fire or through the sea."

Enoch had this testimony, "that he pleased God." We are not informed in what manner it was testified to Enoch that he pleased God. It is very likely that he was favoured with some extraordinary token of the Divine regard, besides "the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost given unto him." Rom. v, 5. Nevertheless, this would have been sufficient and satisfactory, even when visible signs were not particularly afforded. And thus shall our young friends be blessed in their walking with God, and seeking to please him. The delightful experience described by the apostle will be their happy portion. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." They "receive the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father." "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."

This happiness is promised only to those who are circumspect and active in their obedience, living by faith on the Son of God. "How sinful their remissness, who are satisfied without it! How awful their delusion, who expect or pretend to it, in any allowed habits of wickedness!" O that this rich, this imperishable treasure may be possessed in the minds of all our young friends, to form their characters, and to prepare them for eternal glory!

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER III.

Dear Madam,

The general principle of the sympathy between the mind and the body, mentioned in my last, being admitted, I shall now proceed to remind you of a few instances of its practical detail, and then dismiss the subject.

1. The general rules for the preservation of health, and the increase of bodily strength, should be the guide of your daily treatment of your child. These, though invaluable in their tendency, are few, simple, and so fully agreed upon by medical writers, as to have become familiarly known to all.

2. There are however certain points, which, though not immediately connected with the subject, are of sufficient importance to be distinctly noticed: one of these is, that he should be laid to repose and awaked from it at the same hour, and as nearly as possible at the same time. The hour itself must of course depend upon other domestic arrangements, but it is of the greatest importance that it should be early, both in the evening and the morning. The benefit of this direction is, that it tends to promote a habit of going to bed early and of early rising. I am indebted to the suggestion of an able writer, that to the want of attention to this rule in infancy may be ascribed that disinclination to early repose and early rising, which multitudes have never been able to conquer throughout life, although conscious of the detriment produced by it upon their health, success in life, and general happiness.

3. I need hardly remind you how essential to health are the purity and free circulation of the atmosphere in the chamber wherein any one sleeps, but especially an infant. Upon the purity of the air the blood depends for its proper constituents; upon the purity of the blood the body depends for its strength and development; upon the strength of the body the mind depends for its cheerfulness and ability.

4. The custom so prevalent, of darkening a chamber by shutters, and of surrounding beds with curtains, and especially the cradles of infants, is injurious to the health, not merely owing to the causes last specified, but to the eyesight. Where the light is almost entirely excluded, and then the shutters opened nearly at once, the pain and violence suffered by the eyes would seem naturally to discourage the custom. The use of curtains is less injurious: the disuse of them, especially around the bed or cradle, has often been recommended by physicians. One good effect of the advice would be, that the eye would gradually become stronger by being accustomed to the light, shaded by the eyelid, even while closed in sleep; and, above all other reasons, the increasing light, especially in a spring or summer morning, would naturally awaken him, and conduce to the habit of early activity, which is of incalculable importance.

How beautiful in every respect is the description of this circumstance in those lovely lines of the poet Gray upon a Distant View of Eton College, and in which, referring to the habits of early youth, he speaks of > "The spirits pure, the slumbers light,

> That fly th' approach of morn!"

5. The open air and the influence of the sun I believe to have considerable effect upon the health and spirits of young children. If the clothing of an infant be dry and warm, even the air of a clear frosty day need not be dreaded.

6. You will soon perceive the development of mental and bodily activity, and with ineffable delight will contemplate the dawn of those faculties and powers, upon the right direction of which his future happiness throughout his entire existence will depend. They will probably indeed have dawned so imperceptibly as even to surprise the watchful eye of a mother herself. Like those who watch for the morning, and a few minutes before look out, and all still appears in darkness, and having had their attention diverted for a short time, look out again, and perceive that it is not only come, but has considerably advanced over the horizon. Oh! now your attention should be more than ever directed to the continued application of those rules on which you have already acted, to train and draw out his expanding faculties.

7. Still less, if possible, than ever, suffer any one to speak to him in a loud tone, to treat him as a plaything, or to talk nonsense by way of amusing him. The faculties of all children would expand sooner, if they met with treatment calculated to develop them; instead of which, the treatment now prohibited seems precisely calculated to retard and deform their minds. Let him be spoken to as if he were an intelligent being. He can at least understand the tone, if not the words. The tone itself will assist expanding intelligence.

8. Nevertheless, let habits of activity be encouraged. Next to yourself, the best nurse and the best attendant of a child is a sister, a few years only older than himself. The mental states of both of them, and the modes of natural development resemble each other. They can understand one another better than even himself and his mother; for she has long ago practically forgotten how a child thinks, and perceives, and learns. I have often noticed, that a sister in such circumstances can make an infant comprehend much better than the mother. Happy the young child that has such a playmate! Let them play and laugh together. Let them amuse each other in the garden whenever they can, and on the carpet when this is impracticable. The infant will indeed amuse himself, if you give him some glittering object which he cannot injure, and with which he cannot injure himself. Do not, however, suspend any thing of the kind around his person. When held in the arms of another, let it be given to him, and let him drop it, and let it be picked up again and put into his hand again and again. He is thus learning a valuable lesson: he is learning nothing less than the law of gravitation, which will perpetually operate upon every thing around him throughout his life.

9. As he advances—for while I am on the subject, I will give you my ideas as applicable to him for many years to come—as he advances, let it be your perpetual occupation to teach him the qualities of that external world upon which he has entered. I utterly disapprove of all toys, except those which illustrate some truth, or the use of some machine, such as a printing press, &c. These will only be of use in years to come. If you will make use of flowers and animals, or inanimate objects, to which to direct his attention, you will have no need of toys, which a child can never comprehend, and which would injure his understanding if he could, since they are generally mere burlesque imitations of nature. Let him learn nature. Let all your attention at this time be directed to his senses, in teaching him to discriminate the qualities of external objects: exercise his sight, his hearing, his feeling. If children must have brilliant colours for their amusement, let them be those of flowers, not the paint of a toy, which, to say the least, he will be likely to apply to his mouth. As he advances (for the nature of my observations will show you the time of his life I have in view), let a real landscape rather than a tawdry picture be chosen for a similar purpose. Let his attention be daily directed to such objects for the next five years, and deem this time, and even a year or two beyond, duly improved, if you have exercised his senses and taught him the qualities of external objects. These impressions upon the senses are the origin of all our ideas: of what importance is it that pains should be taken to secure the early and correct apprehension of them! Teach him these, and his mind will develop itself. Have but one other object during this whole period, the cultivation of his health, the establishment of his bodily strength and bodily activity, and regularity in his hours of retiring to rest and awakening from it. From the period of five to fifteen, the same general methods respecting health and exercise should be diligently pursued, till the states of body at which they aim are completely established.

Let no diminution of his daily exercise be caused by any consideration whatever: and if he has to walk to school from your house over a healthy road a distance of four miles and back every day, from the time he begins to go to school till he is eighteen years old, it will be a happy circumstance for him, in my apprehension. At different periods of life in which they are suitable, let every opportunity be made for his playing with other boys at every robust game and engaging in every manly exercise which were invented and practised by our hardy forefathers. Let there be two objections only to any of these exercises; namely, whether in their general nature they are dangerous to himself, or are ever in the slightest degree calculated to give pain to any other being. As early as possible give him a large piece of ground in your garden, to cultivate with his own hands. Let part of it be devoted to flowers, and part to vegetables and fruits. Interest him, if possible, in its appearance; praise it when you can, and make him feel the genuine value of the occupation. At as early an age as consistent let him be taught to swim, and to row a boat. Be glad if you find him fond of activity, always ready to walk or to ride. In a word, under the guidance of the two rules above mentioned, let him pursue every kind of exercise to which he is inclined, every kind of amusement in the open air, the more intelligent of course the better. All this is unquestionably to be understood in the degree which is consistent with the due attention to mental culture, respecting which I hope to give my sentiments in a future Letter. In a word, be assured, that the habits of early rising, delight in the open air, and tendency to bodily activity, promote health, which is the chief ingredient in earthly happiness; strength of body, which is the origin of strength of mind; long life, which as a lengthened space of usefulness if accompanied with health is an inestimable blessing; and be not surprised if I add to the list of advantages, by assigning that of morality itself: for it is well known, that they who are most addicted to exercise in the open air, and are most cordially prone all their life long to bodily exertions, are generally better tempered, more candid, ingenuous, generous, and in all respects nobler-minded, than the sluggish and inactive, who are very often irresolute, useless, timid, and not unfrequently sensual and dark-minded.

Furnish him with these habits and qualities, and they will attend and bless him throughout life; he will perceive their value, and both naturally and as a matter of principle communicate them to his children, and they from the same causes to theirs; and you may confidently hope to render him the head of a vast, healthy, and happy posterity.

Dear Madam, your, &c.

CLERICUS.

"On some turnpikes these words are inscribed, 'No Trust here:' may not this be said of the believer's heart?"—Toplady.

THE TWO ALTARS.—HEB. XI, 4.

Behold two altars rais'd
On yon delightful plain;
Th' ascending fires have blaz'd;
On one a victim slain
Is bleeding, as the sun, withdrawn,
Retires on western hills to dawn.

But 'mid th' increasing gloom,
A heavenly flame is seen
Those ashes to consume,
As they had never been;
Which proves that God does not despise
This, His appointed sacrifice.

But darker grows the gloom
The other altar round;
No fire does that consume,
No victim there is found;
But only wither'd fruits and flowers,
Gather'd from blooming Eastern bowers.

What light can now be given,
This mystery to unfold?
Why should approving Heaven
The flowing blood behold?—
Accept?—but cast a threat'ning shade
O'er the sweet flowers Himself had made?

His Spirit has explain'd,
And reconcil'd the fact:—
By Faith was this attain'd;
And by this single act,
Abel a welcome offering brought,
While that of Cain He counted nought.

Faith in the promise, made
To Adam by the Lord,
"His seed shall bruise thy head!"
This was the mighty Word!—
The Saviour!—whose atoning blood
Has reconcil'd a world to God.

By this he speaks, though dead,
And will to distant time:
"Bruis'd is the serpent's head!"
Shall sound from clime to clime,
Until the Lord himself shall come
To call his ransom'd people home.

INFANTICIDE.

WE are generally accustomed to associate this horrible practice with our ideas of heathenism in its most barbarian provinces: but an acquaintance with the real state of things will prove, that the devotees of idolatry, however distinguished their attainments, all come under one denunciation, "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." When Mr. Medhurst resided in Penang, a Chinese came to him for medicine, who said he had three sons and one daughter, adding, "I had another daughter, but I did not bring her up." "Not bring her up! what then did you do with her?" "I smothered her; and this year I heard by letter that another daughter was born;—I sent word to have that smothered also, but the mother has preserved it alive." Mr. Medhurst, shocked at this speech, and still more at the horrid indifference with which it was uttered, exclaimed, "What! murder your own children? Do you not shudder at such an act?" "Oh, no!" replied the man, "it is a very common thing in China; we put the female children out of the way, to save the trouble of bringing them up: some people have smothered five or six daughters!"

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.—No. III.

ASSURANCE.

Much perplexity is felt by sincere Christians on the subject of Assurance. They read of it, they hear of it, and they have no doubt but many of the people of God possess it, rejoicing in its divine consolations: it cannot, therefore, but be ardently and anxiously desired. There is, however, much misapprehension and misconception on this subject, in the minds of many, especially in relation to the doctrine, as contained in the Holy Scriptures.

Assurance is the firm persuasion of the reality of any thing; or the certain expectation of a future good. God "hath given to all men assurance of a day of judgment, in that he hath raised Christ from the dead." Acts xvii, 31. "Thou shalt have none assurance of thy life." Deut. xxviii, 66.

"Full assurance of faith," Heb. x, 22, does not relate to our undoubting personal interest in the blessings of redemption by Christ; but to the truth of God's revealed will in the gospel, and to the office of Christ as our High Priest with God: it is a perfectly satisfactory persuasion of the divinity of the gospel revelation. In this "full assurance of faith," Christians are privileged to draw nigh to God, as their heavenly Father.

"Full assurance of understanding," Col. ii, 2, is a matured and comprehensive knowledge of the Divine economy of redeeming grace through the mediation of Jesus Christ, and made known to us in the gospel. While some believers are babes in evangelical knowledge, others are advanced and become "young men," and "fathers," whose minds are filled and stored with the word of God, by the blessing of the Holy Spirit, "unto the riches of the full assurance of the understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ."

"Full assurance of hope," Heb. vi, 11, relates to the glorious inheritance of heaven; it is an undoubted persuasion, that God will graciously grant the fulfilment of his promises in Christ, in the possession of a blissful immortality. From this and many other passages of Scripture it is manifest, that such a happy state of mind has been attained, and that it is now attainable by Christians.

Some divines have maintained, and the excellent Mr. Hervey was of that number, that assurance of salvation is included in the very essence of faith; so that we cannot possess faith without assurance of interest in Christ. Faith in Christ most certainly includes the assurance that he is the Saviour of men: but it does not necessarily imply assurance of personal interest in his redemption. Saving faith may be weak, and may be possessed by young believers long before they arrive at that high degree of satisfaction of which we are speaking. Confounding assurance with faith, has been the cause of daring presumption in some professors, and of gloomy despondency in others. If men are taught that faith consists in believing that Christ died for them, and that believing so they are consequently pardoned and justified, the consequences will be as they have been, that the bold and self-sufficient will flatter their uncontrite souls with such a persuasion to their delusion or perdition; while the truly humble, and those who are "poor in spirit," not being able to work themselves to that high pitch of confidence, will yield to the temptation that they have not "the faith of God's elect," and that therefore they shall perish!

The eloquent Saurin observes, "We do not affirm that Christians, of whose sincerity there may be some doubt, have a right to assurance; that backsliders, as such, ought to persuade themselves that they shall be saved; nor do we say that Christians who have arrived at the highest degree of holiness can be persuaded of the certainty of their salvation in every period of their lives; nor, if left to their own efforts, can they enjoy it: but believers, supported by the Divine aid, who walk in all good conscience before him, these only have grounds to expect this privilege."

Dr. Owen, speaking of the work of the Holy Spirit as a Comforter, sealing the souls of believers to the day of redemption, says—"This is that whereby he giveth believers assurance of their relation unto him, of their interest in him, and of his love and favour to them. It hath generally been conceived, that this sealing with the Spirit is that which gives assurance unto believers: and so indeed it doth, although the way whereby it doth it, hath not been rightly apprehended. And, therefore, none have been able to declare the especial nature of that act of the Spirit whereby he seals us, whence such assurance should ensue. But it is indeed not any act of the Spirit in us that is the ground of our assurance, but the communication of the Spirit unto us. This the apostle plainly testifieth, 1 John iii, 24, 'Hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us.' That God abideth in us and we in him, is the subject matter of our assurance: this we know, saith the apostle; which expresseth the highest assurance we are capable of in this world. And how do we know it? Even by the Spirit which he hath given unto us. But it may be, the sense of these words may be, that the Spirit which God gives us doth, by some special work of his, effect this assurance in us; and so it is not his being given unto us, but some special work of his in us, that is the ground of our assurance, and consequently our sealing. I do not deny such an especial work of the Spirit, as shall hereafter be declared; but I judge that it is the communication of the Spirit himself unto us that is here intended. For so the apostle declares his sense to be; chap. iv, 13, 'Hereby know we that we dwell in God, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit.' This is the great evidence, the great ground of assurance which we have, that God hath taken us into a near and dear relation unto himself, because he hath given us of his Spirit; that great and heavenly gift which he will impart to no others. If the Spirit of God dwell in us, we are his; 'but if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his;' Rom. viii, 9. Hereon alone depends the determination of our especial relation unto God. By this, therefore, doth God seal believers; and therein gives them assurance of his love. And this is to be the sole rule of your self-examination, whether or not you are sealed of God."

Imploring the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, let our pious readers, "in making their calling and election sure," endeavour to possess "the full assurance of faith;" and being assured of the divinity of the gospel of Christ, let them seek the "full assurance of understanding;" that possessing enlargement of soul in discovering the grandeur of the scheme of redemption, they may habitually, even in the world, rejoice in "the full assurance of hope" of glory everlasting!

THE THREE QUESTIONS.

Bernard's three questions are worth the asking ourselves, in any enterprize:—1. Is it lawful? May I do it, and not sin? 2. Is it becoming me as a Christian? May I do it, and not wrong my profession? 3. Is it expedient? May I do it, and not offend my weak brother?

LUTHER'S DISINTERESTEDNESS.

Disinterestedness was a leading feature in the character of Luther: superior to all selfish considerations, he left the honours and emoluments of this world to those who delighted in them. The following extract from a will he executed some years before his death, proves how little he regarded that wealth, to attain which millions sacrifice every enjoyment in this life, and every hope of happiness in the next!—The Reformer says, "Lord God! I give thee thanks, that thou hast willed me to be poor upon the earth, and a beggar. I have neither house, land, money, nor professions of any kind, which I can leave. Thou hast given me a wife and children; I commend them to thee: nourish them, teach them, preserve them, as thou hast hitherto preserved me, O Father of the fatherless, and Judge of the widow!" The poverty of this great man did not arise from wanting the means of acquiring riches; for few men have had it in their power more easily to obtain them. The Elector of Saxony offered him the produce of a mine at Sneberg; but he nobly refused it; "Lest," said he, "I should tempt the devil, who is lord of these subterraneous treasures, to tempt me." The enemies of Luther were no strangers to his contempt for gold. When one of the popes asked a certain cardinal, why they did not stop that man's mouth with silver and gold?—his Eminence replied, "That German beast regards not money!"—It may easily be supposed, that the liberality of such a man would often exceed his means. A poor student once telling him of his poverty, he desired Mrs. Luther to give him a sum of money; and when she informed him they had none left, he immediately seized a metal cup of some value, which accidentally stood within his reach, and giving it to the poor man, bid him go and sell it, and keep the money to supply his wants. In one of his epistles, Luther says, "I have received one hundred guilders from Taubereim; and Schartts has given me fifty: so that I begin to fear, lest God should reward me in this life. But I declare I will not be satisfied with it. What have I to do with so much money! I gave half of it to P. Priorus, and made the man glad."

A CLOUD OF WITNESSES.

Never cause had so striking a concurrence of testimony in its favour as Christianity. Look at Moses, esteeming "the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. Look at Solomon, interceding not for secular distinction, but for wisdom and knowledge. Look at Paul, "counting all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus." Look at Judge Hale, preferring a twig of the tree of life to a whole wood of bays. Were these a priest-ridden faction, who made a gain of godliness, and had an interest to serve by the recommendation of it? Some think so. But we will not stop to dispute the question with them just now: we will accommodate them from the men of their own school—a magnanimous school verily! There is Hume; striving with might and main to discredit the New Testament, and then confessing that he had never attentively read it. There is Voltaire; vociferating against Jesus Christ, "Crush the wretch! Crush the wretch!" and then muttering the death-bed lamentation, "I am abandoned by God and man." There is Chesterfield; holding on his way in the service of divers lusts and pleasures, and then writing at the end of it, "I do by no means desire to repeat the nauseous dose." So true is it, that "their rock is not as our Rock, our enemies themselves being judges."

BOOKS OF STERLING MERIT.

A Treatise on Comforting Afflicted Consciences. Written in the year 1620, by Robert Bolton, B. D. minister of Broughton in Northamptonshire. With an Introduction and Memoir of the author, by the Rev. J. F. Denham. 18mo. pp. 390. London: Wood and Son. Price 5*s.*

"Afflicted Consciences" require the skill of one who has had large acquaintance with "the things of the Spirit of God." No one possesses this great qualification, who cannot adopt the language of an eminent spiritual physician, and say, "Come and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul."

Bolton was thus qualified; and his "Treatise" is sound, scriptural, and judicious, written by a wise divine of that class which includes Owen, Leighton, and Baxter. Bolton's "Treatise" we think equal to Baxter's Right Method for a Settled Peace of Conscience and Spiritual Comfort," and worthy of being comprised in the "Christian's Cabinet Library," selected by the Rev. Mr. Denham.

A BIRTH-DAY HYMN.

Spar'd hitherto, to thee I pay
  The tribute of a grateful heart;
Let me no longer, Lord, delay,
  But choose at once the better part.

Now, while the gospel says "Return,"
  I would forsake my sinful ways:
Now, while the lamp of life doth burn,
  I would show forth thy lofty praise.

Accept my song, dry up my tears,
  And call a rebel child thine own;
Midst joys and sorrows, hopes and fears,
  Unfold the radiance of thy throne.

Then, though I dare not boast of time
  Prolong'd to yet one narrow span,
With God I can my all resign,
  Nor care to know the fate of man.

A Communication for B. Z. lies at the Publishers'.

The Christian's Penny Magazine may be delivered weekly in the Towns of the United Kingdom, by those Booksellers and Newsmen to whom Subscribers address their orders. Being unstamped, it cannot be transmitted by post as a Newspaper. But for the convenience of our country friends and others, who cannot obtain the publication weekly, it is published every four weeks in parts, each including four numbers; excepting in June and December, in each of which a part will be published containing six numbers. No extra charge is made for the wrapper: so that the whole annual expense of the Twelve parts will be 4*s.* 4*d.*

"SUFFER LITTLE CHILDREN TO COME UNTO ME—FOR OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN."

INFANT SCHOOLS.

WLEDGE is one of the grand essentials of Chris-
y. Ignorance is most unfriendly to scriptural on; and such are its divine peculiarities, demonng its ever-blessed AUTHOR, that while some of its sublime doctrines surpass the grasp of the most exalted human or angelic intellect, many of its saving truths may be happily inculcated upon the youngest opening mind.

Dr. Watts, Dr. Doddridge, Matthew Henry, and Sir William Jones, were taught the lessons of eternal wisdom from the word of God, even in their cradle; by which means the seed of divine truth was sown in their infant minds; and, being watered by the showers of heavenly grace, fruits of righteousness arose in their lives, which will continue to bless our world to the latest generations. Surely the excellent principles on which they were instructed, may be practically adopted to a large extent with our infant population.

We have heard of the "March of Intellect;" we have observed it in the present age; and we sincerely rejoice in its progress: but among all the various and numerous proofs of that advancement, Infant Schools we regard as one of the most remarkable and promising. They afford, in our view, the most striking and beautiful comment upon the language and conduct of our blessed Saviour, when he reproved his disciples for rebuking those who brought infants to receive his blessing. "He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them:" and He still says to us in his holy word, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God." Matt. xix, 13—15; Mark x, 13—16; Luke xvii, 15—17.

"While, therefore, all classes are alive to the various improvements that art is constantly projecting,—while science is marching on in its beneficial career,—when not only statesmen and philosophers, but mechanics and peasants, are entering the lists to penetrate the arcana of nature, and blending the theory of the student with the practice of the artisan, conscious of their mutual dependence and reciprocal advantages;—while the review of these circumstances affords no small degree of pleasure to the reflecting mind, it is to be hoped that the heavenly science of infant cultivation will excite a strong interest in the affections and exertions of our enlightened nation."

The Object of Infant Schools.

Thomson has declared it a "Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,

To teach the young idea how to shoot:—"

such is the design of Infant Schools; and their efficiency in this respect is incredible to those who have not made themselves acquainted with their operations and successes. An intelligent female advocate, in the Christian Lady's Friend for last June, justly observes, "A single visit to one of our infant schools, cannot fail to strike one unacquainted with the system, with the extent and variety of knowledge capable of being grasped by these little creatures. Instances might easily be multiplied of their knowledge of Arithmetic, Geography, History, Natural History, and, in short, any subject which has been presented to their attention. The truth is, that they are no longer treated as mere machines, but as reasonable beings; they are taught to think for themselves; and the habit thus early induced, of mental and intellectual discipline, is brought into action on every occasion, and cannot fail to produce on the whole character, results of the most beneficial nature. It is the mind which is exercised and improved; and whether all the knowledge acquired is afterwards brought into active use or not, the mind has received an impetus and a power, the advantage of which can perhaps with difficulty be appreciated. As an example of the activity and energy with which they exercise their own faculties, on any subject placed within their reach, we can find room only for the following—given in the words of a friend, to whom the circumstance occurred.

"During the play hours, five or six children had got together, and were discussing the distance of the sun, the earth, its size, &c. The subject had never been brought before them at school; their parents were too ignorant to give them much information; their remarks were, consequently, absurd enough; but we were interested by this proof that they had been taught to think. We entered into conversation with one of them, and asked whether he thought the sun moved or the earth?

'Neither.'

'Neither! Why can't you see the sun move?'

'It only looks so.'

'But why does it look so!'

'Why, I've often thought about it; and you know, if I run fast by a hedge, the hedge seems running back, but it does not move.'

'But you are moving yourself.'

'Well, but supposing I turn round in this room, and then stop; I stand still, and the room stands still, and yet it seems to me going round; because, I suppose, I have moved the air between me and the room; and something must move the air between us and the sun, and so it seems to move.'

"This boy was six years old. He had been at school between two and three years, and had had no previous advantages." May we not ask in the language of our friend, "whether many of those individuals, who will smile at his ignorance, had ever thought so much in their lives?"

Scriptural instruction, by lessons from the Bible, and evangelical hymns, forms a distinguishing part of the exercise in our Infant Schools; and the impressions produced, by the Divine blessing, have in many instances been deep, permanent, and saving. The effects produced on the minds of the parents, by the intelligence and piety of the children, have often been of the most beneficial nature; and the artless, but eloquent and forcible appeals of these little creatures, have not unfrequently induced the careless and profane father to attend the house of God, from which his wayward steps had long been turned. By the ministry of these simple preachers, the blaspheming swearer has been led to fear and forget his oath, and to form his vulgar lips to prayer and praise.

Superiority, even in the youngest children, has been felt and confessed by irreligious parents, while they have learnt lessons of eternal wisdom from "the mouths of babes and sucklings." Anecdotes of the most interesting character, in illustration of these statements, we could give in abundance, and well authenticated: but the following will suffice: "A little boy who attended an infant school, and whose father was an habitual swearer, repeatedly intreated him not to use such wicked words; till at length, bursting into tears, the father exclaimed, "Ah, my boy! you must not be too hard upon me: there were no infant schools in my days!"

The Necessity for Infant Schools.

Facts the most appalling from the moral condition of the populous districts of our country, prove the necessity of Infant Schools, and of similar institutions for the improvement of the succeeding generations. London will be considered as furnishing data sufficient, on which to argue the necessity or otherwise of such elementary means of moral and religious training. The whole British metropolis, as we have seen (See Statistics of London, in No. 14 of the Christian's Penny Magazine), contains but 400 places of worship, including all denominations, and most of them but very thinly attended; so that many thousands of children have parents, who pay no regard to the ordinances of religion, and consequently none to the Divine injunction, "bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," Eph. vi. Can we wonder therefore that there should exist such an increase of juvenile delinquency? "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" The authority and beauty of moral and religious truth are not presented to their minds, either by precept or example, and their natural corruption "grows with their growth, and strengthens with their strength," until they become a public nuisance, a curse to society. The "British Magazine," conducted by clergymen of the established church, says, "there are at the present moment about 15,000 boys in the metropolis, children of the poor, who have no visible means of subsistence, and who in fact are many of them trained to every variety of vice." How many girls may be added to that appalling number? The following will strikingly illustrate the above statement, and show the indispensable necessity of juvenile moral training.

A lad, about ten years of age, was convicted of stealing a piece of printed cotton, of small value, from a linen-draper's shop. The parents of the boy were in attendance, and were asked by the judge (Mr. Sergeant Arabin), what they would wish to be done with their child?

The mother said, "that she had done all she could for him; but he had formed such a connection with bad characters that she could do no more!"

Mr. Serg. Arabin. If the court permit you to take your boy home, will you take care and prevent him from committing any further crime?

"I can't be answerable: I'll do all I can!"

The father said, he could not be answerable for the good conduct of his son whilst at his work.

Mr. Serg. Arabin. It is of no use; the parents will not shield the poor boy from the sentence of the court, therefore let him be called up for judgment.

Mr. Ald. Farebrother. Stop, Mr. Sergeant. Then, addressing the parents, he asked how many children they had: they answered, Only the prisoner.

Mr. Ald. Farebrother. Well, really, I must say it is something very strange, that parents who have only one child can refuse to throw that protection around him it is their duty to afford.

Mr. Serg. Arabin. Call the poor boy up for judgment; he is deserted by his parents.

The prisoner was then called up to receive the sentence of the court, and looking at his parents, who stood near the dock, he wept bitterly. The court then ordered him to be transported for seven years.

Relation of Infant Schools to National and Sunday Schools.

Sunday schools have properly been denominated the "sure nurseries of our churches;" and such they are in reality. But what can be so admirably adapted to prepare the infant mind to profit by the instructions afforded by the National, the British, and Sunday schools, as the training which we are recommending? The writer of this paper, a few days ago, visited an Infant School near Blackheath, founded and supported by the estimable Lady Dowager Dartmouth, where the order and progress of the children appeared excellent, and some of the children being six years old, they were referred to, as retained to be soon transferred to a National School. The plan seems worthy of being adopted in every parish.

Qualification of the Teachers of Infant Schools.

Mr. Brown, the intelligent master of the Spitalfields Infant School, in his "Essays on the Cultivation of the Infant Mind," judiciously observes, "The gospel of God our Saviour abounds with the deepest truths that can possibly interest the mind of man; and to neglect these important facts in the course of infant instruction is to pour contempt on the authority of Jehovah, and lead the children from the Redeemer, who came to seek and to save the lost. But some object, 'The children will not be able to comprehend these sacred subjects.' The same objections may be urged against teaching them to study the beauties of creation. God has given a full relation of his will in the Scriptures; these shed a glorious lustre on all the works of his hands, and lead to the solid conclusion—'He that built all things is God.' But redemption is that in which man is most deeply interested, and should, therefore, excite a corresponding concern in all who patronize or have the charge of Infant Schools.

"It is of the utmost consequence to the well-being of the system, and the highest interests of the children, that suitable teachers should be procured. They should be genuine Christians; 'Israelites indeed, in whom is no guile;' men of unblemished reputation, and strict integrity; 'not double-tongued, conceited novices, but prudent, discreet, temperate in all things; the sons of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation.' They should be fully enlightened, deeply awakened, and soundly converted to God. They must possess a strong and lively understanding; a sound discriminating judgment; a sanctified and retentive memory; a ready, affectionate, and persuasive utterance; and a quenchless zeal for the salvation of souls!"

Dr. Adam Clarke took a lively interest in Infant Schools, and that distinguished man observes, "The more I see and know of the system of infant education, the more fully am I convinced, that, in order to its stability and prosperity, the teachers must be well informed persons, mighty in the scriptures, able to impart knowledge in a simple, interesting, and pleasant manner. They must read attentively, think deeply, and pray fervently: they have to assist in moulding the human character. How correct their views ought to be of divine truth! How chaste, not stiff or pompous, the language by which they communicate instruction! They should study man in his nature, character, and destiny; a creature made by and for God; but through the sin that dwells in him, as fearfully and wonderfully vile as he is 'fearfully and wonderfully made.'"

In our next number we purpose giving a paper on Domestic Infant Schools; with a notice of Brown's "Essay on Cultivation of the Infant Mind."

RETROSPECTION.

There is a silent chronicle of past hours in the inanimate things amidst which they have been spent, that gives us back the affections, the regrets, the sentiments of our former days: that gives back their joys without tumult, their griefs without poignancy, and produces equally from both a pensive pleasure, which men who have retired from the world are peculiarly fond of indulging. Above all others, those objects which recal the years of our childhood will have this tender effect on the heart; they present to us afresh the blissful illusions of life, when gaiety was undamped by care, and hope smiled upon us unchecked by disappointment. The distance of the scene adds to our idea of its felicity, and increases the tenderness of its recollection. It is like a view by moonlight: the distinctness of objects is lost; but a kind of mellow dimness softens and unites the whole.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ENOCH.

The State of the World in the age of Enoch.

That the family of Cain should bear a strong resemblance to their wicked father, might reasonably be expected. The public worship of God was unknown among them. Converse on the bounteous goodness, and on the holy and merciful character of their Creator, would never be heard in their habitations. They could know but little of the Divine promises of a Saviour; and being separated from the worshippers of God, that little would become less influential on their minds. Their father being an infidel, disbelieving the promises of God to the penitent, and disregarding the ordinances of religion, as observed by the "sons of God" in the family of Seth, the unbelief of Cain would be cherished by his children, it being congenial to their depraved hearts. The Cainites were busily employed in the affairs of the present world; skilful in their inventions in the mechanical arts, which served the purposes of refinement; and increasing in the possession of those things which gratified the sensual mind.

"The sons of God," the Sethites, were more distinguished for the purity of their manners; and were contented with their simple, pastoral mode of living. For a considerable period, it appears, that the two branches of Adam's family held no intercourse, living at a distance from each other. The pious were afraid of being corrupted by the infidelity of the children of Cain, and they avoided their society as pernicious in its influence, carefully keeping in their fruitful valleys.

> "Here, in retirement from profane mankind,
> They worshipp'd God with purity of mind,
> Fed their small flocks, and till'd their narrow soil,
> Like parent Adam, with submissive toil."
> World before the Flood.

But in process of time, the boundaries of this separation were broken down. The young men among "the sons of God," having in many instances only "the form of godliness, but denying its power," were impatient under the wise restraints imposed upon them by their pious parents, and excited with curiosity to know the manners of the sons of Cain. Enamoured of the elegance, beauty, and accomplishments of the daughters of the Cainites, by whom it is probable they were enticed, they formed connections with them in the bonds of marriage, disregarding their infidel principles.

This deplorable state of things is expressed with instructive conciseness by the inspired historian in the book of Genesis. He says, "And it came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and they took them wives of all which they chose." Chap. vi, 1, 2.

The enchanting influence of these beautiful but irreligious women, soon subverted the pious principles of their husbands, who threw off the yoke of religious precepts, which they had never loved, and yielded to the power of infidelity in their wives. Such has been the case in numerous instances since that period. Even Solomon, the wisest of men, was deluded and led away by listening to his wives, and fell from his religious consistency and reverence for the Lord God, to the stupidity of bowing down in worship to senseless idols!

The very form of goodness, in these apostates from the worship of God, was quickly swallowed up by the prevalence of iniquity. Those who had been formerly distinguished as "the sons of God," became equally corrupt with their licentious partners and companions; and the evil was increasing, so as to threaten the extinction of every principle of religion upon the earth. These unholy marriages produced a race of men, who appear to have been the most determined enemies of godliness. "There were giants in the earth in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children unto them, the same became mighty men, which were of old, men of renown." Gen. vi, 4.

These giants are believed to have been, not so much men of extraordinary stature, as tyrants; "men of renown," and "mighty men" for acts of oppression, cruelty, and abominable wickedness. "Of these renowned heroes of antiquity," as many suppose, "the heathen made their gods."

Many lessons of the soundest wisdom are contained in this part of the sacred history, especially in relation to improper marriages. The sources of most of the calamities, with which the world has been afflicted, both in public and in private life, are justly attributed, by many wise and pious men, to indiscretion in this most momentous of all earthly connections. Females possessing high accomplishments, but destitute of personal religion, are found to be the most dangerous companions for serious young men. Many a young man, who has been seriously devoted to God, has found to his bitter regret the pernicious influence of an elegant and beautiful, but irreligious wife. His purposes of serving God with all his house, have been fatally hindered by her authority, persuasion, and habits. The children of such have been taught every thing except the "one thing needful,"—except the things that belong to their everlasting peace; and the domestics have despised the forms of that religion, which were inconsistently observed by the master.

Let our young readers learn wisdom by this part of Holy Scripture. Young females, though "fair" as the early "daughters of men," should remember, that "favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain; but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised." Prov. xxxi, 30. Their most valuable treasure, their most lovely ornament, is genuine piety, producing "a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." 1 Pet. iii, 4. And let our young men, especially those who have been "brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord" by pious parents, be warned against forming connections with the vain, the vicious, the ungodly, however lovely in features, beautiful in form, or superior in elegant accomplishments; lest they contribute an awful share to bring upon the earth that infidelity and ungodliness which prevailed in the world in the days of the prophet Enoch.

THE SCOFFER REPROVED BY A PRINCE.

Lady Huntingdon's heart was truly devoted to God; and she resolved, to the best of her ability, to lay herself out to do good. The poor around her were the natural objects of her attention. These she bountifully relieved in their necessities; conversed with, and led them to their knees, praying with them and for them. The late Prince of Wales, one day at court, asked a lady of fashion, Lady Charlotte E——, where my Lady Huntingdon was, that she so seldom visited the circle? Lady Charlotte replied, with a sneer, "I suppose, praying with her beggars." The Prince shook his head and said, "Lady Charlotte, when I am dying, I think I shall be happy to seize the skirt of Lady Huntingdon's mantle, to lift me up with her to heaven."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER IV.

Dear Madam,

Although education has been divided into four departments, and my remarks will be restricted to one at a time as they succeed each other, yet you are aware that they all must be united in practice, as far as possible. The physical, moral, mental, and religious culture of a child, are all intimately connected, and should all, as far as possible, be begun and continued together. Very early therefore begin that part of his education which comes under the denomination of the moral, or the direction of his conduct as a member of society, as a responsible creature of God, whose present and future happiness will be dependent upon his own behaviour.

It is almost superfluous to remind you, that your attention must be directed for this purpose to his understanding and his affections. You must, as soon as possible, make him understand what is his duty, and teach him also to approve and prefer it upon principle. The only method of regulating the conduct of any human being, is to convince his judgment and affect his heart. Still, as this cannot be done at present, owing to the infantine state of his faculties, it will be needful for you to begin the moral part of his education in a manner partly mechanical This will consist in carefully, and by system, avoiding every thing which may disturb his complacency, and tend to produce fretfulness or irritability. Yet as he will soon begin to understand your assiduities, and to rely upon them, it will be needful to avoid communicating the idea to him that he is of great consequence, and especially every thing that has the appearance of indulgence. I have seen a child under contrary treatment, fully conscious of the extraordinary attention paid to him, and resenting the absence of it by tears and passion, even before being able to speak plainly. I have feared, in such instances, that a foundation was being laid for tyranny, impatience, and self-preference. These evils would be excluded by a system of intelligent watchfulness over him, which equally provides against neglect and the admission of extraordinary instances of attention.

At a very early age the future disposition and characteristic tendencies of a child, both of body and of mind, become apparent. It is the opinion of eminent physicians, that all the diseases of the body which it may suffer, and by which death will be ultimately produced, are born with us. I believe that the same observation holds with regard to the disposition. The whole man is inclosed in the infant, just as the future flower is contained in the bud, and even in the seed itself; and just as the future process of blossoming and bearing fruit are but the expansion of the seed, so manhood is but the development of infancy.

You will soon perceive the disposition of your child beginning to develop itself. You will indeed have abundant reason to acknowledge, that man is of his own nature inclined to evil; but the self-same disposition which is thus inclined, and which may become the instrument of the evil the individual may produce and suffer, may also by the benefit of education, and the aid of the Holy Spirit, become the instrument of good. It is the province of education, not to eradicate, but to direct and regulate the natural disposition. Suppose a child, for instance, early to exhibit what is called determination of character, an unwillingness to renounce a purpose. If neglected, he may become tyrannical, violent, self-opinionated, and regardless of the opinions and welfare of others. If well directed, he may become persevering, energetic, steady, and successful. Another child, even in the same family, may develop a more patient, gentle, and yielding disposition. If well directed, it may be the basis of a genuine sensibility of heart with all its excellencies; if ill treated, he may become timid, and even cunning and deceitful. One child may early develop strength of mental and bodily organization: if well directed, they may expand into greatness of character; if ill directed, his strength may only render him dangerous and abandoned. The disposition then should be studied, and as it developes itself should be directed towards excellence.

There is indeed a critical period, which too often passes unobserved, but which is intimately connected with the welfare both of the child and of the parent. I mean the subjugation of his will to that of his parent. Since the parent, of course, will know what is best for the child for many years of its life, the will of the child must submit to that of the parent. This habit ought to be established at a very early period, as every day after he has tasted the fatal pleasure of self-will, would only render the task more difficult and hopeless. From the first, resolve, as well as you can, upon what will be best, adopt your resolution, persevere in it, and your child will never oppose your judgment. But should you ever be induced to alter your determination because it may be less pleasing to him, should you ever allow him to learn that tears and entreaty induce you to change your proceedings, you have laid the foundation for his unhappiness and your own. The work of education often requires that a child be restrained, and required to persevere in a particular line of conduct. Human nature is however averse to these things: yet they are essential to the happiness of a child. When therefore you feel inclined to forego the dictate of your judgment, out of regard to the transitory ease and gratification of your child, you lay the foundation for everlasting trouble in the process of education. Your commands, your wishes will be perpetually challenged and opposed. On the other hand, never from the first acquaint him with the fatal secret, that it could be possible for you to change your mind, or that it could be possible for him to resist you. Whenever I have seen a child repeating a request, which had at first been denied him, and winning the compliance of a parent by entreaty, I have thought, There is the spectacle of the superior knowledge and wisdom of a father or mother all rendered useless, by the false tenderness which allows an ignorant infant to overcome him by entreaty. I have felt certain that the child never would have thought of such a proceeding, had his education been properly conducted. I have grieved to anticipate the ever-widening evils which attend such mistaken conduct. Especially should parents avoid disagreeing upon any point of conduct in the presence of their children. Soon will they learn who is most inclined to their cause, and thither will the little petitioners carry their request; and if successful, the benefit of the united influence of both parents upon the education of their children is lost for ever. The way to avoid this evil is, for the general education of children to be resigned chiefly to the mother, and for the father to interfere in those cases only which require his advice and authority. Should there be any difference of opinion upon such topics, the parents will do well to converse and resolve upon it privately. In endeavouring to practise these directions, it is needless to say that the object intended is a uniform system. When this has been adopted from the beginning, and steadily maintained, it will proceed in so silent and effectual a manner as scarcely to be observed by a stranger, except by its lovely effects, and save infinite trouble and anxiety to the parent.

Above all things, he who teaches or educates another, must himself be what he would have his scholar become. All the lessons about good temper and self-control, like all other good advice, will be best administered by the silent yet forcible eloquence of the parent's own proper conduct. A child never learns so much by what a parent says as by what he does. What self-education, what prayer for Divine assistance, what watchfulness does your task require!

Believe me, Madam, your, &c.

26. QUADRATUS, styled by the Greeks, a man of great learning and knowledge, was believed to have been a native of Athens, where he was educated in all the studies and philosophy cultivated in that celebrated city. Of the precise period of his birth, or of his conversion to Christ, we have no particular account. Eusebius and Jerome say that he was an auditor of the apostles. Some suppose that he was bishop of the church at Philadelphia, to whom the apostle John wrote his Epistle. Rev. iii, 7.

In the reign of Trajan, Publius, bishop of the Christians at Athens, terminated his course by martyrdom, and Quadratus was chosen to succeed him. Many of the believers had been scattered from Athens, and the church was in a deplorable state of declension, sunk almost to apostacy. This apostolic man applied himself vigorously to recover the ancient spirit of religion: he restored church discipline, and induced the exiles to return to the ordinances of public worship. Reformation merely did not satisfy Quadratus: but he laboured successfully to win souls to Christ, and to enlarge the boundaries of the church; so that through his ministry, many of the Grecian sages embraced the gospel of salvation, and acknowledged Jesus as Lord of all, the Creator of the world, and the Redeemer of sinners.

Tranquillity was enjoyed by the Christians during the latter part of Trajan's reign, his cruel edicts being suspended: but under Adrian, his successor, they were enforced; and those who fell a sacrifice to the fury of the idolatrous pagans appear to have been numerous, as long lists of martyrs for Christ are given by ancient writers. Even at Rome, Eustachius, a person of some note, and his wife Theopistis, with their two sons, are said to have been thrown to the lions, by the emperor's command; but being spared by the savage beasts, they were ordered to be burnt to death in the hollow of a brazen bull, which they used for worship.

About the sixth year of his reign, Adrian visited Athens, took upon himself the honour of Archon, celebrated their solemn sports, and entered into the venerable Eleusinian mysteries. Adrian staying the winter at Athens, persecution raged against the Christians. Aristides wrote an apology for the Christians, addressed to the emperor: Quadratus presented another to Adrian, by which means his fierceness was a little moderated: it is even said, by a Roman historian, that Adrian purposed to build a temple to Christ, and to receive him into the number of his gods!

Quadratus was brutally treated after Adrian's departure from Athens, and driven into exile, where he suffered martyrdom, as is reported, at Magnesia, a city in Asia Minor.

In the Apology of Quadratus, a fragment of which remains, he notices the miracles of Christ, his curing diseases and raising the dead; some instances of which, he says, still existed in his time.

Adrian died A. D. 137: but we know not the precise year of the birth or martyrdom of Quadratus.

HINT TO CHRISTIANS AND MINISTERS,

Suggested by reading Captain Parry's Voyage in quest of a North-West Passage.

"The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." Luke x, 8.

Shall Parry brave the horrors of that tide,
Where never ship before was seen to glide;
Tempt legion-danger, under Polar skies,
Where torpid Nature one vast ruin lies;
And life—if life can such a clime illume—
Is mere existence, breathing through the gloom?
Shall he explore that mart of ice and sleet,
Where Nature's pulse is hardly felt to beat;
Where everlasting desolation reigns
O'er earth and ocean, bound in frozen chains?
Shall he tempt regions hideous and dark,
That never smil'd since Noah left the ark?
To crown his temples with his country's wreath,
Invade these frigid avenues of death;
The barriers of the Arctic Circle force,
With not a magnet to direct his course,
With not a sun to gild that arch divine[*],
That shows his distance from the Pole and Line?
Shall he, when science, honour, fame, invite,
Brave the long gloom of Hyperborean night?
Shall he, shall Parry, for a paltry lure,
These and ten thousand nameless ills endure?—
And shall not I, when God and duty call,
Fly to the utmost limits of the ball?
Cross the wide sea, along the desert toil,
Or circumnavigate each Indian isle:
To torrid regions fly to save the lost,
Or brave the rigour of eternal frost?
I may, like Brainerd, perish in my bloom,
A group of Indians weeping round my tomb:
I may, like Martyn, lay my burning head
In some lone Persian hut, or Turkish shed:
I may, like Coke, be buried in the wave:
I may, like Howard, find a Tartar grave:
Or perish like a Xavier on the beach,
In some poor cottage out of friendship's reach:
I may—but never let my soul repine;
"Lo! I am with you:"—Heaven is in that line!
Tropic or Pole, or mild or burning Zone,
Is but a step from my celestial throne!

"THEREFORE WE ARE ALWAYS CONFIDENT."—Not hesitating, as he that cried out on his death-bed, "I have lived carefully, I die doubtfully, I go I know not whither?" Socrates, with all his skill, could not resolve his friends whether it were better for a man to die or to live longer. And Cicero, having comforted himself as well as possible against the fear of death by the help of philosophy, acknowledged at last, that the medicine was too weak for the disease. It is the Christian only who can be confident that his end shall be happy, though his beginning and middle perhaps may be troublesome. "Knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord." "For we walk by faith, not by sight."—Trapp.

REV. WILLIAM PERKINS.

BORN 1558—DIED 1602.

At Marston, in Warwickshire, was born the celebrated William Perkins, a great scholar, a profound divine, and a successful preacher in the University of Cambridge. He received his academical education in Christ's College, in that University, where for some time he was very wild, and ran great lengths in prodigality; probably permitted, that when he should become a preacher, he might more fully detect and lay open the workings of sin and vanity in others, sympathize with them in their sad condition, and be the better qualified to counsel and comfort them in their "repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ." At the same time, and while yet a graduate, he gave proofs of the great genius with which Providence had endowed him, by his deep researches into nature, and the secret operations of natural powers. But when the Lord was pleased to convert him from the error of his ways, he applied himself with uncommon diligence to the study of divinity, and, in a short time, made an almost incredible proficiency.

About the age of twenty-four, he was chosen fellow of Christ's College, and entered into holy orders; when, according to the precepts of the gospel, having "freely received, he freely gave;" and after the pattern of his great exemplar, went and "preached deliverance to the captives." The gaoler being prevailed upon to bring the prisoners into the county house, near to the gaol, he preached the gospel to them every Sunday, with great power and success. As soon as this pious labour was known, many from the neighbouring parishes resorted thither to hear him; and it pleased God to make him the happy instrument in bringing to the knowledge of salvation, and into the "liberty of the children of God," not only those whose bodies were in prison, but those whose souls, like theirs, were in captivity and bondage to sin and Satan. His fame, which was afterwards in all the churches, soon spread through Cambridge; and he was chosen to St. Andrew's parish in that town, where he remained an industrious, faithful labourer, till he finally "entered into the joy of his Lord."

Being settled thus in a university, his hearers consisted of the collegians, town's people, and people from the country, which required such a peculiar gift as Providence had bestowed on Mr. Perkins; for, in all his discourses, he was able to acommodate his style and phrases to the capacities of the common people; and at the same time the pious scholar could not but admire them. Luther used to say, "that as thunder without rain did more harm than good; so ministers that preach the terrors of the law, but do not at the same time drop in the dew of gospel instruction and consolation, are not wise master builders; for they pull down, but build nothing up again." But Mr. Perkins's sermons were said to be all law, and all gospel! He was a rare instance of those opposite gifts meeting in so eminent a degree in one and the same preacher; the vehemence and thunder of a Boanerges, to awaken sinners to a sense of their danger, and to drive them from destruction; and the gentle persuasives and comforts of a Barnabas, to pour in the wine and oil of gospel consolation into the wounded spirit, which he pointed to Jesus Christ. And such was his wisdom in administering advice and comfort in all cases of conscience, that it is said, "the afflicted in spirit came far and near to him, and received comfort from him."

He had a surprising talent in perusing books so speedily that one would think he read nothing; yet so accurately, that one must think he had read all. Besides his frequent preaching, and other ministerial labours, he wrote many excellent books; which, on account of their worth, were many of them translated into Latin, and sent abroad, where they have been greatly admired and valued; and some of them translated into French, High Dutch, and Low Dutch, and his "Reformed Catholic," into Spanish; which, however, so far as we know, was never answered. Voetius, and several of the foreign divines, have mentioned him with great honour: and our Bishop Hall said of him, "that he excelled in a distinct judgment, and a rare dexterity in clearing the obscure subtleties of the schools, and easy explication of the most perplexed discourses." He was much afflicted with the stone, the frequent attendant on a sedentary life, under which severe complaint he was remarkably patient. In the last fit, a little before his death, hearing a friend pray for the mitigation of his pains, he cried out, "Hold! hold! do not pray so; but pray the Lord to give me faith and patience, and then let him lay on me just what he please." At length patience had its perfect work, and he bade a final and everlasting farewell to all pain of the body and affliction of the soul; was crowned with eternal rest and glory, A.D. 1602, in the forty-fourth year of his age. He was born in the first, and died in the last year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He died rich only in grace, and in the love of God and of good men: yet, like the Apostle Paul (2 Cor. vi, 10), however poor, he was enabled to make many rich. He was buried with great solemnity, at the sole expense of Christ's College; the university and the town striving which should show the most gratitude for his faithful labours among them, or pay the greatest respect to his memory. Doctor Montague preached his funeral sermon on the following words, "Moses, my servant, is dead." Josh. i, 2.

He was so pious and exemplary in his life and conversation, that malice itself could find no ground for scandal or reproach. He was naturally cheerful and pleasant; rather reserved toward strangers, but when once acquainted, very familiar. He was of a middle stature, ruddy complexion, bright hair, and inclined to corpulency, but lame of his right hand; yet with his left hand he wrote two folio volumes, so well, and to so good purpose, that he proved himself an able evangelical divine, and an invincible champion in the Protestant cause. And such was his humanity and condescension, that he not only preached to the prisoners, as we observed before, but accompanied the condemned to the place of execution; and what success he had in this line of his labours, will appear from the following example:—A stout young man going up the ladder, discovered great dejection of spirit, and when he came to the top, and turned round to speak to the people, he looked like one half dead; which Mr. Perkins observing, endeavoured to encourage him; but finding it to be without effect, said, "Man, what is the matter with thee? Art thou afraid of death?" "Ah, no (said the malefactor, shaking his head), but of a worse thing." "Dost thou so (replied Mr. Perkins), then come down again, and thou shalt see what God's grace will do to strengthen thee." When he came down, Mr. Perkins took him by the hand, and, at the foot of the ladder, they both kneeled down, hand in hand; when Mr. Perkins prayed with so much of the Divine presence, and with such power, in confession of sin, with its aggravating circumstances, and the horrible and eternal punishment due to the same, according to God's justice, that the poor man burst out into a flood of tears, being broken and contrite in heart: which when Mr. Perkins observed, he proceeded to the second part of his prayer, in which he set forth the Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of every believing penitent sinner, as stretching forth his arms of mercy and power to save him in his miserable and distressed condition, and from all the powers of darkness, and to give him heaven and glory. This he was enabled to do in so wonderful and successful a manner, that the poor creature continued indeed to shed tears, but they were now tears of love, gratitude, and joy, flowing from a belief that all his sins were cancelled by the merciful shedding of his Saviour's blood. And when they rose from prayer, he evidenced so good and satisfactory a confession, that the spectators lifted up their hands, and praised God, for seeing such a glorious display of sovereign grace, in converting at the eleventh hour this dying malefactor, who went up the ladder again with apparently great comfort, and hastening as it were to have the grace he had so lately been made a partaker of, consummated in glory.

A FEW PLAIN QUESTIONS

ON KEEPING THE SABBATH DAY HOLY.

Is it enough to give a few hours to Public Worship, and then give ourselves to the world and its cares? Is it the Sabbath Morning that we are to sanctify, or the Sabbath Evening only, and not the Sabbath Day? Let us enumerate those various secular works which are unlawful on this day of the Lord. Let us expose the miserable sophistry, which substitutes a mere change of worldly engagements for the holy duties of divine prayer and praise. If we close our offices or our shops, and open our drawer of accounts, and write letters on affairs of business, are we sanctifying the Sabbath? If we withdraw from the exchange or the courts of law, into the chamber of consultation or the secret room of settlements and bargains, is this keeping the Lord's day? We employ not our labourers on Sunday; but we pay them their wages, and almost oblige them to make their purchases on that sacred day: and is this to keep it holy? Or we quit the hurry of the city or town, for the mere sensual indulgence of the rural retreat—"we eat, and drink, and are merry"—we collect around us friends as thoughtless as ourselves—we employ our servants in the unnecessary toil of preparing luxurious meals—we go from the church to the ride, the garden, the park, the pleasure-ground, the river—we walk over our farm or our lands—we arrange for the business of the following week—we plunge into literary or scientific reading—we lose our devotional feelings in the abominations of a Sunday newspaper;—and this we call Religion!—this we designate as the sanctification of the Lord's day!!

THE GRAND SEIGNIOR OF TURKEY.

Much has been said of the greatness and wisdom of the present Turkish Sultan. Probably much of it is correct; but his policy has been such as to render his name a curse and an execration among all people. The following passages from a letter of an American missionary to Turkey and Greece, will be read with much interest, especially by those who have an opportunity of seeing the sovereign of Great Britian, whose empire and resources are incalculably greater than those of the Sultan, passing through the streets of London, Windsor, or Brighton, as a father among his people. The writer is the Rev. Harrison G. O. Dwight; it is dated Pera, April 26, 1830.

"Last Friday I had a fine view of the Grand Seignior himself, as he was going to and from the mosque. Five or six thousand troops were out upon the occasion, and on each side of his person was a line of soldiers with drawn swords, and behind him a body of soldiers with muskets and bayonets fixed. Before him eleven beautiful Arabian horses were led, richly caparisoned, and each guarded by two soldiers with drawn swords. He was on horseback. The breast of his coat was thickly wrought with jewels and gold, and his cap, which was of a beautiful red, was set with diamonds, and from the top a long gold tassel hung around its side. He wore a black coat of rich broadcloth over his dress, so that we could see but little of it. His saddle and bridle trimmings were very heavy, and all of gold. He has a very solid and intelligent countenance, and a piercing eye. We were very near him, and he gazed at us some time as he passed. He has certainly accomplished wonders, by way of reform, during his reign thus far, and I have no doubt he is the greatest man that now sits upon a throne. Would that he were good as he is great! It is heart-chilling to reflect upon the quantity of blood he has been the instrument of shedding among his own subjects, to say nothing of his cruelties to the Greeks. It is supposed that by his order, at least sixty thousand persons have been beheaded or strangled. This includes the Janissaries, thirty thousand of whom were massacred in one day."

LIBERTY.

Blest be the land, where'er it lies,
'Neath brilliant blue Arcadian skies;
Or far in dreary solitude,
'Mid cataract and forest rude,
It shores a desert sea:
To me it shall be holy ground,
If in its air there lives one sound,
And that glad sound is Liberty!

Dear Liberty!—thou ray of Heaven!
Bright emanation from our God!
Spirit, to whom a power is given
Superior to the prophet's rod,
Where'er thou touchest, flows a stream
Of grace and grandeur, brightening all!
Beauty awakes as from a dream—
Wealth hears, and straight obeys thy call!
Brave are thy youths, and fair thy maids,
The very soul of love pervades
Their every word and sigh!
Around thou turn'st thine eagle gaze,
And tyrants wither in the blaze
Of thine insulted eye!

There is no attribute of mind,
No glow of faculties refin'd,
No charm (that genius gave)
But grows and strengthens in thy light:
And lives there one such gifts to blight?
Go!—cast the traitor from thy sight,
To crawl an abject slave!

Yes! by whatever ocean bound,
That land to me is hallow'd ground,
If from its heart there springs one sound,
The lofty sound of Liberty!

HURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE AT JERUSALEM.

RUSALEM," said our blessed Saviour, "shall be len down of the Gentiles, until the times of the iles be fulfilled." Luke xxi, 24. This affecting iction has hitherto been fulfilled in the most re- able manner; and the history of that celebrated and its present condition, furnish the most con- ng proof of the divinity of Christianity.

rusalem, as it existed in the times of the sacred rs, our readers will remember is no more! Not mallest vestige remains of the splendid capital of d, and Solomon, and Herod! Not a single monu- of their times is standing: the circuit of the is changed, and no one can determine the ancient daries of the holy city!

rusalem has been described by many modern tra- rs, whom curiosity has impelled to visit the theatre hich the work of human redemption was accom- ed by INCARNATE DEITY!

he city of Jerusalem," says Joh Heinrich Mayr, dern German traveller, "which in the time of t is said to have contained nearly three millions of itants, now includes from twelve to fifteen thousand. The circumference of the city itself, as we may conceive, had proportionably decreased, for within an hour I had completed its circuit."

Mr. Buckingham says, "The city occupies an irregular square, of about two miles and a half in circumference. The walls appear to be about fifty feet in height, but are not surrounded by a ditch. They are flanked at irregular distances by square towers, and have battlements running all round on their summits, with loop-holes for arrows or musquetry close to the top.—Within the walls of the city are seen crowded dwellings, remarkable in no respect, except being terminated by flat roofs, ard generally built of stone. On the south are some gardens and vineyards, with the long red mosque of Al Sakhara, having two tiers of windows, a sloping roof, and a dark dome at one end, and the mosque of Sion and the sepulchre of David in the same quarter. On the west is seen the high square castle and palace of the same monarch, near the Bethlehem gate. In the centre rise two cupolas of unequal form and size, the one blue and the other white, covering the CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE. Around, in different directions, are seen the minarets of eight or ten mosques, amid an assemblage of about two thousand dwellings. And on the east is seated the great mosque of Al Harrem, or, as called by Christians, the mosque of Solomon, from being supposed, with that of Al Sakhara near it, to occupy the site of the ancient temple of that splendid and luxurious king."

Chateaubriand observes, "The houses of Jerusalem are heavy square masses, very low, without chimneys or windows; they have flat terraces or domes on the top, and look like prisons or sepulchres. The whole would appear to the eye one uninterrupted level, did not the steeples of the churches, the minarets of the mosques, the summits of a few cypresses, and the clumps of nopals, break the uniformity of the plain. On beholding these stone buildings, encompassed by a stony country, you are ready to inquire if they are not the confused monuments of a cemetery in the midst of a desert. You lose yourself among narrow, unpaved streets, here going up hill, there down, from the inequality of the ground; and you walk among clouds of dust or loose stones. Canvass stretched from house to house increases the gloom of this labyrinth. Bazaars, roofed over, and fraught with infection, completely exclude the light from the desolate city. A few paltry shops expose nothing but wretchedness to view; and even these are frequently shut, from apprehension of a cadi.—Amid this extraordinary desolation, you must pause a moment, to contemplate two circumstances still more extraordinary. Among the ruins of Jerusalem, two classes of independent people find in their religion sufficient fortitude to enable them to surmount such complicated horrors and wretchedness. Here reside communities of Christian monks, whom nothing can compel to forsake the tomb of Christ; neither plunder, nor personal ill-treatment, nor menaces of death itself. Night and day they chant their hymns around the Holy Sepulchre. Driven by the cudgel and the sabre, women, children, flocks and herds, seek refuge in the cloisters of these recluses. What prevents the armed oppressor from pursuing his prey, and overwhelming such feeble ramparts?—the charity of the monks: they deprive themselves of the last resources of life to ransom their suppliants.

"Cast your eyes between the temple and Mount Zion; behold another petty tribe, cut off from the rest of the inhabitants of the city. The particular objects of every species of degradation, these people bow their heads without murmuring: they endure every kind of insult without demanding justice: they sink beneath repeated blows without sighing: if their head be required, they present it to the scimitar.—Enter the abodes of these people, you will find them, amid the most abject wretchedness, instructing their children to read a mysterious book, which they in their turn will teach their offspring to read. Seventeen times have they witnessed the destruction of Jerusalem, yet nothing can discourage them, nothing can prevent them from turning their faces towards Zion. To see the Jews scattered over the whole world, according to the word of God, must doubtless excite surprise: but to be struck with supernatural astonishment, you must view them at Jerusalem; you must behold these rightful masters of Judea, living as slaves and strangers in their own country; you must behold them expecting, under all oppressions, a KING who is to deliver them. Crushed by the cross that condemns them, skulking near the temple, of which not one stone is left upon another, they continue in their deplorable infatuation. The Persians, the Greeks, the Romans, are swept from the earth; and a petty tribe, whose origin preceded that of those great nations, still exists unmixed among the ruins of its native land."

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE, was erected by the empress Helena, mother of Constantine, about A. D. 326, as was supposed, on Mount Calvary. The walls are of stone, and the roof of cedar; the East end encloses Mount Calvary, and the West the Holy Sepulchre; the former is covered with a noble cupola, open at top, and supported by sixteen massive columns. Over the high altar, at the East end, is another stately dome. The nave of the church constitutes the choir; and in the aisles within are shown the places where the most remarkable circumstances of our Saviour's passion were transacted, together with the tombs of Godfrey and Baldwin, the first two Christian kings of Jerusalem. In the Chapel of the Crucifixion is shown the hole in the rock in which the cross is said to have been fixed. The altar in this chapel has three crosses, and is richly adorned; particularly with four lamps of immense value that hang before it, and are kept constantly burning. At the west end is that of the sepulchre, which is hewn in that form out of the solid rock, and has a small dome supported by pillars of porphyry. The cloister round it is divided into several chapels, appropriated to the different sects of Christians who reside there—Greeks, Armenians, Maronites, Jacobites, Copts, Abyssines, Georgians, &c., and on the north-west side are the apartments of the Latins, who have the care of the church, and reside constantly in it; the Turks keeping the keys of it, and not suffering any of them to go out, but obliging them to receive all their provisions in at a small wicket gate. At Easter some grand ceremonies are performed in the church, representing our Lord's passion, crucifixion, death, and resurrection; at which a vast concourse of pilgrims assist, whose contributions and offerings keep the edifice in repair, and support its possessors.

The Easter ceremonies at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre are most extravagant and superstitious, and on some future occasion we purpose to give an account of them; in the mean time, let our readers pray that God would send forth his blessed word to dissipate the delusions of the people, that by the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, a host of intelligent, holy, zealous men of God may be raised up to preach in its purity, simplicity, and power, the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour.

WHAT LAND WOULD I VISIT?

Had I the pinions of a dove
  To fly o'er land and sea,
To what lov'd country would I rove,
  My native land, from thee?

Would I first visit mighty Rome,
  Her ruins vast and proud,
Her lofty towers, her far-fam'd dome,
  And sky without a cloud?

Would I to lovely Greece repair,
  Her isles once blest and free,
To breathe the fragrance of the air,
  The breezes of the sea?

Would I towards the rising sun
  Delighted stretch my way;
To view the shores he shines upon,
  The utmost realms of day?

Or the sweet islands of the west
  Would I now soar among,
High on their craggy mountains rest,
  And streams unknown to song?

Would I the rich Peruvian mine
  With anxious zeal explore?
Or seek the polish'd gems that shine
  On India's wealthy shore?

To none of these would I retire,
My England, far from thee!
One place alone do I aspire
With earnest wish to see.

I'd soar away, if once set free,
That Holy Land to greet,
And all those hallow'd places see,
Where trod my Saviour's feet.

I would alight on that blest spot
Where he so often taught
Those words which ne'er can be forgot,
Where mighty deeds he wrought.

There would my dying faith revive,
While I from place to place,
With earnestness of love, would strive
His footsteps to retrace.

Though now profan'd each hallow'd spot,
Yet are they not the same
(The face of nature changes not)
As when to earth he came?

We tread the fields where heroes fought,
Where glorious deeds were done;
But here, the wonders that were wrought
'Twas God himself that won!

With awe we pass each solemn spot,
Where man gave laws to man;
Rome, Athens, ne'er will be forgot,
Her heroes never can.

Here God himself his law explain'd
When he our nature took;
By deed he every word sustain'd
As written in the book.

A tenfold interest deepens all—
He lived, and died, and rose:
There's not a place but would recal
My sins, which caus'd his woes.

And also that amazing love—
A deep and shoreless sea:
A mystery to all Heaven above—
He liv'd and died for me!

CHARMING SERPENTS.

Illustration of Psalm lviii, 4, 5, and Jeremiah viii, 17.

In the neighbourhood of Madras there are serpent charmers; a set of strollers, who carry with them a basket with these reptiles. After a kind of overture, the basket is opened, and the serpents slide out. As the artist plays upon a tambourine, a kind of tympanum, and accompanies it with his voice, the serpents raise themselves on their tails, and wave their heads to the tune; but upon the music ceasing, they return almost immediately to their native sullenness and malignity, when they are fenced into their prison, to prevent their darting at the company, as they leave them in full possession of their poison, which they sometimes prove, by suffering them to bite domestic animals. The species generally employed by these itinerant artists, is that called Hooded Serpents, the most venomous of the kind; and many of them are so gloomy, that it is a long time before the artist can prevail upon them to lift up their hoods to admit the sound of the music, or "hear the voice of the charmer." They therefore often cut the ligature of their hoods, which makes it fall below their ears. This effect of the sounds of music upon animals, is confirmed by what we see of the effects of drums and trumpets upon horses.

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

SECOND CENTURY.

27. Pothinus is believed to have been a native of Asia Minor. Being converted to the faith of Christ, and devoted to the Christian ministry, he was sent by Polycarp from Smyrna, as a missionary to France. Many Greeks had settled in Marseilles, on account of their mercantile affairs, which occasioned much intercourse with Vienne, Lyons, and other trading places: and Pothinus became the bishop of the Christian church in the latter city. Lyons was famous for its splendid temple and its altars, erected in honour of Augustus Cæsar, at the common charge of France. Idolatrous festivals were celebrated on the first of August, with great solemnity; when crowds assembled from all parts of the country, to witness the public disputes between learned and eloquent philosophers, the sports, shows, especially the gladiatorial conflicts, and the throwing of malefactors to wild beasts in the amphitheatre.

Pothinus continued labouring for many years at Lyons, until A. D. 177, when Aurelius Antoninus issued an edict against the Christians. Persecution raged dreadfully at Lyons and Vienne. Multitudes of martyrs for Christ were sacrificed, with every manifestation of brutal cruelty. Among the rest, Pothinus, now ninety years of age, was seized and condemned. The venerable old man was scarcely able to crawl: but he was dragged to the tribunal, and thence towards the place of execution. Ferocity in the idolatrous crowd vented itself in the most violent forms. Every man seemed to consider it impious not to do something against him, to avenge the quarrel of their gods.

Intending to make a second day's sport with him, they put him in prison, where his mangled body, too faint to retain his spirit, sunk under these barbarities, and he died almost immediately of his wounds. Thus Pothinus, the venerable bishop of the Christians at Lyons, breathed out his spirit to God his Saviour, A. D. 177.

THE MONASTIC INSTITUTION.

The monastic institution was originally among the Gauls a profession devoted to the cultivation of letters. The labour of transcribing books, which then formed one of the chief occupations of the monks, continued with them till the discovery of the admirable art of printing. It is thus that all impartial historians dispense only bare justice to the ancient monks by acknowledging, that it is to their care and industry we are indebted for the valuable remains of antiquity, as well sacred as profane.

"The sublime productions of the greatest geniuses of Athens and Rome found a secure asylum in the retreats of religion. The church, which had adopted the Greek and Latin languages, always used them; and without this circumstance an universal ignorance would have prevailed. Men were wanted, who, secluded from the world, would dedicate themselves to retirement by choice, to study by taste, to labour by duty; animated by the same genius and the same zeal, living in common under the same regulations, and who were willing to employ the leisure of their solitude in the laborious occupation of endless transcription.

"It is fortunate for letters that this body existed; no individuals whose minds would have been occupied by domestic affairs and public matters, could have given themselves up to such long and painful labours; and this is one of the chief advantages we have derived from these industrious and learned solitaries, who, from the depth of their retreat, enlightened the world which they had quitted."—D' Israeli.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ENOCH.

The Ministry of Enoch.

From the brief notice of Enoch in the book of Genesis, we might be led to conclude, that he was a person of distinguished excellence: but there is nothing related of his public character. The information which is afforded by the apostles concerning him, is much more comprehensive and satisfactory than that which is given by Moses. By the latter we are simply told that "Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him." The apostles Paul and Jude present him to our contemplation under two distinct points of view; as an exemplary saint, and as an inspired prophet. Paul commends him as an eminent believer under the patriarchal dispensation of mercy, as one who obtained a good report through faith, having seen afar off the promises relating to the Messiah; one who was persuaded of them, and embraced them, "confessing himself a stranger and pilgrim upon the earth." Heb. xi, 13.

Enoch is exhibited to us by Jude, as an illustrious prophet of the Lord, foretelling the revelation of Christ in awful grandeur, to the confusion of infidels, and to the condemnation of the ungodly. "Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold the Lord cometh, with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." Jude 14, 15.

This affecting prediction is a clear and awakening description of the day of judgment; that day of terror, in which the final destinies of all mankind shall be unalterably fixed; when every man shall be rewarded according to his works: that fearful day, "when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power; when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." 2 Thess. i, 7—10.

Enoch beheld with grief the prevailing wickedness of the Cainites: but more especially the increasing infidelity of many among "the sons of God." His holy soul was stirred within him to endeavour to reclaim them, and to arrest the progress of iniquity. What contests he had with the daring blasphemers of his time, as they are alluded to by Jude, we are not particularly informed; but it seems probable that he was opposed by many, and that with insulting scoffs and threatenings.

Nor would this benevolent and zealous prophet be less solicitous to establish the minds of the sincere but timid, in their adherence to the truth of God, than to rebuke and warn the disobedient. He would be conspicuous on their days of sacred festivity, and their solemn anniversaries, in leading the devout worshippers to the footstool of the Divine mercy, and in officiating in his extraordinary character as the priest and prophet of God.

Many had become apostates from the worship of God, and joined "the sons of men" in their profaneness and wickedness; yet a holy band, a few remained faithful in their allegiance to their God.

"Already on a neighbouring mount they stood,
Apart, amidst the valley, girt with wood,
Whose open summit rising o'er the trees,
Caught the cool fragrance of the evening breeze.
The Patriarchal worshippers were met;
The lamb was brought, the wood in order set
On Adam's rustic altar, moss o'ergrown,
An unwrought mass of earth—unbedded stone;
Long known and hallow'd, where, for man's offence,
The earth first drank the blood of innocence;
When God himself ordain'd the typic rite
To Eden's exiles, resting in their flight.
Foremost amidst the group was Enoch seen,
Known by his humble port, and heavenly mien:
On him the priest's mysterious office lay,
For 'twas the eve of Man's transgression day;
And him had Adam, with expiring breath,
Ordain'd to offer yearly, from his death,
A victim on that mountain where the skies
Had first inhal'd the fumes of sacrifice.
In Adam's coat of skins array'd he stands
Spreading to heav'n his supplicating hands,
Ere from his robe the deadly steel he drew,
To smite the victim sporting in his view.
Behind him Seth, in majesty confest,
The world's great Elder, tower'd above the rest.
Around him in august succession stood
The fathers of the world before the Flood:
These, with their families, on either hand,
Aliens and exiles in their native land,
The few, who lov'd their Maker from their youth,
And worshipp'd God in spirit and in truth—
These stood with Enoch:—All had fix'd their eyes,
On him and on the lamb of sacrifice:
For now with trembling hand he shed the blood,
And plac'd the slaughter'd victim on the wood;
Then kneeling, as the sun went down, he laid
His hand upon the hallow'd pyre, and pray'd."
World before the Flood.

It is not unlikely, that even their solemn acts of public worship were the occasion of ridicule and reviling to the daring apostates: on account of which he foretold the approaching judgment, to terminate all the dispensations of God to man upon the earth, which seems necessarily to imply, that he was favoured with a view of the progressive steps leading to that dreadful catastrophe. As an inspired believer in the Messiah, he must have had some edifying conceptions of the future incarnation, the ministry, the death, the resurrection, and ascension of the blessed Redeemer; and he must also have beheld, by the Spirit, the enlargement of the Messiah's kingdom, the blissful state of those departed saints, who will come with him in the clouds of heaven as the Judge of all the earth, and also that eternal weight of glory that is reserved for the righteous in the presence of God.

Such sublime subjects occupied the elevated mind of the prophet; and they formed the theme of his public ministry to the infidel multitudes while here on earth, and his spiritual affections were in heaven long before his wondrous translation.

BISHOP BUTLER DYING.

The following anecdote is related of the last moments of Bishop Butler, the learned author of the "Analogy."

A few days previous to his death, when he was sitting alone with his chaplain, he thus addressed him:—"Perhaps what I am about to say may surprise you; but after all I have written,—after having viewed death calmly at a distance,—yet, upon its near approach, I am afraid to die." "My Lord," observed the Chaplain, "you forget that Jesus Christ is a Saviour." "Yes," rejoined the Bishop, "but how do I know that He is a Saviour for me?" "It is his own gracious declaration," continued the Chaplain, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." "Stop!" exclaimed the Bishop: "I have read that passage a thousand and a thousand times, but I never felt its value till this moment! Stop there, for now I die happy."

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER V.

Dear Madam,

Among the moral habits which require to be very early inculcated on the mind of a child, is that of speaking the truth. The period, indeed, at which attention to it ought to be commenced, is when he begins to express his ideas in sounds and words.

You will soon discover that your child will exhibit a comparative disregard of truth, and liability to falsehood. Be not alarmed: it is a universal characteristic of human nature in infancy. Do not indulge the unfounded despondency that he has any greater tendency to this vice than other children.

It depends indeed upon the systematic and unceasing watchfulness of the parent, whether a child shall be soon imbued with better habits, or through neglect or injudicious treatment, exhibit it in youth, and even retain it in after-life.

I will not attempt to inquire from what causes, remote or proximate, it arises, that little children are prone to falsehood; whether from the mere exuberance of the imagination, ignorance of the value of truth, native indifference to its value, or inherent depravity; my object simply being to suggest such rules as may, under the blessing of God, conduce to correct the disposition, and to establish a contrary habit.

These rules are all derived from the origin and nature of truth.

Truth originates in the right apprehension of the real nature of things; and it consists in rightly describing such right apprehensions.

In the first place, truth originates in right apprehensions of the real nature of things. Whether it be an object of the senses, or an object of mental perception, it is clear, that, in order to the act of describing it correctly, it must be rightly apprehended. If, for instance, it were possible to apprehend a tree to be a man, the person so misapprehending could never truly relate the incidents in which the supposed man was concerned. The same thing may be said of every other instance. Whence I deduce this rule, namely, that a child ought to be early instructed to apprehend correctly the nature of every object of the mind or senses. As soon as your child begins to speak, be most careful to teach him the true name of every thing. Beware of giving to any object a fictitious or defective name. See that he pronounces the true name for every thing, as nearly as possible. Never pass over an instance in which he miscalls any thing. As soon as he is sufficiently advanced, catechize him as to the qualities of external objects; such as the following—What figure is this table? What colour is it? How many legs has it? What colour is this baize with which it is covered? &c.

By this means a child ought to be made acquainted with the true names for all the qualities of every object in the material world, and even of his own abstract perceptions; and I cannot avoid thinking that this employment is the most profitable in which he can be engaged. He will learn to speak more readily: he will in consequence become possessed of a greater number of ideas: he will be able to express them more correctly by their corresponding words, than if he had books put into his hand, which as a toy are worse than useless, and as modes of instruction are to an infant exceedingly ineligible. A visit to an infant school will soon convince any one, that a child may learn to express by motions such words as perpendicular, horizontal, square, round, &c. By this method a child becomes instructed as to the names of those objects of the external world, out of which his abstract perceptions are formed, and with which he will be conversant all his days. Labour to make him acquainted with the names of them. Think no exertions too great to teach him the right names for them. Call him back again and again, if he mistakes. Make the wrong name or word for any thing troublesome to him. Make truth the easiest, because you never trouble him respecting it.

Secondly, Truth consists in rightly describing in language such right apprehensions.

Now there certainly are many causes whereby a little child is induced to describe wrongly his own apprehensions, that is, in a manner contrary to their nature.

This he will often do to save himself trouble; indolence being a fruitful cause of lying; from pride, from malice towards a playfellow or servant that has displeased him. This latter species is, properly speaking, a lie.

If, however, the rule deduced from the first-named principle be scrupulously observed, I am inclined to think that this lamentable instance will be of rare occurrence. Whenever it occurs, your duty becomes imperative and difficult.

You must not weep, or frown upon him, or strike him, or make him go down upon his knees and beg your pardon or pardon of the Creator, or tell others of his ill conduct: you will only confuse, and bewilder, and harden his heart by such methods. Act as in instances of the former nature. Retrace with him every circumstance: unravel the whole affair as privately as possible: cause him, when fully convicted, to give you a different statement: pause—leave him to the remonstrances of the inward monitor, and then act as if nothing had occurred. This conduct, if invariably pursued, and falsehood thereby rendered troublesome, will avail far more to his welfare than frowns and estrangement. As he grows up into life, do not allow him to describe the characters of other children or persons: this is a cause of lying. Do not allow him to talk much. Do not encourage him to relate anecdotes of the affairs or families in the neighbourhood. Prevent the perusal and recital of fabulous narratives. Carefully watch over his speech, and see that on every occasion, however insignificant, it is a faithful representation of what his mind really knows and perceives. Soon after he will save you the trouble, when he comes to feel the moral loveliness of truth, its convenience, its intrinsic excellence, and the odiousness of falsehood, both in the eyes of God and man.

I am, my dear Madam, &c.

Clericus.

AN EPITAPH

Found in the study of the pious Mr. Parsons, Vicar of Arnold, and Rector of Wilford in Nottinghamshire; to which a request was annexed, "that it might be inscribed on his tomb."

Reader,
The soul which inhabited the body that now lies at thy feet,
is at this time partaking
of the due reward of its deeds!
The state is now unalterable.
If good, it is happy, without fear of change;
If not, how great a mercy would it be esteemed,
even for a short time,
to be as thou art—
Capable of avoiding the torments of hell, and of enjoying the rest and pleasures that are at God's right hand for evermore!
Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation!
Oh! receive not the grace of God in vain.

DOMESTIC INFANT SCHOOLS.

INFANT SCHOOLS, with all their peculiar benefits, are designed especially for the poor. Their original institution, and their varied operations, are directed to the improvement of the children of those, who have but little time, or talent, even when they have the disposition, to promote the mental cultivation of their infant offspring. Incalculable good appears already resulting from these humble seminaries. But since this system is so admirably adapted to call forth the latent faculties of the infant mind, cannot some of its advantages be secured in the domestic nursery? May not some of its methods be practicable with two or three infants at home, or even with one?

These questions have been proposed by many of those who have seen the delightful progress of the children of the poor in these public institutions.

We are persuaded that much of the infant school system may be adopted in the domestic nursery. Lessons in Natural History, Scripture History, Geography, Grammar, Arithmetic, and other sciences, may easily and delightfully be inculcated on an infant of two or three years old. Instead of a heap of senseless "Dutch Toys," which are broken with a fall, or even a touch, let the child be furnished with the ingenious, beautiful, and instructive works of our British artists and scholars, whose talents have been employed in favour of the young, the expense of which will be far less, while the knowledge imparted by their means will be infinitely greater. We will mention a few of the articles we mean:—

Plates of Natural History, for Infant Schools—by Suter, Cheapside, London.

Illustrations of the Bible, for ditto, by ditto.

Cobbin's Grammar, Cobbin's Arithmetic, and Cobbin's Geography, for Children.

Manners and Customs of the Israelites, Journeys of the Israelites, and Stories for Children, by the Tract Society.

These, with others of a similar class, may be used with the greatest advantage by parents, governesses, or nursery-maids.

Preliminary, however, and indispensable to success, it is to be observed, that the nursery-maid, governess, or instructor of infants, should possess a sacred regard to truth and to the word of God, a love for learning, and be apt to teach. Judiciously has the Countess of Blessington said, "More depends on first impressions than people are aware of; and parents should, if possible, be more careful in the selection of their nursery-maids than of their governesses. The former often lay the foundation of evils, that the latter can never erase; and how often do we see a child emerge from the nursery devoid of that freshness and simplicity which constitute the greatest charm of infancy."

Natural History, by means of the prints prepared for Infant Schools, may be extensively taught. As a substitute for these, any outline of natural history with cuts may be usefully employed.

Scripture History may be profitably unfolded by means of illustrative cuts, and the mind of an infant filled with the whole outline of sacred story in the way of diversion and amusement. The History of England may be taught in the same way, by "All the Kings of England," on a coloured sheet, by Darton.

Geography. By means of a coloured map, a lively infant may be trained to delight in pointing out the sea and land, Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America, the East, the West, North and South, with a multitude of other particulars.

Grammar. A knowledge of all the various parts of speech, and the comparison of adjectives, may thus be taught, and made a most diverting exercise, by Cobbin's Grammar. The infant just beginning to speak will be delighted to find, and to call Mr. Positive, a tall man; Mr. Comparative, a taller man; Mr. Superlative, the tallest man of the three.

Arithmetic, by means of Cobbin's ingenious little work, may be made an amusement even for very young children.

We are aware that it has been said, and that it is still said, children ought not to have their memories burthened with lessons, which only disgust them with books and retard their real improvement. None can be more averse to over-burthening the memories of children than we are; but the plans we recommend are the methods dictated by nature: they do not load the memory; they treat the little creatures as rational beings, not as mere playthings; and while they present correct images before the mind, they at once call forth the opening mind they instruct, and produce the most untiring delight.

By means of illustrations of the Bible, an incredible measure of historical, moral, and religious knowledge may be communicated to the youngest child. Wicked Cain killing his brother Abel—Joseph sold by his naughty brothers—Moses the babe taken out of the ark of bulrushes in the water—Aaron and Moses striking the rock, to give the children of Israel water to drink—Little Samuel, whose mother brought him a little coat every year, while he lived with Eli, and prayed to our Father who art in heaven—Timothy the little boy, whose mother taught him to read the Bible;—these and others will furnish a rich variety of topics for instruction, even to the youngest children; and will be sources of amusement, delight, and profit, in the hands of a lively instructor.

We are not mere theorists and speculators: we are parents; and we have seen these lessons, and many others, learnt by children under three years of age, and the dear little prattlers delighted to tell papa all these things.

For example: the excellent Map of Canaan, published by the Sunday School Union, has served as an exercise, and an infant little more than two years old has delighted to tell papa where is the Great Sea—Judea—Samaria—the river Jordan—the Sea of Sodom—the Sea of Galilee—Jerusalem, where David lived—Nazareth, where Jesus lived—Bethany, where Martha lived—Gaza, whose gates Samson carried away—Idumea, where Job lived, and many other things. And what is there surprising in all this, when instead of burthening the memory, or abusing the child with nonsense, it is treated as a rational being, and these things made the texts and directories of lively stories?—Dr. Doddridge was taught the Scripture history by his mother, before he could speak, by means of the Dutch tiles in the fire-place; and her observations and comments produced a happy and lasting impression upon the mind of that great and useful man, to which, probably, generations unborn will be under unspeakable obligations through his imperishable writings!

DIGNIFIED CONDUCT OF A YOUNG LADY.

ELIZA EMBERT, a young Parisian, resolutely discarded a gentleman to whom she was to have been married the next day, because he ridiculed religion. Having given him a gentle reproof, he replied, "that a man of the world would not be so old-fashioned as to regard God and religion." Eliza immediately started!—but soon recovering herself, said, "From this moment, when I discover that you do not respect religion, I cease to be yours. He who does not love and honour God, can never love his wife constantly and sincerely."

STATISTICS OF LANCASHIRE.

Lancashire is a large maritime province, bounded on the North by Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Yorkshire; on the South by Cheshire; on the East by Yorkshire, and on the West by the Irish sea: it is 74 miles in length, and from 15 to 44 in breadth. It is divided into 6 hundreds, 63 parishes, 27 markets, and 894 villages.

Along the coast the land in Lancashire is low and flat; but towards Yorkshire it becomes more diversified, and rises in many places to a considerable elevation. In Lonsdale the hills approach very near the coast, and the district of Furness is almost throughout wild and mountainous, Coniston Fell rising to the height of 2,577 feet above the level of the sea. The county has other considerable eminences, Pendle Hill, near Clithero, rising to 1,803, Rivington Hill, near Bolton, 1,545, and Wittle Hill 1,614 feet above the level of the sea.

Lancaster possesses much rich land, and some of the moors have been drained and enclosed, producing excellent oats; yet this county is not so famous for agriculture as some others. Farms are not large in this county, being generally about 50 acres each, few exceeding 200.

Lancashire has several lakes, the principal of which are Windermere, Coniston, Esthwaite, abounding with fish. Salmon in abundance are found in the rivers, the Mersey, the Ribble, the Wyre, and the Lerne. The rivers not naturally navigable have been rendered so, and canals have been formed that unite all parts of the county in one continued water communication. Here indeed originated that great system of canal navigation, which has in two distinct places united the western and the eastern seas, joined the Severn with the Thames, and the Mersey with the Humber, and these main lines with each other: here it first began to display its vast influence over the trade, wealth, and population of the country. The canal from Sawkey, near Warrington, to the Mersey, was the first that was finished, and perhaps the first complete canal in the kingdom.

Of all the productions of Lancashire, the single mineral, coal, is by far the most important. This occurs chiefly in the southern and middle divisions, where inexhaustible fields of it are found. It is the great abundance of this article which has drawn capital to this part of the kingdom; forming those immense establishments, which, within the last century especially, have completely changed the face of the country, and though naturally barren, have filled it with population, and prodigiously augmented its wealth. The ample supply of water too, though unfavourable to agriculture, is highly advantageous to manufactures. Such, in point of fact, are the advantages of this particular district of the country, that the raw material is transported from America, and from India—distant from 4,000 to 12,000 miles!—large quantities of it to be returned in a finished state to the very places of its production!

The manufactures of Lancashire are most extensive and various, consisting of silk, woollen, linen, hats, stockings, pins, needles, nails, tools, watches, earthenware, porcelain, paper, &c. But the cotton trade especially has risen here with a rapidity, and to an extent, beyond all example. Manchester is the principal seat of this vast manufacture. Hence it spreads on all sides, to the south and east into Cheshire and Yorkshire; but especially to the north and west, over the greatest part of Lancashire, extending from Furness to Derby on the one hand, and from Liverpool to Halifax on the other. A variety of other employments, as those of bleachers, dyers, printers' tool makers, engine and machine makers, &c., depend for their support on this manufacture. There are also in this county large works for smelting iron and copper, for blowing common glass and for casting plate-glass, for manufacturing white lead, lamp black, vitriolic acid, &c.

The commerce of Lancashire consists chiefly in the exchange of its manufactured goods, and Liverpool engrosses nearly the whole of the export trade: Liverpool, with respect to commerce, is the first port in the kingdom, after London. The exports, besides the great branch to Ireland, are chiefly to America and the West Indies; also to the East Indies, Africa, the Mediterranean, Spain, Portugal, &c. The principal imports are cotton-wool, wools, sugar, tobacco, rice, timber, corn, &c. Trade inland also is very considerable, chiefly subservient to the various manufactures, and in the transportation of coal, limestone, slate, &c.

HINDOO FESTIVALS.

Cocoa-nut Day, a great festival with the Hindoos, occurs at the full moon, at the breaking up of the monsoon, when the sea is supposed to have become open for navigation. On that day, the 17th of August, about sunset, an immense number of persons collected upon the esplanade at Bombay to witness the singular ceremony. The English residents repaired thither as to a spectacle, and all the principal natives attended in their carriages and in very magnificent dresses, in honour of the day, with great profusion and display of pearls and jewels. At a certain hour, one of the principal Bramins, advancing a little way into the sea, threw a gilt cocoa-nut into the water, which was a signal for the multitude to follow his example, and thousands of cocoa-nuts were instantaneously seen swimming in every direction, each person being eager to make his offering.

At Poorbunder, on the coast of Guzerat, cocoa-nut day is kept with great solemnity. The Bramins pronounce a benediction over the cocoas, and after staining them with vermilion, deliver them to the attendant crowd, whose foreheads they also stain in like manner. In the evening the chief holds a court upon the sea-side, sitting upon a carpet, surrounded by all his ministers and chief men, and makes presents of turbans to the principal merchants. The whole shore is brilliantly illuminated with flambeaux and torches; and at a certain hour, when the moon is quite at the full, or when she crosses the meridian, the chief rises, and, followed by all his attendants, walks into the sea, into which he casts one of the sacred cocoa-nuts, and immediately every one follows his example, whilst several of the natives fearlessly plunging in, regardless of the imminent danger of the cocoa-nuts showering about them in every direction, secure as many of them as they can.

Whether this fruit, after the blessing of the Bramin, is supposed to possess any particular virtue, I do not know; but the natives on the sea-shore watching the full moon, the votive offerings of fruit in honour of the change of the season, and the ocean, which for months had been vexed by storms and tempests, becoming calm and placid, altogether form a scene highly picturesque and striking.

MY FLEETING DAYS.

"My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle."—Job vii, 6.

"When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee."—Isaiah xliii, 2.

Then hasten on, ye rolling years,
With your resistless tide,
That bears me, though midst pain and tears,
To Jordan's darkened side.

There will my Father guide me through,
Though stormy be the wave!
And make me more than conqueror too,
Triumphant o'er the grave.

His promises of love secure
That those who trust his might,
Shall surely to the end endure,
And triumph in his sight.

If of that love still further proof,
Yet doubting, thou wouldst know,
Look! look at yonder cross, nor doubt
What Jesus died to show.

AN ESSAY ON THE CULTIVATION OF THE INFANT MIND;

Forming an Epitome of the System of Infant Education; with copious Lessons, and Rhymes for Infants' Schools. By J. R. Brown, Master of the Spitalfields Infants' School. Fourth edition, enlarged and corrected. London: Simpkin & Marshall. 12mo. bds. pp. 134.

Mr. Brown is a man of intelligence and piety; and by this Essay he has laid the Public under great obligations to him. In this small pamphlet he has given an edifying exposition of his method of infant education, and demonstrated the possibility of inculcating the most important lessons upon the youngest child. Parents and Teachers will find it a very valuable manual, from which they will derive much information on that subject in which they are so deeply interested, and many important hints which may be admirably applied in the nursery. Our article on "Domestic Infant Schools" will supersede further remarks on this useful little work.

DAILY DYING.

In the history of Charles V, emperor of Germany, we are told, that he resigned the reins of government, and retired into a convent in Spain. There he resolved to celebrate his own obsequies. For this purpose, he ordered his tomb to be erected in the chapel of the monastery of St. Justus. Thither, at the proper season, all his domestics were ordered to march in funeral procession, carrying in their hands black tapers. The Emperor followed in his shroud. Arrived at the place, he was laid in his coffin. The service of the dead was performed: and when the ceremonies were ended, the doors were closed, the attendants dismissed; and he was left alone. After remaining some time in the grave, he arose, and repaired to his apartment, filled with all those awful reflections which the solemnity was adapted to inspire. Now we do not recommend the practice of such a gloomy and abject superstition. But would it be improper or useless for you, in imagination, to suppose yourselves—entering your sick chamber—stretched upon a bed of languishing—dying—wrapped up in your winding-sheet—laid in your coffin—friends for the last time touching your cold cheek with their lips, or the back of their hand—the lid screwed down—and your remains borne through the mutes at the door—and accompanied to the grave—and left there—while the spirit had returned to God who gave it? In endeavouring to realize this condition, I ask, how would the world appear? What would you think of the censure or praise of men? What, of many of your pursuits? Would not this check the levity of the mind, and the pride of life?—Would not also this contemplation break the force of surprise?

"Familiar thoughts can slope the way to death," but if we think not of the subject, the event will be a sudden precipice.—Jay.

ESTIVAL OF THE SWINGING OF KRISHNA, IN THE TEMPLE OF JUGGERNAUT, IN ORISSA, ON THE BAY OF BENGAL.

HISTORIC TRADITIONS OF KRISHNA.

RISHNA, whose swinging festival is represented in our graving, from a drawing of Lieut.-col. Phipps, a deity of the Hindoos. To detail all the absurd, ntradictory, and abominable traditions, which exist pecting him, would far exceed the limits of our rk, and at the same time weary and disgust our ders.

God graciously gave to our first parents the promise a Saviour, who in the latter ages should appear upon the earth as the Redeemer of mankind. This same promise he repeated to the succesive patriarchs, in the belief of which they lived in peace, and died in immortal hope. We may therefore well suppose, that traditions of that same revelation would be promulgated all over the earth, especially among the descendants of Shem and Japhet, in the East and West. Hence we find Job and Balaam speaking of the Redeemer whom they expected, and the Eastern Magi seeking the incarnate Saviour at the time of his birth in Judea.

Captain Wilford observes, "A short time before the birth of CHRIST, not only the Jews, but the Romans, on the authority of the Sybilline books, and the decision of the sacred college of the Etrurian augurs, were all of opinion, that this momentous event was at hand. This was equally the case in the East, and a miraculous star directed the holy men, who were living in anxious expectation, where to find this heavenly child. At that time the Emperor of India, uneasy at these prophecies, which he conceived portended his ruin and the loss of his empire, sent emissaries to inquire whether such a child was really born, in order to destroy him: and this happened in the year 3101 of the Cali-yuga, which is the first year of the Christian era. But the Hindus fancy, that these prophecies were fulfilled in the person of Krishna.—The Hindu traditions, concerning this wonderful child, are collected in a treatise called the Vicram acharitra, or history of VICRAMA-DITYA."—"When I said, that the Hindus conceived that the prophecies concerning a Saviour of the world were fulfilled in the person of Krishna, I do by no means wish to convey an idea that he was CHRIST, from whom he is as distinct a character and person as Joshua; and whose name, with the general outline of his history, existed long before CHRIST. "Yet the prolix account of his life," to use the words of Sir William Jones, "are filled with narratives of a most extraordinary kind, and most strangely variegated. This incarnate deity of Sanscrit romance, was not only cradled, but educated among shepherds. A tyrant at the time of his birth ordered all the male infants to be slain. He performed amazing, but ridiculous miracles; and saved multitudes, partly by his miraculous powers, and partly by his arms: and raised the dead, by descending for that purpose into the infernal regions. He was the meekest and best tempered of beings, washed the feet of the Brahmans, and preached, indeed sublimely, but always in their favour. He was pure and chaste in reality, but exhibited every appearance of libertinism. Lastly, he was benevolent and tender, and yet fomented and conducted a terrible war." The Yadus, his own tribe and nation, were doomed to destruction for their sins, like the descendants of YAHUDA, or YUDA, which is the true pronunciation of JUDA. They all fell, in general, by mutual wounds, a few excepted, who lead through Jambu-dwipa a miserable and wretched life. There are some to be found in Gurjarat: but they are represented to me as poor and wretched. This motley story must induce an opinion (Asiat. Res. vol. i, p. 2, 3), that the spurious gospels, which abounded in the first ages of Christianity, had been brought to India, and the wildest parts of them ingrafted upon the old fable of Krishna." Several learned Missionaries are also of that opinion, though they carry the comparison too far. The real name of KRISHNA was CANEYA, and he was surnamed KRISHNA, or the black, on account of his complexion. The Hindus having once fixed the accomplishment of these prophecies to a period greatly anterior to the Christian era, every thing in their books was either framed, or new modelled accordingly; especially in the Purányas, every one of which is greatly posterior to our era; though many legends, and the materials in general, certainly existed before, in some other shape." Asiat. Res. vol. x.

Mr. Ward, a learned Baptist missionary, mentions many of the absurd traditions respecting this Hindoo divinity. In the Church Missionary Papers, No. xxxix, it is remarked from Mr. Ward, that it is said of Krishna, "in his infancy, he deprived a giantess of her breath, who had poisoned her breast before she gave him suck. Soon after, when laid by his nurse at the door to sleep, he destroyed a carriage against which he hurt his foot. His nurse, when looking one day into his mouth, had a surprising view of the three worlds, with Brahma, Vishnoo, and Siva, sitting on their thrones. At the age of eight years, he took up a mountain in his arms, and held it as an umbrella over the heads of the villagers and their cattle during a dreadful storm, with which the angry king of heaven was overwhelming them."

Mr. Ward remarks, after referring to the abominable things reported of Krishna, "It is very possible, if any real Hindoo history could be discovered, that many of these facts would be found recorded in the life of a Hindoo king of the name of Krishna; which facts have been embellished by the Asiatic poets, till they have elevated the hero into a god!"

FESTIVALS IN HONOUR OF KRISHNA.

Mr. Ward gives the following account of these festivals: "At the full-moon in the eleventh month, a Swinging Festival is held. Fifteen days before the full-moon, the holidays begin: from which time, the Hindoos assemble in the night to sing and dance; and in the day, they wander about the streets, throwing red powder at the passengers, either with their hands or through a syringe. On the night before the full-moon, the ceremonies are performed; at the close of which, having besmeared themselves with red powder, they carry the god from his house to some distance, with music, dancing, fireworks, and singing. A bamboo, with a straw man tied to it, having been erected, they place the god here, and again worship him. After three hours spent in various sports, especially with fire-works, they set fire to the bamboo and straw, carrying back the image to the temple. Very early in the morning they bathe the god, set him on a chair, and then worship him, rocking him in his chair, and throwing upon him red powder. At noon these ceremonies are repeated with great splendour; when many offerings are presented, and the Brahmins are retained. About four, the festival closes by another repetition of the same ceremonies. The god is then washed, anointed, clothed, and put into the temple; where food remains before him for some time, and it is then given to the Brahmins."

Colonel Phipps remarks, "The image of Krishna is carried from the temple to a large platform, raised several feet from the ground, in the centre of which is a lofty and very curious arch of pot-stone, with various niches containing different representations of the god. The idol is placed in a chair of state, with another image on each side. The group is then fixed in a frame or small platform, which is suspended to the arch by brass chains, and swung backward and forward. A great number of Brahmins perform the worship: while others sprinkle rose-water on the idols, and throw about a quantity of red powder; and others, as a customary mark of state and distinction, move about some chowries, or tails of the Thibet cow, to drive away the flies. During these ceremonies, the platform is surrounded by a vast concourse of Hindoos worshipping the idol."

Mr. Ward speaks of another festival in honour of this god, thus: "At the full-moon in the seventh Hindoo month, a festival is held, during three nights, to celebrate the revels of this impure god! Each night, after the ceremonies in the temple are closed, the crowd carry the image out with much noise, music, singing, and dancing; and place it in a building which is open on all sides, and is gilt, ornamented, and grandly illuminated for this festival. Sixteen small images of Krishna are necessary on this occasion; but a very small gold image, about the size of a breast-pin, is placed as the object of adoration, and afterwards given to the officiating Brahmin. At the close of the festival, the clay images are thrown into the river.

Round the building, booths are erected, filled with sweetmeats and other articles, as at an English fair. Thieves and gamblers are very busy at these times. I have seen the grey-headed idolater and the mad youth dancing together; the old man lifting up his withered arms in the dance, and giving a kind of horror to the scene, which idolatry itself, united to the vivacity of youth, would scarcely be able to inspire. The Hindoo is here called to what he considers divine worship, and to a licentious festival; no one imagining, but that worship and adultery may be performed in the same hour!"

Who can read these humiliating representations of deluded and degraded human nature, without being deeply affected at the debased condition of millions of our fellow creatures? Who can reflect upon their being our fellow subjects, living under the British Government, and not be grieved at heart for their miseries? Surely every believer in Christ will not refrain from pitying these deluded heathens, while he prays that the word of God may be universally diffused, and that the Holy Spirit may be poured forth upon its readers to renovate, and sanctify, and save their souls.

WHAT ARE THE HINDOO VEDAS?

This question has been proposed by one of our readers, in consequence of his having heard of the published translation of them, by Ram Mohun Roy, a Brahmin of high caste, who has recently visited this country. We have not seen these specimens of Brahminical literature: but if we form an estimate of their worth and excellence, by the moral and religious condition of the priests and the people in India, we must rate them exceedingly low.

The Vedas are the sacred books of the Hindoos, believed to have been revealed by God, and called immortal. They are considered as the fountain of all knowledge, human and divine, and are four in number. The Rig-veda consists of five sections; the Yajur-veda of eighty-six; the Sama-veda of one thousand; and the At'har-veda of nine; with 1100 sac'has, or branches, in various divisions and subdivisions. The Vedas in truth are said to be infinite; but they have long been reduced to this number and order: the principal part of them is that which explains the duties of man in a methodical arrangement; and in the fourth is a system of divine ordinances. From these are reduced the four Upa-vedas, the first of which is said to have been delivered to mankind by BRAHMA, INDRA, DHAUWANTARI, and five other deities; and comprises the theory of disorders and medicines, with the practical methods of curing diseases. The second consists of music, invented for the purpose of raising the mind, by devotion, to the felicity of the Divine nature; the third treats of the fabrication and use of arms; and the fourth of sixty-four mechanical arts. The origin of these sacred tracts is involved in the mystery of mythology.

Sir W. Jones observes, "The Hindus firmly believe these to have been promulgated in the beginning of time by Menu, son or grandson of Brahma, or, in plain language, the first of created beings; and not the oldest only, but the holiest of legislators." He further adds, that "the whole dramatical arrangements of these writings are clearly fictitious and ornamental, with a design too common among ancient lawgivers, of stamping authority on the work by the introduction of supernatural personages." "Whatever opinion, in short, may be formed of Menu and his laws, in a country happily enlightened by sound philosophy and the only true revelation, it must be remembered, that these laws are actually revered as the word of the Most High, by many millions of the Hindus."

Many sublime passages are contained in the Vedas, but in this respect they are far inferior to the Christian Scriptures. As to the morality inculcated in them, it will bear no comparison with the blessed word of God; a specimen we give on the subject of the burning of widows on the funeral pile of their husbands, from the RIG-VEDA. "If a wife thus burn with her husband, IT IS NOT SUICIDE; and her relations shall observe three days' uncleanness for her; after which the Shraddha must be properly performed.—If she cannot come to the place, or does not receive an account of her husband's death, she shall wait the appointed days of uncleanness, and may afterwards die in a separate fire. —If she die in a separate fire, three days' uncleanness will be observed, after which the Shraddha or Pinda must be performed."

"O fire, let these women, with bodies anointed with clarified butter, eyes (coloured) with stibium, and void of tears, enter thee, the parent of water, that they may not be separated from their husbands, but may be in union with excellent husbands, be sinless, and jewels among women."

THE GUILT OF IMMORAL WRITINGS.

The dreadful waking, even in this life, to the sense of guilt, in having given to the world that which may make it less deserving of its Creator, is a degree of horror not to be dwelt upon; it must be beyond imagination: but the converse of this supposition is not in an equal degree soothing and consolatory; nay, it is an argument that must rather produce self-abasement, under the consciousness of the sad disproportion between our powers of enforcing precepts and practising them. It is easier to teach twenty what is good, than to fulfil the duty of one of the twenty in practising the given lesson. But this must not discourage us, nor can it be brought in plea against the enormous crime of disseminating what is bad. Authors may write atrociously, and die witty or senseless, but we are bound to believe the positive attestations borne to the end of some of these writers. Many have been permitted to die in a state that "gives no sign." God only knows his own purposes, and punishment is not the less heavy for being secret; but our guide is the testimony of those who have been in a state to afford room for conclusions.

When Rousseau, who was branded with the reproach of having "a hankering after Christianity," was taunted with the supposition, that had he known Fenelon he would have been one of his disciples, his answer—"I would have been his footman"—was worth pages of recantation, which the next freak of his mind might have retracted. And when the nurse who attended Voltaire in his last illness, refused to go to another patient till assured that the sick person was a Christian, we ask no further confirmation of the horrors with which his death is said to have been attended.—Memoirs, &c. by L. M. Hawkins.

THE CLERGYMAN'S COW.

The late Rev. Mr. Grimshaw had a cow, to which he was remarkably attached, and the thoughts of her often interrupted his most serious meditations: on this account he determined to dispose of her; and the farmer who came to view her, asked if she was sold for any fault; to which he replied—"Her fault will be no fault to you: she follows me into the pulpit."

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ENOCH.

Translation of Enoch.

"————— Him the Most High,
Rapt in a balmy cloud with winged steeds,
Did ——— receive to walk with God
High in salvation and the climes of bliss."
MILTON.

FOR the purpose of illustrating the nature and triumphs of faith, the apostle, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, records some of the noble deeds of the Old Testament worthies. Among these distinguished believers, Enoch stands pre-eminently conspicuous, as a devoted saint and a favourite of Heaven. By this record we are instructed concerning the manner in which that holy man finished his mortal pilgrimage. It was not by the debilitating progress of disease, that "the earthly house of his tabernacle was dissolved," that he became "absent from the body, and present with the Lord."

"By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him." Heb. xi, 5. The sentence pronounced upon Adam and his posterity, was suspended in favour of this devoted servant of God. The bitter pains of death were not suffered to afflict him. He endured none of the agonizing pangs of dissolving nature. His gracious Master, whom he had sincerely loved and faithfully served, delivered him from the will of his enemies, and took him from the earth, not permitting his body to become a lifeless, putrid corpse.

His translation was sudden. We have not been favoured with the detailed particulars of his removal: but it is evident, from the several passages of Scripture in which he is mentioned, that it was after some remarkable contest with the infidel blasphemers. He rose in the morning, and by thanksgiving and prayer renewed his vows of self-dedication to God. The spirit of inspiration fell largely upon him, and he went forth to meet the giant chief of the profane unbelievers; and while admonishing them of their wickedness, in persecuting the godly, "a chariot of fire, and horses of fire," appeared in the clouds,—the whirlwind arose,—the murderous designs of his persecutors were disappointed,—"and Enoch was not found, for God took him," as is believed by wise Christian writers, in a manner visible to many, and perhaps even in the sight of his deadly enemies.

A pious and learned poet supposes, that Enoch, with a party of his adherents, was brought before a chief of the Cainites, who endeavoured to effect his destruction.

"—————Anon, with universal cry,
The giant rush'd upon the prophet—"Die!"
The King leapt foremost from his throne;—he drew
His battle sword, as on his mark he flew.
With aim unerring, and tempestuous sound,
The blade descended deep along the ground;
The foe was fled, and, self-o'erwhelm'd his strength,
Hurl'd to the earth his Atlantean length:
But ere his chiefs could stretch the helping arm,
He sprang upon his feet in pale alarm.
Headlong, and blind with rage, he search'd around,
But Enoch walk'd with God, and was not found."
WORLD BEFORE THE FLOOD.

"He was not found," says the inspired writer: by which it seems manifest, that there was anxious search after him. His friends did not find him; some of whom being weak in faith, and not fully understanding this marvellous dispensation, appear to have sought him around the adjacent country, as "the sons of the prophets" sought for Elijah, during three days, after his translation. 2 Kings ii, 17.

"He was not found" by his enemies. With wicked hands and malicious hearts, they sought him for the purpose of murdering him, on account of his hated sanctity, and his faithfulness in preaching against their iniquitous courses. As Enoch was the principal patriarch of the world at that time, and a great preacher of righteousness and prophet of the Lord, his disappearance would excite universal surprise and inquiry, especially among the infidels who had not witnessed the miraculous deliverance. But their malignant inquisition after the holy man was in vain, "because God had translated him." His Divine Protector concealed him from their murderous hands; not in any lofty secure asylum upon earth, but in mansions of unspeakable felicity near his throne in heaven!

How stung with disappointment, and exasperated at being overcome, the ungodly persecutors must have been, on losing their prey, we can only conjecture; but God was the defence of his surviving servants; and though suffering, he preserved them from betraying his truth or dishonouring their profession.

Still it may be asked, how was Enoch taken to dwell in heaven, since "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God?" On this interesting question, our young friends will find satisfactory information in the writings of the New Testament. To qualify him for his exalted state of existence, as an inhabitant of the celestial Paradise, his body doubtless underwent an essential change, a transformation, equal to that which it is declared must pass upon those of the righteous, who may be found living upon the earth at the time of the second coming of Christ. "Behold," says the apostle Paul, "I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality." 1 Cor. xv, 51—53.

Considering how greatly we are interested in the awful realities of that day, it seriously becomes us, both as a duty and a privilege, to be living with it in our view. We should all be "looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, to redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works." Tit. ii, 13, 14.

May it be with all, especially our young readers, that "whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord, so that both living and dying we may be the Lord's." Rom. xiv, 8.

(To be continued.)

THE CHRISTIAN'S NEW SONG.

"And they sung as it were a new song." Rev. xiv, 3.

Oh! yes, there are times when the Christian can take
His harp in his hand, and its melody wake,
And tuning each note to an anthem of praise,
A song full of love and of triumph can raise.

Dear brethren of glory! saints, seraphs, we long
To join in your worship, to heighten your song;
With you, clad all glorious, in rapture to fall
Before the bright throne of the God over all.

Here, how weak are our efforts! how coldly we sing!
But our soul shall burst forth on our lips when we spring
To meet him, to see him! our Saviour! our King!
Heaven and earth shall then peal with the song which we bring.

Then hasten thy coming! Oh! hasten the day,
When thy sceptre of mercy all realms shall obey,
And the knowledge of God, like a banner unfurl'd,
All light and all glory, shall wave o'er the world.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER VI.

Dear Madam,

The present Letter will be devoted to the development and right culture of the moral affections. This subject is of the highest importance; for unless you establish habits of right feeling in the mind of your child, it will be useless to load his understanding with rules. The state of the feelings indeed, constitutes the real character of a human being in all his relations. Whatever he may know, he will generally, and assuredly in the end, act according to what he feels.

How often have we had occasion to observe, that a man may understand what is proper, and declaim upon it very eloquently, while it was evident from his own conduct, that a wide contrariety existed between the perceptions of his understanding and the inclinations of his heart. The utility of rules therefore, as applied to the reasoning faculties, chiefly consists in their tendency to influence and train the affections. Perhaps even the affections themselves are not so properly cultivated by mere didactic lessons, as by presenting to them their appropriate objects, and then, especially in the case of a child, superintending their action.

These observations I shall now endeavour to apply to a variety of topics.

1. Cultivate in your child feelings of universal kindness. A very ample and useful sphere for this duty is afforded by the inferior animals. From the earliest period, teach your child to behave kindly to these helpless creatures. Whenever he witnesses or hears of any act of unkindness towards them, never let it pass without an expression of your disapprobation. Let him be taught very early to exercise beneficent actions towards them, in feeding and protecting them. Let him learn that every animal and every insect is capable of feeling pain or pleasure as well as himself; that each of them has received the precious boon of existence from the hands of the same God who made himself; and that he and they are all equally dependent upon his bounty and protection. I approve of a parent giving a bird, or a dog or cat, where there are every means for its comfort and protection, to a child, who, if he be not at first its feeder, should nevertheless be considered as its owner and protector, and interested in its welfare.

Of course the spirit of this advice utterly prohibits the barbarous amusements of angling, and taking the nests of birds, to which boys are prone. He should be taught, that though fish are given for the use of man, they may be caught by a net, and thus may die without the needless pain inflicted by angling. Let him also know that a parent animal or bird has its paternal feelings. Read to him, when he can understand it, the lovely description of the nightingale in Thomson's Seasons, returning after its brief interval of absence, and finding its nest torn away and gone.

2. For similar purposes, make him your almoner to any deserving beggar or object of charity you may select. Show him that you do not give money or food indiscriminately, but to those whom you know to be distressed, and then endeavour to interest him in their wants and sorrows. Take care, however, that all he pretends to do and to feel is genuine. The habit of kindness will grow up, as gradually as a flower expands its loveliness; but if ever he learns to affect it, because he sees it pleases you, which if you are too evidently zealous he will soon do, then his general sincerity is endangered.

3. Let him especially be taught respectful and considerate attention to servants; to ask their assistance with proper terms, and invariably to thank them audibly; to recognize their rights; to avoid giving them needless trouble.

4. As he advances in age and strength, he will of course mingle with his equals, and perhaps with his superiors and inferiors, in age, wealth, and station.

His treatment of these three classes will need all your assiduity to regulate. You will of course have uniformly taught him, both by your conduct and language, that the only just causes of respect or of disapprobation, are to be sought in the moral, intellectual, and spiritual attainments of the individual. He will never have heard you praise any one for their wealth or their beauty. He will never witness in you a change of manner to different persons, or a peculiar delight in the society or notice of a noble neighbour. One of the most valuable qualities of a great public school is, in my opinion, that among the boys all those extrinsic circumstances, which the sordid and senseless and worldly part of mankind blindly reverence, are utterly merged. The son of the peer would soon, I apprehend, find himself reminded in a public school, that his father's title or his own, commanded no particular respect. Such indeed is the right feeling which is cultivated, and which pervades those places of education, that for a boy to be particularly assiduous in gaining the acquaintance of another boy of noble birth would soon be noticed, his true motive discerned, and then wo be to the youthful sycophant!

Still, however, owing to the natural inequalities of society, your son must have superiors, equals, and inferiors. Teach him, however, to be the same to all: not dastardly overwhelmed by the presence of a superior, for he will then assuredly be haughty and distant towards his equals, and tyrannical to his inferiors. Labour to make him love truth and honesty, and to abhor flattery, and he will have a noble genuine freedom of manners, which the upper classes of society are well known to approve much more than abject adulation. Lavater has beautifully said in his maxims, dedicated to Fuseli, that he should be on his guard against that man whose manners change upon the introduction of a superior, or who expresses a wish to be gone when the arrival of such a person is announced. On the contrary, let your son never imagine that he must show his detestation of such meanness and baseness of heart by airs of bluntness or indifference to his superiors. He never will be tempted to do this, if from early life you have taught him to behave himself properly, and in the same mode, and according to truth and honesty, to every person. For a similar reason I should, however, be careful that he did not make a confidant of a person decidedly his inferior; for I should suspect that such a friend might be apt to submit to him, and thus to foster the fatal passion of pride, which would expose him to unfailing mortifications among his equals, and perhaps tend to make him a misanthrope, and a malicious, sullen man.

In a word, teach your son to think for himself. Do not impose on him your judgment, but help him, by the exercise of his own powers, to come to a similar conclusion. Help him to think and reason perpetually on all subjects: then let him act upon his own opinion. Teach him to value things as they are; to value moral, intellectual, and spiritual things supremely and universally; to estimate money, fame, titles, as gifts of God, which demand from the possessor that they all be employed according to the Divine will. Never do or say things which can make him discontented with his own station. Always be yourself cheerful and contented. Teach him at every turn to consider the rights of others, what they will expect, and what they can properly require. Make him very studious of these particulars: teach him that he is not to act in any case because others do so, but only for reasons which he can give, and which he approves upon just grounds: that he is to adhere to what is right and useful in itself, whatever others may do, or say, or think, or however they may look. Then be assured you will have done what you can to have rendered your child useful, happy, respected, and successful.

There are yet other particulars of a similar nature, which I reserve for my next Letter; and am,

Dear Madam, your, &c.
CLERICUS.

NOURISHMENT AND GROWTH OF ANIMALS.

"ALL the animals of the creation, as well as the plants, have their original nourishment from these simple materials—earth and water. For all the animal beings which do not live upon other animals, or the produce of them, take some of the vegetables for their food; and thus the beasts of prey are originally indebted to the plants and herbs, i. e. to the earth, for their support, and their drink is the watery element. That all flesh is grass, is true in the literal as well as the metaphorical sense. Does the lion eat the flesh of the lamb? Doth the lamb suck the milk of the ewe? But the ewe is nourished by the grass of the field. Does the kite devour the chicken, and the chicken the little caterpillars or insects of the spring? But these insects are ever feeding on the tender plants and the green products of the ground. The earth moistened with water is the common nurse of all. Even the fishes of the sea are nourished with some green vegetables that spring up there, or by preying on lesser fishes which feed on these vegetables.

"But let us give our meditations a loose on this entertaining subject, and we shall find numerous instances of wonder in this scene of Divine contrivance.

"1. What very different animals are nourished by the same vegetable food! The self-same herbage or fruits of the earth, by the divine law of nature and providence, are converted into animated bodies of very distinct kinds. Could you imagine that half the fowls of the air, as different as they are, from the crow to the titmouse, should derive their flesh and blood from the productions of the same tree, where the swine watches under the boughs of it, and is nourished by the droppings of the fruit? Nor need I stay to take notice what numerous insects find their nests and their food all the summer season from the same apples or apricots, plums or cherries, which feed hogs and crows, and a hundred small birds. Would you think that the black and the brindled kine, with the horses both grey and bay, should clothe themselves with their hairy skins of so various colours, out of the same green pasture where the sheep feeds, and covers himself with his white and woolly fleece; and at the same time the goose is cropping part of the grass to nourish its own flesh, and to array itself with down and feathers? Strange and stupendous texture of the bodies of these creatures! that should convert the common green herbage of the field into their different natures, and their more different clothing. But this leads me to another remark.

"2. What exceeding great diversity is found in the several parts, limbs, and coverings, even of the same creature! An animated body is made up of flesh and blood, bones and membranes, long hollow tubes with a variety of liquors contained in them, together with many strings and tendons, and a thousand other things, which escape the naked sight, and for which anatomy has hardly found a name: yet the very same food is, by the wondrous skill and appointment of the God of nature, formed into all these amazing differences. Let us take an ox to pieces, and survey the wondrous composition. Besides the flesh of this huge living structure, and the bones on which it is built, what variety of tender coats and humours belong to that admirable organ, the eye! How solid and hard are the teeth which grind the food! How firm the general ligaments that tie the joints of that creature together! What horny hoofs are his support, and with what different sorts of horny weapons has nature furnished his forehead! Yet they are all framed of the same grassy materials! The calf grazes upon the verdant pasture, and all its limbs and powers grow up out of the food to the size and firmness of an ox. Can it be supposed that all these corpuscles, of which the several inward and outward parts of the brute are composed, are actually found in their different and proper forms in the vegetable food?

"Does every spire of grass actually contain the specific parts of the horn and the hoof, the teeth and the tendons, the glands and membranes, the humours and coats of the eye, the liquids and solids, with all their innumerable varieties in their proper and distinct forms? This is a most unreasonable supposition, and vain philosophy. No, it is the wisdom of the God of nature that distributes this uniform food into the several parts of the animal by his appointed laws, and gives proper nourishment to each of them.

"Again, 3dly. If the food of which one single animal partakes be never so various and different, yet the same laws of motion which God has ordained in the animal world, converts them all to the same purposes of nourishment for that creature. Behold the little bee, gathering its honey from a thousand flowers, and laying up the precious store for its winter food. Mark how the crow preys upon a carçass; anon it crops a cherry from the tree; and both are changed into the flesh and feathers of a crow. Observe the kine in the meadows feeding on a hundred varieties of herbs and flowers, yet all the different parts of their bodies are nourished thereby in a proper manner: every flower in the field is made use of to increase the flesh of the heifer, and to make beef for men: and out of all these varieties there is a noble milky juice flowing to the udder, which provides nourishment for young children. So near akin is man, the lord of the creation, in respect of his body, to the brutes that are his slaves, that the very same food will compose the flesh of both of them, and make them grow up to their appointed stature. This is evident beyond doubt in daily and everlasting experiments. The same bread-corn which we eat at our tables will give rich support to sparrows and pigeons, to the turkey and the duck, and all the fowls of the yard: the mouse steals it, and feeds on it in his dark retirements; while the hog in the sty, and the horse in the manger, would be glad to partake. When the poor cottager has nursed up a couple of geese, the fox seizes one of them for the support of her cubs, and perhaps the table of the landlord is furnished with the other to regale his friends.

"Nor is it an uncommon thing to see the favourite lapdog fed out of the same bowl of milk which is prepared for the heir of a wealthy family, but which nature had originally designed to nourish a calf: the same milky material will make calves, lap-dogs, and human bodies.

"How various are our dishes at an entertainment? How has luxury even tired itself in the invention of meats and drinks in an excessive and endless variety? Yet when they pass into the common boiler of the stomach, and are carried thence through the intestines, there is a white juice strained out of the strange mixture, called chyle, which from the lacteal vessels is conveyed into the blood, and by the laws of nature is converted into the same crimson liquor. This being distributed through all the body by the arteries, is further strained again through proper vessels, and becomes the spring of nourishment to every different part of the animal. Thus the God of nature has ordained, that how diverse soever our meats are, they shall first be reduced to a uniform milky liquid, that by new contrivances and divine art, it may be again diversified into flesh and bones, nerves and membranes.

"How conspicuous, and yet how admirable are the operations of Divine wisdom in this single instance of nourishment! But it is no wonder that a God, who could create such astonishing and exquisite pieces of machinery as plants and animals, could prescribe such laws to matter and motion as to nourish and preserve the individuals, as well as to propagate the species through all ages to the end of time.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. I.—THE JUSTICE OF GOD.

If we believe that God is the moral governor of the world, and that he observes the conduct of each member of the human family, we cannot but feel convinced from reason and experience that he is also just. Dreadful indeed would man's condition be, were he under the superintendence of a being, who though almighty in power could be swayed by partiality. Where then would be that last resource of persecuted innocence, which is derived from the expectation of a day when true and just judgment shall be administered to all the sons of men? Where then would be the hope of the righteous, which is founded on the conviction that "God is not a man that he should lie," and that he will do what he hath said, and make good what he hath promised? And from what source could we expect to impress the mind of the sinner with awe, when there was an expectation placed before him of escaping, not only unpunished but rewarded? Happily for us, however, we can prove that our God is just; that is to say, that he will reward every man according to his works, conferring on the righteous the reward which is their due, and overwhelming the sinner in his own iniquity.

In illustration of this, I design to bring forward some few instances in which this attribute of the Almighty has been manifested.

1. The deluge sets before us a terrific example, that the all-wise Ruler of the universe, though long suffering and of great mercy, will eventually whet his glittering sword and come to vengeance. God had made man, and sent him forth into a world where all things worked together for his good; seed-time and harvest returned at their appointed seasons, and the valleys stood so thick with corn, that the voice of joy and thanksgiving was heard among them. One intention only seemed to actuate the whole of creation, and that was to contribute to the happiness of man: were I telling this to some happy spirit, who had never heard of the fall of Adam or the apostacy of the human race, would he not imagine that the being, on whose behalf so much loving-kindness was manifested, spared no pains to return the obligation, but by the strongest and most pleasing testimonies of obedience, witnessed that he felt deeply his Creator's loving-kindness. But what is the true state of the case? O hear it and blush, ye inhabitants of the earth! This merciful Benefactor of our race, from the habitation of his glory, where he sitteth in heaven over all from the beginning, looked down upon our world, to receive the thanksgiving which is his due. And what did he see? He saw the wonders of creation, that they were very good: he saw the beasts of the field, that they were fulfilling his commandment: he saw the heavenly bodies, that they were performing their revolutions according to his law. But when he looked on man, whom he created lord of the creation, he beheld that he had forsaken the path of duty, and was living in a course of apostacy, idolatry, wickedness, and impiety. O what a sight was this! A parent is grieved at the ingratitude of a child on whom he has lavished many cares; what then must God have thought of the ingratitude of those sinful beings for whom he created a world!

Lamentable was man's condition, nor was it possible that he could escape that curse of the Almighty, which is denounced against all the workers of iniquity. Idols and false deities had estranged the hearts of the people from their Maker, and as they had all gone out of the way and become abominable, he resolved to execute the fierceness of his anger upon them, and prove that he only is the Lord Omnipotent over the whole earth. Compassion now retired, and the loving-kindness of the Lord came to an end. Man deserved punishment, and God failed not to pour it on him. In a few hours the face of the sky was dark with the gathering rain, and the windows of heaven were opened. That world which had smiled so beauteously with the abundance of good things, presented only a wide waste of waters, and the lifeless corpses of the once gay and blasphemous inhabitants of the earth testified that God had whetted his glittering sword and come to vengeance.

But great as was the justice displayed in this act of the Almighty, it did not in my opinion exceed the following instance, which is intimately connected with the former. Though there were millions of disbelievers and men who cared not for God, yet one family, consisting of eight persons, preserved their allegiance, worshipped God in truth, and withstood the proud blasphemy of a world of sinners. Now great as was the destruction brought upon the wicked, this family was not forgotten. God interfered in their behalf, planned a way for their deliverance, and kept them in safety until his wrath had been fulfilled on the rebels: and from them a new world proceeded, and doubtless a far better one. Let us then take encouragement from this: and more especially let the young be induced to learn that lesson which it is so well calculated to teach, viz. to stand firm in the ways of godliness, notwithstanding the ridicule of scoffers. Had Noah thought within himself, "Why should I stand firm, while all around me have wavered? Surely the opinion of so many must be right?" his name would never have been known, "the waters would have drowned him, and the stream have gone over his soul." But as it is, he is looked upon by all mankind with veneration, as an example for us to profit by.

To this I might add the destruction of Sodom, when the fire-sheet of the Almighty's wrath "laid waste a joyous city, and made of a fenced city a heap." And it would be easy to dwell in terms of rapture on that mercy which would have "spared the city for ten's sake." My purpose now however must be, to declare, that for want of the stipulated number the justice of the Almighty was let loose, and the direst and deepest distress was brought upon the sinners. Yet here also one righteous man was found, and he was saved: yea God stayed for him. He said expressly, I can do nothing until thou art out of the city: and scripture says, that when Lot had entered into Zoar, then the Lord executed his fierce anger on Sodom and its wicked inhabitants.

THE RESURRECTION OF LAZARUS.

A strain of wail came stealing through
The groves of shady Bethany,
And whisper'd some, as nearer grew
That moan of heart anxiety,
'Tis Mary, mourning Lazarus dead:
Oh! who shall cheer her spirit's gloom;
Or rear in smiles the beauteous head
That droops 'mid tears on Lazarus' tomb?

There was a voice that head could raise,
There was an awful summons heard,—
"The Master's come," and glist'ning rays
Athwart the mourner's face appear'd.
"He's come, dear sister," gently moan'd
A voice less troubless in her ear,
"The welcome one, that never frown'd
On sorrow, and he seeks us near."

And on the weeping sisters went Toward the spot where Jesus stood,
Rob'd in his power omnipotent,
In form of man, in spirit God.
A sun-lit beam around him glows,
Refrig'rant joyous breezes play,
But weary steps, and careful brows,
Had been the Saviour's lot that day.

For he had left the quietude
And calm retreat Bethab'ra gave,
To sooth the sorrows of the good
And well-belov'd, at Lazarus' grave.
And blest believing souls there were,
That stood in his redeeming light,
The lov'd elect had come to share
His perils in that land of night.

Behold him stand; and oft his eyes,
That, oh! were softer than the day,
With God hold converse in the skies,
And sinners gaze their sins away.
And now that distant troublous note
Again is heard, and tears are shed,
And whisperings again denote
'Tis Mary weeping Lazarus dead.

She comes, she sinks low at his feet,
One falt'ring wild reproach she moan'd,
And sobs his heart-full bosom greet,
And hope grew pale, and Jesus groan'd:
"Oh! had'st thou been but tarrying near,
Our Lazarus had not then slept,
For he in thy affections dear
Was held, but now——" and "Jesus wept."

"Where have ye laid him?" and they rise
And guide him to the glooming spot,
Where Lazarus sepulchred lies
In mortal sleep; and while they note
The grief of that mysterious One,
Some doubting cry, "Behold the love
He bore for him that now is gone!
Can aught his fruitless woe behove?

"And could he not?—Our wond'ring gaze
Has seen e'en nature's bearings wean'd
From forth their steadfast general ways,
To serve his mighty turn conven'd.
The lame have leapt, the deaf have heard,
The speech-lorn man has sung his praise;
E'en death been scar'd at his bare word,
'Arise, be heal'd, and go thy ways!'

"And could he not have caus'd that one
So dearly lov'd, should not have died?
Dies so his power, when life is done?
Grows hope so weak, by death defied?"
Thus marvell'd they, as gath'ring round
The porch of that grim sepulchre,
Where murky silence reign'd profound,
And night and noiseless gloom were there.

The ponderous stone at Christ's command
Is slowly mov'd, and wearily,
By puny power of mortal hand,
And double night assails the eye.
"Alas! what would my gracious Lord?"
Thus Martha;—"Far beyond thy care
Lies Lazarus now, four days deplor'd
He sleeps, and grim corruption's there."

Then answerd He—"Hast thou forgot
My words; if that thou'dst faithful be,
My Father's glory, said I not,
In comfort thou should'st surely see?"
And then from forth his up-turn'd eyes
Awhile the fluent spirit trod
The noiseless space of utmost skies,
And commun'd with His Parent God.

A pause of anxious doubt reign'd there
And nature shudder'd as the sound
Of Jesus' voice swept o'er the air,
Unechoed in that pause profound,
"Ho! LAZARUS! ARISE! COME FORTH!"
Now hope and each huge eye-ball's gaze,
Immers'd in gloom of air and earth,
With fever'd expectation blaze.

Now quick retreating back they bound,
Now closely to each other cling,
For list! Almighty God! that sound,
And mark that mystic flickering!
'Twas nature groan'd, the belching earth
Resigns its tenant re-create;
'Tis Lazarus' self comes struggling forth
Towards their hopes, in life elate!

Oh! thou great God, the universe,
That erst from death and sin was free,
Its steadfast laws wilt thou reverse,
To show thy fallen creatures Thee?
Wilt thou do this to lead us there
Where death comes not, where tears are o'e
What answer greets the rapturous ear?
All this was done, and—ah! what more?

COLOSSUS OF RHODES.

ATRY is the foulest reproach of the understanding an. Yet this species of insult to the only living true God, may boast of some of the most splendid uments of human ingenuity and national riches. is the depraved state of the heart of man, that r the influence of ignorance and superstition, les and statues the most costly and magnificent been erected in honour of those who were gods of human creation.

LOSSUS of Rhodes was one of the most remarka- of these: it was a prodigious image of brass, de- d to represent APOLLO. This immense statue was ork of Chares, an artist of extraordinary skill, and e years were employed in its construction. It cost talents: which are reckoned at 322*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* each, nting to 96,876*l.* Colossus was in height seventy s; which, reckoning at twenty-two inches, would one hundred and twenty-three feet. Its propor- are said to have been uniform; and that scarcely an could grasp its thumb with his arms.

lossus was erected about 300 years before the stian era, at the entrance of the harbour at Rhodes, ching across the channel, so that between its legs ships could pass in full sail; and for the direction of vessels into the harbour by night, a light-house was held in the right hand of the statue! It rested its feet upon two triangular bases; supported by sixty pillars of marble. A winding staircase led to the top, from which the shores of Syria could easily be discerned; and by the help of glasses, which hung on the neck of the image, ships could be seen sailing on the coast of Egypt. After it had stood about seventy-two years, it was thrown down, and partly demolished, by an earthquake, B. C. 228 years.

Immense contributions of timber, corn, and money, were made by the neighbouring princes and states, for the relief of the Rhodians, especially by Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who accompanied his other gifts with three thousand talents! sent for the purpose of restoring the honours of Colossus. But the leading individuals of the city, having laid hold on the money, shared it among themselves, pretending that the oracle of Delphos had forbidden the reconstruction of the statue.

Colossus, therefore, lay neglected on the ground for the space of eight hundred and seventy-seven years: but A. D. 653, Moawias, the sixth Emperor of the Saracens, made himself master of Rhodes, and sold this statue to a Jew merchant of Edessa. It was broken to pieces and conveyed by sea to Alexandria, where the brass of it loaded nine hundred camels. Gibbon supposes, that this enormous quantity of metal, estimated worth 36,000*l.* of English money, must include the "hundred colossal figures, and the three thousand statues, which adorned the prosperity of the city of the Sun."

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

THIRD CENTURY.

28. Irenæus is believed to have been a native of Asia Minor, born about A. D. 120. He had attended the ministry of the venerable Polycarp at Smyrna, whence he was sent into France by that zealous minister, as a person well qualified to carry forward the work of evangelizing the Gauls. He learned their language, and became assistant to the aged bishop Pothinus, in Lyons.

Irenæus was a sincere lover of the souls of men, in labouring to promote whose interest, he thought no difficulties or dangers too great. Mr. Milner observes of Irenæus, "Nor is it a small instance of the humility and charity of this great man, accurately versed as he was in Grecian literature, that he took pains to learn the barbarous dialect of Gaul, conformed himself to the rustic manners of an illiterate people, and renounced the politeness and elegant traits of his own country, for the love of souls. Rare fruit of Christian charity!"

Before the middle of the second century, Christianity had been adulterated with many incorporations from the Jewish ceremonies and from the pagan philosophy, the consequences of which were, the prevalence of numerous heresies. Against these, Irenæus was exceedingly zealous, and for the purpose of extirpating them, he wrote a work in five books in Greek, of which there still exists a Latin translation.

At the period of the persecution in France, A. D. 177, in which Pothinus suffered martyrdom, Irenæus went to Rome, where he disputed with the heretic Valentinus, and his two colleagues Florinus and Blastus. On his return to Lyons, A. D. 179, he was chosen bishop of the Christians, who had been bereaved of their pastor Pothinus, and he continued faithfully devoted to his duties many years. We cannot ascertain correctly the date of the martyrdom of Irenæus: some suppose it happened A. D. 202, in the tenth year of the reign of Lucius Septimus Severus, the Roman emperor, who in that year published his dreadful edict against the Christians; or A. D. 208, when Severus made his expedition into Britain, and in his way visited Lyons.

Ancient Martyrologies inform us, "that Irenæus having been prepared by several torments, was at length put to death, and together with him almost all the Christians of that vast populous city, whose numbers could not be reckoned up, so that the streets of the city flowed with the blood of Christians."

Florinus attended the ministry of Polycarp when Irenæus resided at Smyrna; but he had departed from the true faith; to whom, in a letter, referring to the things they had heard from that devoted bishop, he says, "These things, through the mercy of God, I heard with seriousness: I wrote them not on paper, but on my heart, and ever since, through the grace of God, I have had a genuine remembrance of them, and can witness before God, that if that blessed apostolic presbyter had heard some of the doctrines which are now maintained, he would have cried out, and stopped his ears, and in his usual manner have said, O good God! to what times hast thou reserved me!"

Mr. Milner, in his "Church History," observes concerning Irenæus, "He doubtless agrees with al primitive Christians in the doctrine of the Trinity makes use of the forty-fifth Psalm particularly to the Deity of Christ. He is no less clear and sou his views of the Incarnation: and in general, not standing some philosophical adulterations, he cert maintained all the essentials of the gospel."

ON CLOSING THE EARLY LECTURE,

DELIVERED ON THE SABBATH MORNINGS DURING SUMMER AT ST. SWITHIN'S LONDON STONE.

The sacred morning dawns! and all within,
And all without, proclaims the peaceful rest
Of holy Sabbath day. All nature rests;
And every heart of man, on whom the Spirit
Divine has breath'd renewing grace,
Bounds forth with joy to meet its God!
But dark October frowns! and now no more
With earnest zeal the willing crowds repair
For early worship to the house of God.
How memory loves to dwell on those blest hours!
The lovely summer morn; the cloudless sky;
The silent streets; the ancient gates unclos'd;
A welcome seat for every willing soul.
Then, how the sweetness of the preachers' voice*
Call'd forth each holy feeling of the mind!
Ye servants of the Lord—who have so oft
Display'd his grace, and labour'd in his cause,—
May it be found, that these your works of love
Have been productive of extensive good;
And may the seed, which you have richly sown,
Spring up, and yield a rich, divine reward.
Bless'd are the invitations which you gave,
When pointing to the table of the Lord,
Spread open to each guest who felt his need!
Who that has ever knelt and ate that bread,
And tasted of that cup, but must have felt
A more than common flow of holy love
To Him who died for them on Calvary?
Blest mornings, ye have pass'd! and who shall Another spring—and who shall hear again
Those preachers' faithful voice, and taste the feast
Is known, O Lord, to Thee! and Thee alone!

DIVINE SKILL.

BY BISHOP KENN.

From glorious God an angel sent,
His vial on Euphrates spent.
Should he his empty vial fill
With Hermon dew, and thence distil
One drop on every stream which glides,
Till it in ocean last abides;

Yet every drop Omniscience knows;
And when it in each billow flows,
Can every drop entirely lave,
From its transfusion into wave;
Though distant as each polar shore,
Can to the vial them restore.

Should every drop to vapour rise,
Turn rain, hail, snow, when in the skies,
Thence falling, into earth be sunk,
And up by vegetables drunk,—
God all their shiftings can compute,
And into dew them retransmute.

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

Condition of Apprentices in Birmingham.

William ———, whose narrative we are confident will not fail to interest many of our readers, was an apprentice in the populous and flourishing town of Birmingham. It will, therefore, be proper, before we enter directly upon the memoir, to make a few general observations upon the Condition of Apprentices in Birmingham.

Of this distinguished place, half a century ago, a late eminent statesman (Mr. Burke) justly said, "Birmingham is the Toyshop of Europe." Its manufactories are numerous and extensive, and its productions are exceedingly various; so that they are known and celebrated throughout the savage, as well as the civilized parts of the world. Almost every kind of article fashioned by the dexterous hand of man, whether for ornament or utility, for the murderous art of war, or for the benevolent occupations of peace, is made by its skilful workmen. An intelligent noble visitor once said of it, "Whatever can be needed, from a needle to an anchor, may be obtained from the ingenious artisans of Birmingham."

About a century and a half ago, Birmingham was a small market town, with about five thousand inhabitants: now it contains that number of apprentices, in a population of above one hundred and forty-five thousand. Many of these youths, while advancing in the knowledge of the various useful arts, and carrying them to a height of improvement astonishing even to themselves, are lamentably negligent in relation to those things which belong to their everlasting peace. They perform their daily task of work, and nothing more is regarded: numbers of their masters are ignorant of the great salvation of Jesus Christ; nor are their parents, at least in many instances, any better acquainted with the gospel of his grace. Thus numbers of ignorant youth become an easy prey to the vulgar and immoral apostles of Infidelity.

There are, however, in Birmingham, not a few, whose parents fear God, and whose pious wisdom has been displayed in choosing for their sons, masters, who to the praise of the glory of divine grace, are to be found, decided believers in the gospel of Christ, and consistent, exemplary servants of the Most High God.

That this numerous class of youths, the Birmingham Apprentices, should receive special and public attention from the ministers of the gospel, cannot admit of the smallest doubt. It is of incalculable importance to themselves, in all their diversified relations in life, and of immense importance to the community in general. Nor have their interests been altogether lost sight of by the ministers of Christ, as their benevolent, evangelical, and beneficial labours, both from the pulpit and the press, have happily proved. The Rev. E. Burn, M. A., the Rev. J. A. James, the Rev. T. East, and the Rev. ——— Morgan, deserve honourable mention in this particular respect; and these reverend gentlemen are entitled to the thanks of their country, as among its most valuable patriots and friends.

The several large and well-conducted Sunday schools in Birmingham have been inestimably beneficial to the Apprentices, in restraining their wandering steps, in directing their doubtful ways, and in storing their susceptible minds with the blessed words of everlasting life, the doctrines of saving truth; and God has eminently crowned their operations, in numerous instances, for the glory of his holy name.

Every intelligent and zealous minister of the gospel, in our populous districts, has observed, that Sunday schools have been the most valuable and flourishing nurseries for the effectual replenishing of the churches of Christ; to which great numbers of the young of both sexes have been transferred, as "trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he might be glorified." Agreeably to the prophet's elegant imagery, they have been transplanted as "trees of righteousness," they have been beautiful as "the fir tree and the myrtle tree:" they have been raised up "to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off." Not a few of the most active, devoted, pious, and well-qualified teachers in the Sunday schools of that great town, have been Birmingham Apprentices. And some of those who are eminently endowed and zealously successful, as ministers of the gospel in their native land, or ambassadors of Christ among the heathen, in distant nations, once occupied that noble though humble station, in which they were "teachers of babes" in Sunday schools.

The writer of this memoir has known a goodly company of that class, whose names will live in the most truly honourable records of this world; and others, "who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seeking glory, and honour, and immortality" by faith in Jesus Christ, have filled the various stations of life in which they have been placed by an all-wise Providence, with the highest credit to themselves, "adorning the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things," rising to distinguished influence and usefulness among their fellow townsmen, being lasting blessings to the world, as well as shining and valuable ornaments to the militant church of God.

"AN OFFERING TO THE LORD."

A Clergyman who last year gave 10*l.* to the Church Missionary Society, as a return of first fruits to God, for a small living just given him, recently sent a similar donation to the same Society, as "An offering to the Lord." It was accompanied by the following remarks, which we think worthy of every Christian's consideration:—

"I send you a 10*l.* post bill, and will thank you to lay it on the altar of my God. He has been graciously pleased to add to my income by the lamented death of a beloved parent, who once said to me, 'I have done more for God this year, than ever I did in any one year before: and He has done more for me this year, than ever He did in any one year before,—and I desire to offer thereof to Him.' Blessed be his name! He has given me more than I either desire or deserve. An evil heart of unbelief whispers, 'You have a family of nine children, and you should provide for them, and leave others, more able, to give to the cause of Missions:—but faith answers, 'True, I have a large family, and I have had a larger; yet, though I have known difficulties, I have been enabled to provide for them, and I will try to trust a faithful God.' O that we did more seriously consider, 'Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price!' What is bought? Body, soul, spirit, gold, silver, houses, lands. Who bought these? Jesus Christ. At what price? His own most precious blood. How is it—how is it, that we do not consider this? If professing Christians would consider this, we should hear no more of a vast decrease in your income. Men can find money to expend upon themselves; but they are backward in offering unto God, although the gold and the silver are His. Is not this robbing God?"

"God hears the heart, though without words; but He never hears words without the heart."—Bp. Hopkins.

SCRIPTURE BIOGRAPHY.

ENOCH.

The Design of the Translation of Enoch.

We have beheld the humiliating sentence of mortality, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," remitted in favour of pious Enoch. His wondrous translation from earth to heaven, could not have been useless, even in relation to others: it must have been designed to answer some important ends, altogether worthy of the Almighty Author of so glorious a privilege.

The translation of Enoch was designed to strengthen the minds of the godly in their belief of a future life, to be enjoyed in a world of eternal felicity. A superior life in heaven seems evidently to have been promised to Adam while in innocency, as the reward of his continuance in perfect obedience: and though he forfeited it by his transgression, it was renewed with the promise of a Saviour.

Abel served God in the lively hope of glory, and soon entered into its blissful enjoyment. But ungodliness and infidelity increasing, multitudes denied the existence of a future, superior life. This denial was necessary for them, to agree with their general principles of irreligion and sin. Their consenting to the doctrine of a future state, would have been admitting the certainty of their own condemnation and punishment; which must have been most terrific to the minds of wicked men.

The godly, being persecuted and oppressed by the blasphemers, would naturally be discouraged; and without some signal display of sovereign goodness, their dejected spirits would have been overwhelmed in despondency: and while they saw that the servants of God, as well as the wicked, became enfeebled by disease and died, and their bodies were reduced to dust, it was not easy for them to believe confidently in a world of felicity and glory. But the state of happiness to which the emancipated spirit of Abel was exalted, was confirmed by the visible translation of Enoch. That man of God had long laboured to establish the discouraged minds of his pious friends in their belief and hope of eternal bliss. He had probably declared to them the Divine promise of his own translation, and appealed to that miraculous event as intended for a confirmation of his inspiring doctrine. The minds of the sincere worshippers of God would, therefore, be greatly invigorated, by the miraculous and visible exaltation of the holy prophet.

The translation of Enoch was designed to teach the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. That the bodies of the righteous should not for ever perish in the dust, was the gracious determination of Almighty God: but whether this was believed equally with the doctrine of a future life, does not appear. The body of Abel had lain in the silent tomb for nearly eight hundred years, and the mortal part of Adam had been reduced to the earth for fifty-seven years: but when the body of Enoch was glorified, it would either confirm the belief of the resurrection already known, or lead to many delightful contemplations respecting a state, in which the bodies of the saints would be honoured as well as their souls. Divine condescension would again be manifested in affording information on that wondrous condition, in which "mortality should be swallowed up of life."

"Now that the dead are raised," said our blessed Lord to the infidel Sadducees, "even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the LORD, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Luke xx, 3. From this testimony of Christ we learn, that the resurrection of the dead was a doctrine received and held by the pious patriarchs; and Job, in the age before Moses, professed his confident belief in it, as a source of the most solid comfort. The translation of Enoch would have a powerful influence in confirming and establishing the minds of believers in the resurrection; they would become far more zealous in impressing it upon their children, and the pious youth would be encouraged to maintain with increasing boldness the inspiring profession of their fathers.

The translation of Enoch was designed to afford instruction to the church in all succeeding ages. It has been a perpetual memorial to all generations, that the faith of God's elect is inseparably connected with the hope of future happiness, and a glorious resurrection. It is highly instructive and consoling to us to remark, that in each of the three great periods of the revelation of divine mercy, God has been pleased to encourage the faith of his people, by giving them an impressive figure of the resurrection:—the translation of Enoch under the patriarchal economy,—that of Elijah under the Levitical dispensation,—and at length, the triumph of the Lord Christ himself, "who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." 2 Tim. i, 10.

"It must have been an encouraging sight to the antediluvian saints, to see a guilty son of Adam withdrawn from among them, and lodged, not in a tomb, but in the bosom of God. It was a still more striking illustration of immortality, to behold the heavens opened, and divine messengers in flaming fire conducting a prophet into mansions of glory. But the grandest display of this doctrine is presented before our eye in the case of the Author and Finisher of faith, who, when he burst the bars of the grave, and ascended up on high, brought life and immortality to light, opening the gates of righteousness, that the nations of those who are saved may enter in. Enoch, Elijah, and Christ, in one view, may be compared with each other; but in all things, to the latter belongs the pre-eminence. Enoch and Elijah ascended as solitary individuals, and their ascension, except as an example, benefited only themselves. Christ ascended as 'the first-fruits of them that sleep,' and now that he is 'lifted up' he is drawing together his elect unto him, whom at last he will present before the presence of the Divine glory with exceeding joy."

May our young readers humbly adore the Divine goodness, in raising up Enoch, Elijah, and our Lord Jesus Christ; and confidently believe these gracious assurances that God will "quicken their mortal bodies by his Spirit dwelling in them." Let these wondrous facts inspire them with a resolution to receive the gospel of God as the warrant of their faith and the guide of their life, that having walked with God on earth, they may be received to the glorious habitations of heaven. "Like precious faith" with the patriarchs in the word of God, will purify their hearts, and secure the Divine guidance through all the snares and dangers of this sinful world; and having, as the friends of Christ, walked with God on earth, he will bring them to dwell with Enoch and Elijah, with the patriarchs and prophets, with apostles and martyrs, and with all the righteous in every age in the kingdom of his glory. There shall death and sorrow be for ever unknown; but they "shall eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God," and drink eternally "of the river of his pleasures."

Paulinus, when he was told that the Goths had sacked Nola, and plundered him of all he had, said, lifting up his eyes to heaven, "Lord thou knowest where I have laid up my treasure."—Cripplegate Lectures.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER VII.

Dear Madam,

The Creator has implanted several propensities in human nature, which are called good or evil as they are well or ill directed. He has, for instance, interwoven with our nature the desire of happiness. Abstractedly it is good; but when it operates to the disregard of the interests and welfare of others, it becomes greediness or selfishness. This is an evil to be avoided. Yet, in my apprehension, the task requires to be guided by a very clear understanding of the due limits of the habit you would establish.

Some parents and writers have advised, that in order to avoid the habit of selfishness, a child should on every occasion be taught to sacrifice his own interest to that of other children. I have known instances in which such lessons have been incessantly inculcated, and I have witnessed the result. The child has given away his most admired playthings, or conceded his rightful possessions of every sort to his companions. He has evinced a morbid dislike to the possession of any thing. At school this principle has operated in the following manner: he has been willing to talk or to be idle with any one who wished it; and thus to involve himself in the displeasure others merited for their disorderly or indolent habits. He has been willing to write the tasks of any other boy instead of his own, to go with them upon any excursion they required, and thus to merge his own convenience in theirs. I am afraid, that upon the principle that the character of the man is but an expansion of that of the boy, that the habit would continue in after-life; accordingly, such children will generally be the dupes of others. By ignorant people, who cannot discern the extravagance of the principle which has been inculcated into their minds, they have been deemed unfortunate, and even indolent; and in consequence of the unhappy adventures to which their principle exposed them, they may have been misrepresented and maligned.

> "Thus the heart unfit with the world to cope
> Is oft by that world degraded."

As such children grow up, they universally discover that no one but themselves is possessed of these romantic ideas; that all around them are taking care of themselves; that their own habits exposed them to the thoughtless rapacity of others, for which they often receive neither a return in kind nor a return in thanks. The mind of such individuals soon poignantly feels disgust with human nature, because it is not conformed to those rules which he had been taught to consider as the regulations of proper conduct, and retires from the world repining and misanthropical. Add to these evils, that such individuals are generally behind in the race of advantage of every kind, and are often to be numbered among the unfortunate distressed and even dissipated members of society. Yet in all this the child and the man was simply what it had been made by education; and indeed what else can any human being be? I speak of human nature, and of the influence of earthly circumstances. All these evils show that the principle was wrong. In order to explain myself more fully I observe:—

1st. That such is the constitution of human society, that every individual has certain duties to perform; but all these turn upon his doing his duty to himself. If then a man is to do good, he must get good. If therefore you weaken the propensity of acquiring advantage, and possessing advantage, you unquestionably injure the capacity of communicating it to others. Hence then, 2dly. I deduce the following rules and limitations, which appear to me needful to be kept in view.

That a child should be taught the right of property in every thing he possesses, and taught to estimate its value.

That very early the conviction should be established in his mind, that he has no right to any thing which he does not acquire by personal exertion, but that he has the highest possible right to enjoy every advantage arising from the exercise of his own prudence or industry. Along with these feelings, inspire a most sacred regard to the rights of his brothers and sisters, and his companions, and all mankind.

A plate of fruit, for an instance, is set before your little family and their juvenile friends. Teach your child, that in all such cases he has no right to choose out designedly the finest and the best. At the same time do not teach him that it would be the height of virtue to choose out studiously the worst of all. Let the direction rather be that he should never think which is best or worst, but take them as a matter of course, and be contented. All that propriety demands from any child, or from any man, in his intercourse with society is, such a regard to the rights of others, as may prevent an aggrandizement of himself at a conscious and designed disadvantage or injustice to others. He ought to give every one the opportunity of enjoying, but he himself also ought to enjoy—not to infringe upon the rights of others, and not to concede his own. Were this rule generally adopted (and the value of every rule is to be estimated by its general, rather than by its particular consequences), we should see every member of society exerting himself, without a wish to depend upon the exertions of others. Every mutual right would be respected, and consequently the happiness which results from the preservation of mutual rights would be secured. All this, you are aware, is consistent with kindheartedness: it is perhaps the most genuine species of it; for he wishes and does best for mankind, whose conduct is calculated, not so much by extraordinary generosity to exempt another from the necessity of honourable industry, but which gives opportunity and excitement to their own personal efforts on their own behalf. Kindness, generosity, good-nature, are terms which ought never to be applied, except in reference to favours showed to those who are honourably yet inefficiently using their own exertions. Under the influence of these feelings, I believe a child will be himself industrious, sincere, and happy; whereas blind indiscriminate profusion, or concession of just rights, neither do good to himself nor to others. Like the romantic of all kinds, it leads to disadvantage.

I remain, dear Madam, yours, &c.

AVARICE.

This passion is of all others the most baneful to the peace of its possessor, and to society at large. Revenge, though the most sanguinary, may be satiated, and hatred, the most virulent, may be appeased; but the lust of avarice can never be glutted, or the hand of the miser unloose his grasp, but with death. A miser is callous to every humane feeling, his heart is closed to the cries of distress, and the dictates of humanity and the pleadings of nature have alike no influence with him. Intent solely on the gratification of this fatal passion, his heart is hardened to the execution of any villany, and rendered capable of any baseness. A curse to himself and the detestation of his fellow-creatures, he passes his life in misery; and his death, instead of being a loss to society, is accounted a blessing; while his funeral draws forth the exultations of the populace, in the place of being honoured with the silent trickling tear of sorrow and affection.

NOURISHMENT AND GROWTH OF ANIMALS.

"Perhaps it may not be amiss to follow a track of pleasing amusements, which by a very easy and natural inference arises from the subject in hand, and which was very happily represented in a late conversation among some of the great and the wise. Theron, a man of wealth and figure, but unacquainted with philosophic science, sat in the midst of his friends of both sexes, in a stately room with rich variety of furniture. Among other conversation, Theron was complaining that he had heard it often said, how much we were all indebted to the country and the plough; but for his part, he knew no obligation that we had to that low rank of mankind, whose life is taken up in the fields, the woods, and the meadows, but that they paid their rents well that the gentlemen might live at their ease. Crito was pleased to seize the occasion, and entertained the gay audience with a surprising lecture of philosophy.

"Permit me, Theron, said he, to be an advocate for the peasant, and I can draw up a long account of particulars, for which you are indebted to the fields and the forest, and to the men that cultivate the ground and are engaged in rural business. Look around you on all the elegant furniture of the room, survey your own clothing, cast your eyes on all the splendid array of Therina, and Persis, and the other ladies near them, and you will find, that except a few glittering stones, and a little gold and silver, which was dug out of the bowels of the earth, you can scarcely see any thing that was not once growing green upon the ground, through the various labours of the planter and the ploughman. Whence came the floor you tread on, part whereof is inlaid with wood of different colours—whence these fair pannels of wainscot, and the cornice that encompasses and adorns the room—Whence this lofty roof of cedar and the carved ornaments of it? Are they not all the spoils of the trees of the forest? Were not these once the verdant standards of the grove or the mountain? What are your hangings of gay tapestry? Are they not owing to the fleece of the sheep, which borrowed their nourishment from the grass of the meadows? Thus the finery of your parlour once was grass; and should you favour me with a turn into your bed-chamber, I could show you that the curtains and the linen, and the costly coverings where you take your nightly repose, were some years ago all growing in the field.

"But I need not retire from the room where we are seated, to give you abundant discoveries of this truth. Is not the hair of camels a part of the materials which compose those rich curtains which hang down by the window, and the easy chairs which accommodate your friends? And if you think a little you will find, that camels with their hair were made of grass, as well as sheep and their wool. I confess the chimney and the coals, with the implements of the hearth, the brass and iron, were dug out of the ground from their beds of different kinds, and you must go below the surface of the earth to fetch them: but what think you of these nice tables of mosaic work? They confess the forest their parent. What are the books which lie in the window, and the little implements of paper and wax, pens and wafers, which I presume may be found in the escrutoire? And may I not add to these that inch of wax candle, which stands ready to seal a letter, or perhaps to light a pipe,—you must grant they have all the same original, they were once mere vegetables. Paper and books owe their being to the tatters of linen, which was woven of the threads of flax or hemp: the pasteboard covers are composed of paper, and the leather is the skin of the calf that drew its life and sustenance from the meadows: the pen that you write with was plucked from the wing of the goose, which lives upon the grass of the common; the inkhorn was borrowed from the front of the grazing ox; the wafer is made of the paste of the bread corn; the sealing wax is said to be formed chiefly of the gum of a tree; and the wax for the candle is originally plundered from the bee, who stole it out of a thousand flowers. Permit me, ladies, said the philosopher, to mention your dress: too nice a subject indeed for a scholar to pretend any skill in it; but I persuade myself your candour will not resent my naming the rich materials, since I leave those more important points, the fashion and the air, to be decided entirely by your superior skill. Shall I inquire, then, who gave Persis the silken habit which she wears; did she not borrow it from the worm, that spun those shining threads? And whence did the worm borrow it but from the leaves of the mulberry tree, which was planted and nourished for this purpose by the country swain? May I ask again, how came Therina by those ornaments of fine linen which she is pleased to appear in, and the costly lace of Flanders that surrounds it? Was it not all made of the stalks of flax, that grew up in the field like other vegetables? And are not the finest of your muslins owing to the Indian cotton tree? Nor can you tell me, Theron, one upper garment you have, whether coat, cloak, or night-gown, from your shoulders to your very feet, as rich and as new as you think it, which the sheep or the poor silk-worm had not worn before you. It is certain the beaver bore your hat on his skin; that soft fur was his covering before it was yours; and the materials of your very shoes, both the upper part and the soles of them, covered the calf or the heifer before they were put on your feet: all this was grass at first, for we have seen that all the animal world owes its being to vegetables.

"The company seemed strangely surprised, and thought they had been led into fairy land; they imagined themselves decoyed into the midst of enchantment, while their fancy roved through all these transformations. Yet the discourse seemed to carry such evidence and conviction with it, that though they retained their wonder they could not withhold their assent.

"When Crito had given them leave to muse a little, he took up the argument again. Give me leave, madam, said he to Therina, without offence, to lead you into further wonders. You have seen that the furniture of the place where we are, as well as the precious attire in which you are dressed, were lately the production and the ornaments of the forest, the meadow, or the garden. But could you forgive me, madam, if I should attempt to persuade you, that that beautiful body of yours, those features, and those limbs, were once growing also in the fields and the meadows? I see, lady, you are a little shocked and surprised at the thought. I confess the ideas and sentiments of philosophy are not always so courtly and so favourable to human nature as to be addressed to the tender sex; but pardon me, Therina, if I inquire, was not your infancy nursed with milk and bread corn? Have you not been fed with wheat, though it was of the finest kind? And your drink, what has it been but either the infusion of barley, or the juice of the grape, or, for variety, perhaps, the cyder grove has supplied you? The flesh with which you have been nourished to such a well-proportioned stature belonged to four-footed animals, or to the fowls of the air; and each of these have either been fed with corn or grass. Whence then, madam, has your own body been supported, and what do you think it is made of? But it is safer to transfer the argument to myself. These limbs of mine, Therina, owe themselves entirely to the animal or vegetable food, to the roots or the stalks, to the leaves or the fruit of plants, or to the flesh of brute creatures, which have passed through my mouth for these fifty years, or the mouths of my parents before me; this hand would have been worn to a mere skeleton, my arms had been dry bones, and my trunk and ribs the statue of death, had they not all received perpetual recruits from the fields. These lips which now address you are of the same materials, and they were once growing like the grass of the earth. This very flesh which I call mine now, did belong to the sheep or the ox, before it was a part of me; and it served to clothe their bones before it covered mine.

"You know, Theron, you are a gentleman who delight in rural sports when you reside at your country seat, and you love to feast on the game that you have pursued. Did you ever suppose that any part of yourself was once hurried through the air in the breast of a frighted partridge, which came before night into your net?—or that any piece of you was driven through the fields before the full-mouthed hounds, on the legs of a hunted hare, which was the next day prepared for your table? Had you ever so strange a thought as this is? And can you believe it now? Or, upon a survey of my argument, can you tell how to deny it? And what are hares and partridges made of, but growing herbage or shattered corn?

"It is true, you have sometimes tasted of fish, either from the sea or rivers, but even those in their original also are a sort of grass; they have been fed partly by sea-weeds, and partly by the lesser fish which they have devoured, whose prime and natural nourishment was from some vegetable matter in the watery world.

"In short, Sir, I am free to declare, that whether I have eaten cheese or butter, bread or milk; whether I have fed on the ox or the sheep, or the fowls of the air, or the fish of the sea, I am certain that this body, and these limbs of mine, even to my teeth and nails, and the hairs of my head, are all borrowed originally from the vegetable creation. Every thing of me that is not a thinking power, that is not mind, or spirit, was once growing like grass on the ground, or was made of the roots which supported some green herbage.

"And now, Theron, what think you of all these paradoxes? Which of them do you cavil at? Which leaves you room for doubt, or question? Is not philosophy an entertaining study, that teaches us our original, and these astonishing operations of Divine wisdom and providence? But it teaches us also to have humble thoughts of ourselves, and to remember whence we came.

"Theron, to conclude the discourse, confessed his surprise and conviction; he acknowledged the justice of Crito's whole argument, gave him hearty thanks for his instructive lecture, and resolved to remember these amazing scenes of the operations of nature, and the adorable wisdom of God his maker. Nor shall I ever forget, said he, the strange and unsuspected dependence of man on all the meaner parts of the creation. I am convinced that pride was never made for man, when I see how much akin his body is to the fowls of the air and brutes of the earth.

"And I think, said he, I am more indebted to my tenants that ever I could have imagined; nor will I cast such a scornful eye again on the grazier and the farmer, since this flesh and blood of mine, as well as the furniture of my house and the clothes I wear, were once growing in the fields or the woods under their care or cultivation; and I find I am nearer akin to them, since this self of mine, with all the finery that covers it, was made originally of the same materials with them and their coarser coverings."—Dr. Watts.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

THE JUSTICE OF GOD.—Continued from p. 182.

But the justice of God is not confined to the destruction of sinful nations. Looking down from heaven, God beholds at one glance all the thoughts and all the actions of every human being, and at some time it will be found that every man receives that which is due to him. Great as was the favour which the Almighty showed to his servant David, we find that he did not spare him for his iniquities: nor did he receive him again to his love, until by the deepest repentance he had manifested that he truly felt his iniquities to be a great burthen, too heavy for him to bear. It is quite unnecessary that I should recite any further instances to establish a truth, which every one who peruses the Holy Scriptures must have discovered for themselves. From them I conceive we may clearly learn, that God interests himself most intimately in all the concerns of every human being; that he is infinitely just, and cannot therefore pass by transgression, and that he will exact a full punishment for every crime which is committed against his laws. This doctrine is clear to my mind from the consideration, that God in all his dealings in the natural world has manifested that magnitude is nothing in his eyes, for the smallest insect is as accurate in its formation as the largest. From this I would learn, that he has as clear a view of the smallest sin as he has of the greatest, and if it could once be considered consistent with his justice to pardon a small crime without receiving satisfaction, it might easily be proved from that, that he can also pardon a great one. Who then can be saved? is possibly the idea which rises in the reader's mind. Look back, my friend, to the garden of Gethsemane. Remember the bitterness of anguish which your Saviour there underwent. Call tó mind the agony which he endured, the intensity of which manifested itself in great drops of blood falling down to the ground. Remember, also, the contents of that cup which he there drank. It was indeed full of sin and all uncleanness, and contained all the crimes and misdoings of ages past, present, and to come. Follow the footsteps of your adorable Redeemer to the court of Herod, the judgment-hall of Pilate, and the hill of Calvary, and then tell me if you think any thing too hard for the Lord? All these sufferings were undergone for us men and for our salvation; and can we doubt the truth of that declaration, which says, the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sins, the greatest as well as the smallest. Herein was displayed the immensity of God's justice. Though his own Son was the sufferer—though every groan which he uttered wrung the heart of his heavenly Father—yet that Father spared him not; he diminished not one drop of the cup of vengeance, but, in the fullest sense of the words, laid on him the iniquity of us all. Now, therefore, let us rejoice in the Lord, who hath dealt with such immense mercy, though with equal justice: and when temptation would assault us, and lead us from the path of duty, let the night which preceded our Lord's crucifixion occur to our minds; and surely I may say, that he who would be bold enough to sin with the Saviour before his eyes, groaning under an immense weight of anguish and misery, cannot love that Saviour, nor feel truly grateful for the benefits he has conferred.

But some may be ready to say, All this may be very true; but still, when I look into the world, I cannot bring my mind to believe that Infinite Justice is concerned in its government. Wickedness seems to be rewarded, and the greatest prosperity is evidently the portion of the greatest sinner, while sufferings and distress are the lot of the righteous. This is doubtless in many cases the truth; nor would I wish to deny or conceal it: I own that

> Now, unassuming worth in secret lives,
> And dies neglected. Now, the good man's share
> In life is gall and bitterness of soul.
> Now, the lone widow and her orphans pine
> In starving solitude. Now, heav'n-born truth,
> And moderation fair, wear the red marks
> Of superstition's scourge.

But it shall not always be so. The justice of God will be vindicated, and his people will not lose their reward. To accomplish this, however, it is clear there must be some future state of existence: for death very frequently takes the good man away before his real character has been appreciated, and his injuries repaid. To Christians, therefore, it is clear from this reason only, that there is another world, and that there will be a day of judgment. Let not man, then, repine at the dispensations of providence. True it is, the Almighty Power which governs the universe acts by rules which we cannot discern, though we know that the principle on which all these rules are founded is justice. Though now it may seem that the enemy crieth aloud, and the ungodly come on swiftly, as it were to take away our souls; let us not be downcast, for there is One who maketh the wrath of man to praise him, and will restrain the remainder of wrath. To His keeping let each man commit his soul in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

Let the sinner tremble at these things, for they are enough to make him pale with fear for the remaining portion of his life, and will, I am convinced, make him miserable in the life which is to come. You thought, mayhap, that in the still midnight hour, when the eyes of men were closed in sleep, you might commit sin unnoticed and unknown. Vain and delusive hope! That Keeper of Israel who neither slumbers nor sleeps has been watching you, all your secret sins are recorded in his dreadful book; and how will you tremble when, at the day of judgment, crimes long since forgotten are recalled to your recollection, and all the misdeeds of a corrupt and wicked life are placed in their real character before your eyes! Surely it will teach you knowledge and caution, when you think that this is indeed the case, and that however you may now ridicule or make light of the subject, you will and must appear before the judgment-seat of Christ.

But that which should cause the sinner to tremble, should also cause the Christian to rejoice. That justice which will not pass by transgression, will not forget the acts of righteousness which the good man has done. If, therefore, now it should seem that all things come alike to all men, and that the righteous do much good and have no reward, let none of us despair: because we have the promise of one who cannot lie, that, verily, not a cup of cold water given in Christ's name shall lose its reward.—Let us not therefore be weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not.

THE INSOLENCE OF INFIDELITY SILENCED.

A scoffing infidel, of considerable abilities, being once in the company of a person of weak intellect, but a real Christian, and supposing, no doubt, that he should obtain an easy triumph, and display his ungodly wit, put the following question to him: "I understand, Sir, that you expect to go to heaven when you die: can you tell me what sort of a place heaven is?" "Yes, Sir," replied the Christian, "heaven is a prepared place for a prepared people; and if your soul is not prepared for it, with all your boasted wisdom you will never enter there."

RECOMMENDATION OF THE

CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE.

For the interests of our Country, especially of the Poorer Classes, we are deeply convinced of the importance and necessity of a Cheap Religious Publication of sound principles, and adapted for general circulation at the present eventful crisis. Such a Periodical we consider the "Christian's Penny Magazine," which has been carried on successfully for about six months. This work has been established on the great principles of the Protestant Reformation, without controversy on those minor points about which British Christians are divided: as such we feel pleasure in recommending it to the Public; and so long as it continues to adhere to those Evangelical principles, we will afford it our patronage.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY.

RD UNIVERSITY has long been considered the celebrated seat of learning in Europe. Inseparably ected as it has been with the diffusion of Chris-y in our own country, our readers cannot fail el interested by a brief sketch of its history and resent state.

ford is conveniently situated, in a fruitful country
e river Thames, and fifty-eight miles nearly north-from London. Its public buildings, consisting of en parish churches, besides the Cathedral, twenty ges, five Halls, the Libraries, Museum, and Print-ffice, give it an air of great magnificence.

ford is believed to have been a noted seminary of ing before the time of king Alfred, especially r St. Neoth, the first president and divinity lecturer,
. 806, assisted by several eminent men, particu-
by St. Grimbald. Asser, a monk, was professor of mar and rhetoric; John, a monk of the church
. David, gave lectures on logic, music, and arith-
; John, another monk, a colleague of St. Grim-taught geometry and astronomy.

Alfred visiting Oxford A. D. 886, founded "University College," by which it received the royal patronage, a favour which it has ever since continued to enjoy. Various has been the fortune of this distinguished city, which has been affected by many of the great changes experienced by the nation. In the reign of Edward the Elder, the Danes plundered and burnt Oxford; and not long after, when the buildings were being restored, Harold Harefoot indulged in the most inhuman barbarities upon the inhabitants, in revenge for the loss of some of his men, who had been killed in an affray. This occasioned the removal of most of the students: learning declined, and the university became almost extinct, presenting a deplorable spectacle until the time of William the Conqueror.

William bestowed the greatest part of Oxford upon Robert d'Oily, a Norman, who built a castle there, about A. D. 1071. and learning began again to flourish, the city being under powerful protection.

Robert Pulen, about A. D. .129, began to read lectures in divinity at Oxford; when, such was the popularity of him and his colleagues, that, in the reign of King John, there were not fewer than 3,000 students.

Henry III, having held a parliament here, to settle the differences between himself and his powerful barons, confirmed the privileges granted to the University by his predecessors, and added several others. In this reign, it is supposed, the Pope had honoured Oxford with the title of University, which had been conferred on no other place besides Paris, Bologna, and Salamanca. So great was the fame of our University at this period, that there were said to have been 30,000 students, all of whom were pronounced excommunicated by the Pope, an account of some rudeness which they had offered to the Legate of his Holiness. Matthew Paris, who flourished about this time, styled Oxford "the second school of the church, and the very foundation of the church." Duns Scotus, who died on the continent A. D. 1308, is said to have had 30,000 scholars in attendance on his lectures at this university. This, however, is a far greater number than has been usual. The whole body of the university, including professors, fellows, and students of all ranks, now seldom exceed 3,000.

The following is a list of the Colleges, with the names of their founders, and the dates of their foundation.

Colleges of Roman Catholic Foundation.

No.	Names.	Founders.	King's Reign.	Date
1.	University.	King Alfred.	Alfred.	886
2.	Baliol.	Sir John Baliol, father to the king of Scots.	Henry III.	1263
3.	Merton.	Walter Merton, Lord Chancellor and Bp. of Rochester.	Edward I.	1276
4.	Exeter.	Walter Stapleton, Bishop.	Edward II.	1316
5.	Oriel.	Edward II.	Edward II.	1323
6.	Queen's.	Robert Eglesfield, B. D.	Edw. III.	1340
7.	New College.	Wm. of Wickham, Bp. of Winchester, Ld. Chancellor. Finished by Thomas de Rotheram, Archishop of York.	Began in the reign of Rich. II; finished, Edw. IV.	1379 1475
8.	Lincoln.	Richard Fleming, Bishop of Lincoln.	Henry VI.	1427
9.	All Souls.	Hugh Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury.	Henry VI.	1438
10.	Magdalen.	Wm. of Wainfleet, Bp. of Winchester, Ld. Chancellor.	Henry VI.	1458
11.	Brazen Nose	Wm. Smith, Bp. of Lincoln, and Rich. Sutton, Esq.	Hen. VIII.	1513
12.	Corpus Christi.	Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester.	Hen. VIII.	1516
13.	Christ Church.	Henry VIII, and Cardinal Wolsey.	Hen. VIII.	1539
14.	Trinity.	Sir Thomas Pope.	Mary.	1556
15.	St. John Baptist.	Sir Thomas White, merchant of London.	Mary.	1557

Colleges of Protestant Foundation.

16.	Jesus.	Dr. Price, and Queen Elizabeth.	Elizabeth.	1571
17.	Wadham.	Nicholas Wadham, Esq.	James I.	1613
18.	Pembroke.	Thomas Tisdale, Esq. and Dr. Rich. Whitwick.	James I.	1624
19.	Worcester.	Sir Thos. Coke endowed it.	Anne.	1713
20.	Hertford.	Dr. Richard Newton endowed it.	George II.	1740

Besides these Colleges, there are five public Halls, Alban Hall, Edmund Hall, St. Mary's Hall, New Inn Hall, and St. Mary Magdalen Hall.

All these colleges are richly endowed; they have splendid libraries, appropriate chapels, and fine gardens. Magdalen and Christ Church are the most considerable, and are esteemed as noble foundations as any in the world. The church of the latter is the Cathedral; to which are attached a dean, eight canons, eight chaplains, eight singing men, eight choristers, a teacher of music, and an organist. Each of the colleges has its visitors appointed according to its statutes, with the exception of Christ Church, which alone is subject to the visitation of the reigning sovereign.

Belonging to the University are several other noble buildings. I. The Public School. II. The Bodleian Library (for an account of which see No. 9 of "The Christian's Penny Magazine.") III. Ratcliffe's Library, a most elegant structure with a splendid dome, for the building and furnishing of which, Dr. Ratcliffe left 40,000*l.* IV. The Theatre, built by Sheldon, archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of Charles II. V. The Museum, in which there is an elaboratory and a repository for natural and artificial antiquities and curiosities. VI. The Clarendon Printing House, so called because it was partly built with the profits arising from the sale of Lord Clarendon's History. To the south of Magdalen College lies the Physic Garden, instituted by the Earl of Danby, and much improved by Dr. Sherrard. It contains five acres, in which is a complete series of such plants as grow naturally, disposed in their respective classes: together with two neat and convenient green-houses, stocked with a valuable collection of exotics, and a hot-house, where various plants brought from the warmer climates are raised.

The University is governed by a chancellor, high steward, vice-chancellor, two proctors, a public orator, a keeper of the archives, a register, three 'squire beadles, and three yeomen beadles.

Oxford contains the largest printing establishment in the empire for printing the Holy Scriptures, by patent granted to the University, and from this the British and Foreign Bible Society chiefly obtains its supply of English Bibles.

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE

His Early History.

"Godliness is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." Examples innumerable have existed in every age, which afford abundant proofs of this delightful testimony. Originally it was addressed by the inspired apostle to the evangelist Timothy, for his instruction in the execution of his ministry; and one from among many illustrations of it we here present to our young readers, in the case of the Birmingham Apprentice, trusting that it will be the means of promoting their best interests for time and eternity.

William ——— was born in Birmingham, in the year 1790. His parents were particularly solicitous for the instruction of this their eldest son; so that at least he might be fully equal to the children of their neighbours, in the ordinary branches of learning. Placed under the tuition of a respectable master, he was taught according to the usual courses of reading and writing in the common academies of that day, and for about two years he enjoyed the advantages afforded by the grammar-school of that town, founded by King Edward VI.

Wearied with the drudgery of Latin exercises, conceiving that the language of ancient Rome would be of no use to him in learning a trade, he prevailed upon his parents to allow him "to go to work." In the year 1803, therefore, he was bound as an in-door apprentice.

The master was fixed upon, not from any consideration of his religious principles, but chiefly on account of his reputation for being a clever workman. Nominally he was a churchman, as to his profession of religion: but his churchmanship consisted principally in expressions of contempt for all "Methodists," as he called all that were Dissenters, and in attending the parish church, once perhaps in a month. This observance of religious forms, was only as time could be spared from the supposed indispensable calculations for the business of the following week, and the contrivance of new patterns in the fancy articles of his trade, the making up of his accounts, and the amusements of his garden. A Bible his master did not possess, for several years after William had been bound apprentice.

William was now separated altogether from his old school-fellows, and kept with an excessive degree of strictness, partly on account of so many youths being drawn away into evil courses by their having too much liberty, and partly on account of numbers being enticed to enlist to serve in the army or navy. He was scarcely allowed to be from his master's house, even on a Sunday, except in going to church and returning from it, twice in the day. William was conscientiously observant of his master's requisitions in this respect; though the measure of restraint imposed was very far from being perfectly agreeable to him; because, being a lively youth, he had formed many acquaintances among those of his own age, and in his neighbourhood, to whom their friends allowed a much greater degree of liberty than he enjoyed. But this license proved, in most instances, the lamentable occasion of their ruin; while, through the gracious providence of God, his restraints were the means of promoting his eternal welfare. His parents, soon afterwards, removed to a considerable distance from Birmingham; and being thus cut off from intercourse with others, beyond his master's family, his moments of leisure were employed in a manner, which, under the Divine direction and blessing, became the effectual means of the greatest mental and moral advantage.

William had never ranked among the lowest and most lawless youths in the neighbourhood in which he lived; nor was he distinguished by any remarkable habits of depravity; yet he had formed acquaintances with those, whose tongues could utter profane language, and who could even defile their juvenile lips with oaths and cursing. Indeed, he began himself to adopt some of their less shocking expressions; and what might have been the consequences of such association, had not the merciful providence of God removed him from such company, cannot possibly be conjectured by the liveliest imagination.

Before entering into the family of his master, a circumstance transpired too interesting to be entirely passed over in this place. William had been solicited, by one of the younger boys in the manufactory, to go with him to the Methodist Sunday school in Livery Street, assuring him, that he could get him admitted without any difficulty, and that the business and lessons of the school would be found delighful. The engagements and operations of a Sunday school, were altogether a novelty to William. He had only heard of their existence, and he wished to become acquainted with their exercises. His parents consented to his request; his mother took him before the committee, and he was admitted.

The teachers finding that William could read well in the Bible, and that he had been better instructed than was supposed by the committee, conferred among themselves, and after some inquiry from him as to his former advantages at school, and further deliberation, observed to him, that "he was not a proper object of their care: but that they would be happy for him to remain as an assistant in teaching the younger boys." Proud of such a distinction at the age of only thirteen years, William was delighted with the proposal, and continued for several months an assistant teacher, until he went to reside in his master's family. Such a connection and employment would not be allowed by his master, and William left his situation of teacher in the Sunday school with sincere regret.

That William became truly converted to God, by repentance for sin and faith in Jesus Christ, during the few months of his engagement in the Methodist Sunday school, is not presumed: but there, for the first time in his life, he beheld men, who were not public ministers of religion, kneel in prayer to God, and former convictions were somewhat deepened on his mind, or a class of impressions and feelings was produced at that time, which was never entirely destroyed. These exercises recommended religion to him, and elevated the Bible more distinctly and prominently before him, as the inspired word of God; the reading of which, under this renewed impression, operated as a salutary check upon the depraved passions and affections, and issued at length in a decided persuasion of the reality and divinity of the glorious Gospel, and in a public profession of self-dedication to God, in discipleship to Jesus Christ.

ON THE RIGHT USE AND APPLICATION OF KNOWLEDGE:

The substance of an address lately delivered to the Mechanics of Manchester, at their Institution in that town, by Joseph John Gurney.

Friends and Fellow Countrymen,

In presenting myself to this large and intelligent assembly, I feel that I ought, as a stranger, to apologize for such an intrusion on your time and attention, especially since the subject on which I propose to treat, is one of so large a compass and of such high importance. Undoubtedly, it will be generally allowed, that on nothing does the welfare of our species more clearly or certainly depend, than on the right use and application of knowledge.

The only apology, however, which I have to offer, is, that I am a sincere friend to the diffusion of useful knowledge of every description; and shall be glad at all times to promote the general object pursued by this and similar institutions. The principles which I entertain on the subject, forbid my making any distinction between the different classes of society; for whatsoever may be our situation in life, it appears to me to be our plain duty to ourselves, to our neighbour, and above all to our bountiful Creator, to make as diligent a use as lies in our power of the nobler part of man—to improve and cultivate our mental faculties.

True indeed it is, that even in our intellectual pursuits, there are dangerous temptations, especially to pride and self-conceit; according to the declaration of the apostle Paul—a wise and learned man in his day—"knowledge puffeth up." But I consider that this declaration peculiarly applies to slight and superficial knowledge, and that we shall find one remedy for our vanity, in the deepening and extending of our researches after truth. Those who are most profound in philosophy, and most largely instructed in useful learning, are generally distinguished by a low view of their own attainments. In confirmation of this remark, I need only remind you of Sir Isaac Newton—that prince of astronomers and mathematicians—that firm friend also to religion and virtue—whose matchless powers of mind were so remarkably accompanied with humility and modesty; these, indeed, were the crown and honour of his character.

I do not wish to enter upon any metaphysical definitions of knowledge. On the present occasion I use the word simply as denoting that information, which, under the government of our gracious Creator, men are able to obtain from any source, on any subject. Knowledge, in this familiar sense of the term, admits of a division into four great branches. First, experimental, and philosophical; secondly, mathematical; thirdly, historical; and fourthly—above all—moral and religious.

In the present stage of this address I shall lay aside the consideration of the fourth branch—I mean revealed religion—not because I am insensible to its claims, for I am convinced in my inmost soul of its supreme importance; but I consider it best, in the first instance, to confine my views to the preceding branches—those which are so laudably pursued in this institution.

Experimental Knowledge is that information of every kind which we obtain from our own personal observation. Every one knows that it is extremely various—that it rests on the evidence of our senses—and that it is stored in the mind by the united powers of perception, reflection, and memory. Under this class we must include the different branches of natural philosophy: for it is now universally understood, that science can be rightly founded only on the observation of the phenomena of nature. An extensive and careful examination of effects enables the philosopher to discover causes; from a multitude of particular examples he forms his general conclusions; and thus he erects a well-founded system of natural science. The philosophical knowledge which we thus obtain is more or less certain, just in proportion to the opportunities which we enjoy, in any particular science, of an extensive and accurate examination of facts.

Many of the conclusions of natural philosophy—some even which are very generally admitted—amount only to probabilities. Others, in a practical point of view, may safely be regarded as certainties. But on what basis do all these conclusions rest? On various first truths, or elements of knowledge, which the philosopher is obliged to take for granted, and which are utterly incapable of proof. One of these elements is the actual existence of those external objects, about which it is the province of science to inquire. Although it is impossible to demonstrate this truth, our nature compels us to admit it, and admitted universally it certainly is; for even a Berkeley and a Hume, whose sophistry delighted in reducing all visible things to phantoms of the mind, would have been just as eager to escape from the falling rock or from the lion's jaw, as the most credulous of their fellow-men.

Another first truth, essential to philosophy, is, that every phenomenon of nature which we can trace to a beginning, or in other words every effect, has a cause adequate to its production. This is a truth which no man can prove, but which every man is compelled to believe. The belief of it is wrought by the hand of God into the constitution of our nature. You will observe, therefore, my friends—and you cannot deny it—that natural philosophy itself, in the various branches of which you take so warm an interest, affords you no knowledge whatsoever, but that which is founded on faith.

Mathematical Knowledge.—But does the same remark apply to the second branch of knowledge? does it apply to those pure and perfect sciences—astronomy for example—in which our conclusions rest, not merely on our own fallible powers of observation, but on that which precludes the possibility of mistake, mathematical demonstration? Assuredly it does; because the soundness even of mathematical calculation and reasoning depends on the truth of certain axioms, which are always supposed and taken for granted, but can never be proved.

One of these axioms is familiar to us all—that the whole is greater than the part. I defy the most ingenious student among you to demonstrate this axiom, either by a chain of reasoning, or by any other means. You will tell me, perhaps, that we have perpetual ocular proof of it—that it is demonstrated by the sight, and by the touch. But do a man's senses never deceive him? Can he always trust the vision of his eye, or the sensation of his finger? I have already observed, that the very existence of the things which we see and touch, is one of the articles of natural belief. The plain fact is, that we are sure the axiom in question is true, because an intuitive conviction of its truth forms part of the nature which God has given us.

It is far from my intention by these remarks to attempt to involve any of your minds in perplexing and useless doubts—in that hopeless and heartless Pyrrhonism which is productive of nothing but misery and folly. I am desirous only that we may be led to take a right view of the very constitution and condition of our being. The voice of nature is, in this case, the voice of God. Well may we be humbled under a reverential feeling of the wisdom and power of our Creator, who has ordained that the first elements of all our knowledge should be received by faith in that voice—on his own supreme and irresistible authority.

Here I will mention the name of another celebrated person, to whom every mechanics' institution in the kingdom is deeply indebted; I mean Lord Bacon, the father of inductive philosophy—the man who raised science with a master-hand, and placed her on her feet! The poet describes him as the "greatest, wisest, meanest of mankind," and his history affords many lamentable proofs, that great learning and unbending virtue are far from being inseparable companions. Unhappily he truckled to power at the cost of principle; and sure I am, that were he now living, he would, notwithstanding all his science, be little popular among the reformers of Manchester. Yet he was a person of profound reasoning powers and of singular wisdom; firm to uphold both reason and faith, yet skilful to distinguish their respective uses. And what says Lord Bacon respecting the knowledge of philosophy? He says, "It is an assured truth and a conclusion of experience, that a little or superficial knowledge of philosophy may incline the mind of man to atheism, but a further proceeding therein doth bring the mind back again to religion."

ANECDOTE OF THE LATE REV. DR. HAWKER.

A young Clergyman once requested permission of Dr. Hawker to take his pulpit in his absence from home. "I must hear you first," said the venerable man The time was fixed, and the young man ascended the pulpit—the Doctor sitting in the reading desk below. "Well," said the young man, at the conclusion of the service, "I hope you liked my sermon." The Doctor made this pointed, though somewhat plain answer. "My young friend, if I must sweat, I would very much rather sweat in preaching than in hearing." It is unnecessary to add, that permission was not given to the young man to take the Doctor's pulpit in his absence.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER VIII.

Dear Madam,

The subject next in order, which I have proposed to myself to consider, is that of the cultivation of what is called the moral principle, or those principles by which mankind are directed to the adoption of right conduct. The subject is of the first importance: it likewise embraces a vast extent. It might on these accounts, and especially the latter, seem incapable of being treated unless in a continued dissertation, and difficult of being understood. Nevertheless I apprehend that the primary rules, which relate to this supremely important topic, are comparatively few in number.

During the earliest portion of a child's existence, he is incapable of understanding rules and motives, and must accordingly be kept out of mischief as if he were a mere inanimate being. As soon, however, as he becomes able to observe and to think, it is important that you should endeavour at the establishment of moral principle. Accordingly, as soon as possible, explain to him the reasons of his various duties. Our Creator intended that the conduct of man should be directed by the mind of man. But the mind will not long continue to direct his conduct, unless it comprehends and approves the reasons which render one species of conduct different from another. On the other hand, obedience is likely to be cheerful and steadfast, in proportion as it is intelligent. There is also the best reason for believing, that the obedience of the mind is the only species of obedience approved by the Deity. Hence therefore the necessity that your child, and every other person in the world, should act, not so much from habit as from conviction. Allow me thus to illustrate my meaning. Suppose a child never to go to bed without saying its prayers, and that the strongest reason of the performance of the act is, that he has been so habituated to it that he would feel uneasy in mind without it. Suppose, on the other hand, a child to perform the same duty under the influence of the conviction that God has commanded all men everywhere to pray — that prayer is efficacious as a means of procuring blessings — that consequently he can obtain no real good except by praying for it; — I need scarcely ask you which of these two children would be likely to be most earnest and most frequent in the duty of prayer. It is just the same with every duty. Teach a child or a man why he should act in any supposed manner, and he will be most likely to act so cordially and perpetually. On the other hand, should his virtues consist simply of the force of habit, I fear that they would yield before the force of passion. Our passions of every kind can only be controlled by the dominion of a sanctified and enlightened mind.

I shall now proceed to state a few of the rules advisable to be adopted.

1. Always endeavour to exhibit duty as rational and beneficial, and therefore as desirable Endeavour to convince him that the law of God is holy, equitable, and benevolent. That accordingly no action whatever is hurtful because it is forbidden, but forbidden because it is hurtful. That God has been actuated simply by the wish to promote human happiness in the moral requirements of the Scriptures; that in proportion as we could practise them we should be happy; and that every even the slightest deviation from them tends to misery. Often converse with him upon such topics, and show him the tendency of an action to produce happiness or misery. Show him how virtue tends to happiness and vice to misery.

2. Teach him to calculate the consequences of any action becoming general, and to estimate its moral nature accordingly. There, for instance, is a tempting apple tree: and why may I not step over that little hedge, or break through it, and take one of those brilliant pippins that hang in such numbers as to weigh down the branches, and actually to have fallen off, and to lie upon the ground in numbers? Teach him to reason thus: that if I might do it, any one might do it. Make him ever know and feel, that every one in the world might do whatever it would be lawful for him to do. Annihilate the idea that he has a privilege beyond any one else, or that any one has a privilege beyond himself. If then every person might take one of those apples, the gardener, who gets his bread and feeds and clothes his family by taking his apples and other fruit to market, would have no apples to sell, and could get no money to buy food and clothing. Ramify every action through all its consequences, and then show him that they are good or evil as the consequences are desirable or the contrary. Teach him to illustrate the principle to you in a thousand ways. He will soon understand you, and surprise you with illustrations for your rule. Nor is it one of the least benefits of your procedure, that while you are establishing a moral principle in the mind of your child, you will find that you are enlightening and confirming your own.

3. In all your explanations of duty, teach him to reason down to the minutest consequences, and let him be taught that there are no exceptions — that duty is rigid in the extreme degree — that it is absolutely exclusive. For instance: Some of the apples lying on the ground under that tree are spoiling for want of being taken away. Might I not take one of them? Had I not better eat it than allow it to decay and become useless? Show him that every body else would have as good a right as himself to do so, and that if every body did, the gardener would only have the fruit which hung upon his trees to live by, and that every high wind or other accident might endanger his livelihood. I propose these instances as patterns for the multiform illustrations which you will adopt.

4. It is impossible to assign a better or more general rule than that of our Redeemer — "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye unto them." Instances will daily occur that will give you an opportunity. For instance; some boys of the village have built a little grotto beneath the wall of your garden. Your son, with the desire so native to the human heart, of causing surprise and of enjoying merriment at the expense of others, climbs into a tree which overhangs the little group and the object of their amusement, and lets a stone fall upon the centre of the little illuminated cave, and shatters its fragile construction, and extinguishes the light. Here would be an occasion, though I should hope it never would occur, yet I have seen a little boy do it, in which you should take him into the most quiet room of your house, and wait till his thoughtless mirth had subsided, and then put the question to his heart, whether he would have liked to have been so treated. Confine his attention to this point, and make him answer you. You have then an opportunity for appealing to his feelings. But your stronghold upon him will be this one truth, that he has no right to act towards any human being in any manner in which he would not like for any human being to act towards himself. Lastly, appeal to the inward sense of right and wrong which operates whenever the object of that sense is fairly brought before its view. Turn his view to the moral loveliness of a right conduct, and to the odiousness of impropriety of every kind. Make him understand that he will always feel unhappy when he has done wrong, and make him dread the reproaches of his heart. It is indeed useful in some cases to add the motive drawn from the love of approbation. Let him know how others will dislike him if he behaves himself ill, and love him if he acts with propriety. If an ultimate rule be needed, tell him that society will discard him, or compel him to do right. The little boy I alluded to was reasoned with in vain upon the preceding principles the first time that he had spoiled the grotto of the children, and soon after climbed the tree for the same purpose; when one of the boys below saw him, and aimed a stone, which struck him a severe blow upon the forehead. He came, indignant and suffering from pain, to complain of what he considered this outrage, which had evidently, however, brought him somewhat to his senses. The person who had previously reasoned with him now replied, after hearing the complaint against the boys, "Ay, to be sure, and you will find, that if you will not do as you ought to do, people will make you." He felt the application of the argument — he had nothing to say — his own heart confirmed the verdict of society — he burst into tears of remorse. Every filament in the cable is of use: and arguments on morals derived from every source are useful. Where those which are derived from the innate excellence of virtue fail, that taken from the fiat of society may answer; though if the former be duly and early inculcated and explained, there will be no need ever to apply to the latter.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.
CLERICUS.

REFLECTIONS ON AUTUMN.

THE returning seasons afford a subject for useful meditation both to the moralist and to the Christian. Spring with its opening buds, summer with its flowery prime, autumn with its horn of plenty, and winter with its chilling snows, present to us a manifest illustration of the different stages of human existence. But autumn perhaps offers to our minds the most edifying lesson for consideration. Spring breaks up the ice of winter, and renews creation with a flowery robe; and then summer clothes the trees and the fields, scattering a vast profusion over the earth; but scarcely are we permitted to dwell upon the beauty and luxuriance, when the autumn of the year comes round, and all nature fades. The withered foliage drops from the branches, and each leaf, as it falls, seems to admonish us of our own approaching decay. The trees, which had not long ago reached their maturity, now stand despoiled of their richest verdure. How similar is the result of all our pursuits after earthly pleasure! We labour diligently to obtain some fancied good; and at the very moment when we gain possession of it, discover its fallacy, and our own folly. Autumn, too, is the time when the stores of nature are gathered in, to be laid up in store for the support of nature during barren winter: and if in our manhood we forbear to furnish our minds with religious principles and divine knowledge, but neglect the Saviour and His great salvation freely published in the Gospel, we shall have nothing to support our spirits during the inactivity and gloom of age, when we stand most in need of spiritual consolation. In a little space of time, we shall have the snows of the natural winter falling around us; and ere long, too, the feeble limbs and the silvery locks will tell us, that the close of our mortal life is at hand. Oh! that we may not then be compelled to say, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved;" but, on the contrary, may we be now inclined, so to improve the golden opportunities that are richly afforded us, as to be able then to anticipate an eternal spring of felicity and glory in heaven! M. N.

CHRISTIAN IDOLATRY.

Mr. Editor,

As an ardent well-wisher to your valuable Magazine, and a constant reader of its instructive pages, permit me to offer a few lines for your insertion, if you think fit, on a subject you have lately considered in several successive Nunbers — the subject of Idolatry.

There is not a more convincing proof, both of the reality and the depth of human depravity, than the existence of this monstrous sin: a sin, of which we, from the nature of our education, can form but very inadequate conceptions. It is (at least I find it so) very difficult to conceive how a rational being can bring himself to fall down and worship the work of his own hands; and were not the fact so lamentably demonstrative, it would to our minds appear altogether incredible.

Though, however, the inhabitants of Christian Britain may not be chargeable with the sin of idolatry in its literal meaning, yet doubtless all those must plead guilty of this abomination as to its principle, who devote their chief regard to any object but the ever-blessed God, and set upon the throne of their hearts any creature, instead of the Creator, who alone is worthy to be loved and served with all the heart, and soul, and mind, and strength.

The covetous man, says St. Paul, is an idolater (Eph. v, 5), evidently because he makes riches the chief object of his regard, "saying unto gold, Thou art my hope, and unto fine gold, Thou art my confidence."

The gay worldling, the man of fashion, and the sensualist, are all manifestly guilty of the same sin, inasmuch as they are "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God."

Must we not also include many of the more estimable members of society, whose walk and conversation is in many respects "lovely and of good report?" Does not a sinful anxiety for the gratification of those around us, often exclude from the thoughts that God in whom we live and move and have our being, and whose glory ought to be our chief aim and end in all things?

It were well if we could stop even here. Enter the church of God, and see if there be not in that hallowed place many visible spots of the same plague. To specify only one: — What shall we think of the eagerness with which one minister of Christ is followed on all occasions — on the ground of his talents, or not unfrequently from some peculiarity that does him no honour — to the neglect of others who preach with equal fidelity the same Gospel? Is not this making an idol of Paul, and Apollos, and Cephas? Is it not preferring the messenger to his message? Does it not resemble the crowding of a theatre to witness the performances of a favourite actor?

The subject is copious, and might be pursued much further: but I forbear to enlarge in your columns, and will therefore conclude by suggesting, that while we thus register the faults of our brethren, it is equally our duty and our interest to turn our view inward; and then we shall no doubt discover "chambers of imagery" in ourselves, that may well humble us in the dust, and lead us to pray with the Psalmist, "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting."

"It is the sinner's love of sin that makes him hate Christ. Does this form an excuse for his sin? No! no more than drunkenness would be an excuse for murder. One sin is not an excuse for another sin."

MONUMENTAL INSCRIPTION FOR ESTHER, QUEEN OF PERSIA.

Esther, or Hadassah, who, through her beauty and accomplishments, was raised from the condition of a captive to the throne of Persia, is too little known to many. Her name gives a title to one of the inspired books in the Bible, in which we behold an extraordinary display of Divine providence in favour of the exiled Jews. We have no particulars concerning the sequel of her history given in the sacred volume, nor do we know when or where this distinguished lady terminated her mortal course.

That we have no information relating to the subsequent condition of Esther, will not appear surprising when we reflect upon the book so called being only a "translated extract from the memoirs of the reign of the Persian monarch Ahasuerus." This will also enable us to account satisfactorily for the name of God being omitted in this book: the same consideration will also account for the Persian word "Purim" being retained; for the Jews being mentioned only in the third person; for Esther being so frequently designated as "Queen;" and Mordecai her uncle being called by the epithet of "the Jew." The same will also account for those numerous parentheses which interrupt the narrative, in order to subjoin the illustrations which were necessary for a Jewish reader; and for the abrupt termination of the memoir by one sentence relative to the power of Ahasuerus, and another concerning the greatness of Mordecai.

Sir Robert Ker Porter, a few years ago, in his travels, visited Ecbactana (Achmetha, Ezra vi, 2), the ancient capital of Media, and the summer residence of the Persian kings. Near to the new city, Hamadan, he was shown the tomb of Mordecai and Esther. It is covered by a dome, on which is the following inscription in Hebrew: "This day, 15th of the month Adar, in the year 4474 from the creation of the world, was finished the building of this temple over the graves of Mordecai and Esther, by the hands of the good-hearted brothers, Elias and Samuel, the sons of the deceased Ismael of Kashan."

Sir Robert gives the following description of this tomb. "I accompanied the priest through the town, over much ruin and rubbish, to an enclosed piece of ground, rather more elevated than any in its immediate vicinity. In the centre was the Jewish tomb; a square building of brick, of a mosque-like form, with a rather elongated dome at the top. The whole seems in a very decaying state, falling fast to the mouldering condition of some wall fragments around, which, in former times, had been connected with, and extended the consequence of, the sacred enclosure. The door that admitted us into the tomb, is in the ancient sepulchral fashion of the country, very small; consisting of a small stone of great thickness, and turning on its own pivots from one side. Its key is always in possession of the head of the Jews, resident at Hamadan."—"On passing through the little portal, which we did in an almost doubled position, we entered a small arched chamber, in which are seen the graves of several rabbis; probably, one may cover the remains of the pious Ismael: and, not unlikely, the other may contain the bodies of the first rebuilders after the sacrilegious destruction by Timour. Having trod lightly by their graves, a second door, of such very confined dimensions, presented itself at the end of the vestibule, we were constrained to enter it on our hands and knees, and then standing up, we found ourselves in a large chamber, to which appertained the dome. Immediately under its concave, stand two sarcophagi, made of a very dark wood, carved with great intricacy of pattern and richness of twisted ornament, with a line of inscription in Hebrew, running round the upper ledge of each."

Monumental Inscription on Esther.

The inscription in Hebrew characters, of the celebrated queen of Persia, is as follows:—"I praise Thee, O God, that Thou hast created me! I know that my sins merit punishment, yet I hope for mercy at thy hands: for whenever I call upon Thee, Thou art with me; thy holy presence secures me from all evil. My heart is at ease, and my fear of Thee increases. My life became, through thy goodness, at the last, full of peace. O God, do not shut my soul out from thy divine presence! Those whom Thou lovest, never feel the torments of hell. Lead me, O merciful Father, to the life of life; that I may be filled with the heavenly fruits of Paradise!—Esther."

Monumental Inscription on Mordecai.

The inscription in Hebrew characters, on the sarcophagus of Mordecai, is to the following effect:—"It is said by David, Preserve me, O God! I am now in thy presence. I have cried at the gate of heaven, that Thou art my God; and what goodness I have received from Thee, O Lord! Those whose bodies are now beneath in this earth, when animated by thy mercy, were great; and whatever happiness was bestowed upon them in this world, came from Thee, O God! Their grief and sufferings were many at the first; but they became happy, because they always called upon thy holy name in their miseries. Thou liftedst me up, and I became powerful. Thine enemies sought to destroy me, in the early times of my life; but the shadow of thy hand was upon me, and covered me as a tent, from their wicked purposes!—Mordecai."

"Many other inscriptions," says Sir Robert, "in the same language, are cut on the walls; while one, of the oldest antiquity, engraved on a slab of white marble, is let into the wall itself." This inscription relates to the uncle of Esther, and is as follows:—"Mordecai, beloved and honoured by a king, was great and good. His garments were as those of a sovereign. Ahasuerus covered him with this rich dress, and also placed a golden chain around his neck. The city of Susa rejoiced at his honours, and his high fortune became the glory of the Jews."

PSALM XXX, VER. 5.

"In his favour is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

Though dark and though drear be the night,
  And yet distant the break of the day,
The morning must come, and its light
  Will soon chase the shadows away.

Thy tears for the night may endure,
  But joy in the morning shall spring;
And the hand which hath wounded will cure,
  And thy tongue of His mercy shall sing.

Yes! "Life in thy favour," O Lord,
  Oh! "better than life" is to see;
Blest truth of thy covenant word,
  That thou art a Father to me.

CHARACTER OF ADAM.

With him his noblest sons might not compare
In god-like features and majestic air;
Not out of weakness rose his gradual frame—
Perfect from his Creator's hand he came;
And as in form excelling, so in mind,
The sire of men transcended all mankind.
A soul was in his eye; and in his speech
A dialect of heaven, no art could reach;
For oft of old, to him the ev'ning breeze
Had borne the voice of God among the trees:
Angels were wont their songs with his to blend,
And talk with him as their familiar friend.
But deep remorse for that mysterious crime,
Whose dire contagion, through elapsing time,
Diffus'd the curse of death beyond control,
And wrought such self-abasement in his soul,
That he, whose honours were approach'd by none,
Was yet the meekest man beneath the sun.
From sin, as from the serpent that betray'd
Eve's early innocence, he shrunk afraid;
Vice he rebuk'd with so severe a frown,
He seem'd to bring an instant judgment down.
Yet while he chid, compunctious tears would start,
And yearning tenderness dissolve his heart;
The guilt of all his race became his own,
He suffer'd as if He had sinn'd alone.
Within the glen to filial love endear'd,
Abroad, for wisdom, truth, and justice fear'd,
He walk'd so humbly in the sight of all,
The vilest ne'er reproach'd him with his fall.
Children were his delight!—they ran to meet
His soothing hand and clasp'd his honour'd feet;
While 'midst their fearless sports supremely blest,
He grew in heart a child among the rest.
Yet as a parent, nought beneath the sky
Touch'd him so quickly as an infant's eye;
Joy from its smile of happiness he caught—
Its flash of rage sent horror through his thought:
His smitten conscience felt as fierce a pain
As if he fell from innocence again.

MONTGOMERY.

MILTON'S LOSS OF HIS SIGHT.

THE following extract from Dr. Symmons's Life of Milton, is a charming evidence of the pious resignation of our sublime poet, under one of the greatest afflictions to which life is heir. It is a part of a letter on the subject of his blindness, addressed by Milton to one of his literary friends.

"I have made up my mind to my case, as one evidently beyond the reach of cure; and I often reflect, that as many days of darkness, according to the wise man, are allotted to us all, mine, which by the singular favour of the Deity are divided between leisure and study, are recreated by the conversation and intercourse of my friends, are far more agreeable than those deadly shades of which Solomon is speaking. But if, as it is written, 'man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God,' why should not each of us acquiesce in the reflection, that he receives the benefits of sight, not from his eyes alone, but from the guidance and providence of the same Supreme Being? Whilst he looks out and provides for me as he does, and leads me about, as it were, with his hand through the paths of life, I willingly surrender my own faculty of vision, in conformity to his good pleasure; and, with a heart as strong and as stedfast as if I were a Lynceus, I bid you, my Philarus, farewell."

A COMMENTARY UPON THE HOLY BIBLE,

From Henry and Scott, with Observations and Notes from other Writers, Vol. I, GENESIS to DEUTERONOMY; Vol. II, JOSHUA to ESTHER; Vol. III, JOB to SOLOMON'S SONG. 8vo.

"All Scripture is given by inspiration of God;" it must, therefore, have been written in a style adapted to the capacities of the great bulk of mankind. Its glorious doctrines are so plainly and perspicuously stated, that by attending to them, "wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein," from the saving truths of God. No unlearned man, possessing a truly humble mind, seeking the grace of the Holy Spirit upon his reading or hearing of the Scriptures, need fear mistaking the design of the Bible, or that he shall fail of an effectual acquaintance with its divine doctrines.

Still every serious reader of the Holy Scriptures, however learned, feels his need of the friendly help of a wise Commentator. Works of this class have become numerous, and their number, we believe, will yet greatly increase. But among all the Commentaries of various merit extant, we cannot but regard this, published by the Religious Tract Society, as decidedly the best for those who are able to purchase but one. Each of the three volumes already published, contains an immense mass of the most valuable Biblical matter, both introductory to the several books, and expository of the sacred texts, selected from a great many standard authors, but chiefly from the excellent Commentaries of HENRY and SCOTT. We have read a considerable portion of these volumes, and with the highest satisfaction: we admire the skill with which the compilation has been made, and rejoice to see so precious a treasure thus placed within the reach of our peasantry, our mechanics, and the humbler classes of our countrymen.

THE MORN OF LIFE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GELLERT.

His morn of life, how wondrous fair,
How beauteous was his bloom!
But, ah! he strayed from virtue's ways,
And pangs his life consume.

His livid eye, his wasted form,
His haggard aspect pale,
Of many a fearful hidden vice
Recount the hideous tale.

"O Lord of Hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee."—While, therefore, we are strangers and sojourners here below, far from that heavenly country where we would be, in whom should we trust to bring us to the holy city, new Jerusalem, of which the Lord God and the Lamb are the temple, but in thee, O Saviour and Redeemer, who art the Head of every creature, the Captain of the armies of heaven and earth, the Lord of Hosts and the King of Glory? "Blessed, thrice blessed, is the man that trusteth in thee."

SUNDAY SPORTS.

PROFANATION OF THE LORD'S DAY.

TIANITY is the acknowledged religion of Great
. And whatever may be the abuses practised its hallowed name, through which, in a great men-infidelity may be cherished, and boast of many es among all classes, no scholar, of sane mind, een found of late years, possessed of sufficient ss to question seriously its authenticity or its di-
Its evidences are so numerous and convincing mind of every intelligent person, that however y be unwilling to comply with its spiritual re-ents, he cannot hesitate to pronounce it to have ed with God. Why then, it may be asked, are cred institutions so generally neglected? Why hallowed day of the Sabbath so awfully pro-

gion, morality, and public happiness are most lamentnjured by the prevailing, and we fear increasing, ation of the Lord's day. This is the conviction of Moral Philosopher, and of every sound Politician, as of every Christian. We love our country, and eply concerned for its peace and security, its liberty osperity: but its interests, in these respects, can be ed, only by the habitual regard to the holy and ial laws of God.

t sincerely do we rejoice in the publication of a rt from the Select Committee of the House of ons on the observance of the Lord's day; ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, Aug. 6, 1832." It is published in a tract of sixteen 8vo. pages; and we earnestly wish it to be possessed by every reflecting person in the community.

I.

Profanation of the Lord's day, by "Sunday Sports," as represented in our engraving, though not so general as it was fifty years ago, still prevails in many remote parishes of our favoured country. Of this we could give most affecting illustrations: but our object at present is to refer to the "Report from the Select Committee of the House of Commons."

"The Metropolis and its immediate neighbourhood" formed the principal scene of inquiry by this "Honourable Committee." They state, "Your Committee regret to be under the necessity of stating, that the evidence which has been submitted to them, exhibits a systematic and widely-spread violation of the Lord's day, which, in their judgment, cannot fail to be highly injurious to the best interests of the people, and which is calculated to bring down upon the country the Divine displeasure." This is language worthy of Christian legislators!

Referring to certain districts on a Sunday morning, they say, "the state of these places is described as 'more like a fair than a market;' so that the neighbourhood is quiet upon any other day of the week compared with the Sunday. The people who frequent these shops and markets are chiefly the improvident, who, generally speaking, might have made their marketing to greater advantage on Saturday evening.

Master tradesmen and manufacturers are, in many instances, censurable in relation to this state of things. The Report correctly states, "With or without the knowledge of master tradesmen, it frequently happens that their foremen or clerks pay the workmen at public-houses, where, as a matter of patronage, are established pay-tables. There the men are appointed to meet, and by the time they have drunk 'for the good of the house,' it being considered necessary to drink something, the money is produced by the clerk, or in some instances by the publican himself; and, the score for the week's tippling being deducted, the remnant is put into the pocket of the man. Continuing to drink, as is but too frequent, he is taken to the Police Stationhouse. His wife follows, and late in the morning discovers, by the entries in the Police books, that his week's earnings are reduced to a few shillings. Then her Sunday morning's marketing commences. Even the wives (with their children), when looking after their husbands at public-houses, are frequently found to yield to the temptations which these places present; and thus whole families become victims to this baneful system."

Many continue at these public-houses the whole of Saturday night; and as the Report adds, "They may continue to drink until the hour of divine worship on Sunday, when they are turned into the street in the most disgusting state, to the great annoyance of the inhabitants passing to church; and in some districts, to such a height has this nuisance arrived, that fathers and husbands are deterred from taking their families to places of worship."

The case of the "journeymen bakers," consisting of many thousands in the Metropolis, is very grievous, 7,000 of whom have petitioned parliament for relief on the Lord's day. Their health and lives are sacrificed by almost incessant toil, besides their inability to attend the ordinances of divine worship. "In reference to the sacrifice of health of which this trade complains, it may be observed, that a witness, an acute and experienced medical gentleman, speaking generally of the effect, affirms, that, from the constitution of the human frame, the absence of it (of the periodical relaxation afforded by the weekly Sabbath) brings on necessarily premature decay and death." Report, page 5.

"In a few of the worst parts of the town," says the Report, "shops of various descriptions are kept open throughout the whole of the Sabbath day; and at the west-end of the town, especially in the neighbourhood of the wealthier classes, some shops, such as fishmongers and poulterers, although with closed doors, do much business, and until a late hour in the evening, in supplying articles for Sunday dinners to the rich. This is a practice which tends much to the discomfort and to the demoralizing of such persons, their journeymen, apprentices, and servants."—"As to penalties, some Sunday traders have been known 'openly to mock at them,' and have even offered to pay them six months in advance, to save the trouble of informations; boasting that their gains were so great on Sunday mornings, that they could well afford to pay 5*s.* out of them." We have heard of one of them taking 100*l.* on a Sunday.

Those most pernicious public nuisances, gin-shops, were not forgotten by the Committee. They say, "Most of the witnesses are of opinion, that no tippling of spirits or beer on the premises should be allowed throughout the Sabbath; but that shops should be open only for the sale of beer for the use of private families, and at proper hours."

Immorality and Sunday profanation curse the watering places in the vicinity of London. The Committee say, "It will likewise appear from the evidence, that from the great concourse of passengers in steam packets, much demoralization is produced by the crowds of strangers arriving at Gravesend and Richmond upon the Sundays, together with innumerable public and private carriages at the latter place. Several respectable tradesmen have described the state of Richmond; and the Curate declares, that the evil produced by the 'foreign influence' overpowers all attempts of the parochial ministers to bring about a better state of things. Your Committee are happy to observe, that, through the influence of conscientious and influential individuals, the steam communication with Margate on the Lord's day, has in a great measure been put a stop to."

Legislation may be so employed, we are confident, as to accomplish much in promoting the better observance of the Lord's day; but much more, we believe, depends on the exemplary piety and judicious zeal of Christians, of both public and private character. We cannot but rejoice to hear, therefore, the Report express such sentiments as the following: "Your Committee, however, whilst thus recommending an emendation of the law, as necessary to put down gross desecrations of the Lord's day, and to enable all classes to avail themselves of its privileges, avow that, in anticipating an improved observance of it, as the result of more efficient laws, they rely chiefly on the moral support which they would receive, as well from the highest authorities of the church, its clergy, and ministers of all denominations, as from the example of the upper classes, the magistracy, and all respectable heads of families; and, it may be added, from the increasing conviction of all classes, derived from experience, of the value of the day of rest to themselves."

Scotland was not altogether forgotten by the "Committee:" We were aware of the increasing "Profanation of the Lord's day," even in Scotland: but we were not fully acquainted with all particulars relating to that superior country. Education and religion generally prevail more in the "North," than in England: still there are many circumstances relating to that land of martyrs and confessors, which are seriously affecting and pernicious. This Report states—"It appears also to be a source of much inconvenience, that in Scotland a person cannot follow the business of a grocer, without having a spirit licence, many of the most irregular tippling-houses being also grocers' shops. Among the evils most complained of, is the insufficient accommodation in churches provided for the inhabitants in many places, and the accompanying impracticability of exercising a beneficial superintendence over the morals of the overgrown population. In large cities and towns, like Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee, Paisley, and Greenock, parishes contain often from 7,000 to 70,000 or 80,000 inhabitants, with seldom more than one incumbent. Hence, even when accommodation is, to a considerable extent, provided in chapels and meeting-houses of various denominations, a great many of the people, belonging to no congregation, are not practically subject to any efficient control or inspection; and thus many sources of disorder are suffered, without interruption, to extend their influence. An evil of not inferior magnitude has been alleged to spring from the inadequate provision made in such populous places for the education of the lower orders."

"As I walked here this morning," said a Metropolitan minister one Lord's day, "I saw some shops broad open, others half open, and some close shut. In those broad open I saw the daring sinner trampling on God's day. In those half open, I saw the legal principle—'I would open it quite if I dared.' And in those close shut I saw what the grace of God can do for a man—it can even make him give up his worldly interests."

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

His Juvenile Companions.

From his connection with the public grammar-school, in addition to the children of his immediate neighbours, the class-mates and other juvenile acquaintances of William —— were very numerous. Some of these were youths of remarkable promise: yet none of them were known as the sons of parents who were noted for their profession of religion, except one, who was a Baptist. But the manners of this good man were esteemed so grave, precise, and singular, that though none could make a reflection upon his mode of life, as deserving condemnation or censure, his rigid rules of morality, and his frequent attendance at meetings, even on week evenings, seemed to be worthy of notice only as distinguishing him from the whole population of the neighbourhood. His wife appeared to take no pleasure in the religious principles of her husband: she was accustomed, therefore, to apologise for the unrestrained levity of their children; and they, entertaining little respect for the self-denying notions of their father, which their mother did not regard with reverence, were equally far from the kingdom of God with their acquaintances, neglecting the things pertaining to their everlasting salvation.

Indeed, for a man to have been seriously religious at that period in Birmingham, was to have rendered himself, in the estimation of many, a very suspicious character; and he might expect to be branded as a Jacobin, an enemy to "church and king;" and the intolerant spirit of furious bigotry, which had produced the notorious and disgraceful "Birmingham Riots," was still in a high degree cherished by many of the population. Only one place of worship in the whole town, connected with the church of England, was, at that period, distinguished by the active zeal of its congregation for the pure gospel of Christ; and as that chapel had been built at the expense of a lady who was a Dissenter, or at least who was recommended to that noble act of liberality by Dissenters, one of whose ministers had been honoured as the instrument of her conversion to God, and as the assistant minister of the chapel had been educated among Dissenters, the principles of that congregation were regarded with peculiar suspicion by many, on the ignorant supposition of their cherishing the chief enemies of the church!

England being threatened at that period with an invasion by the French, under Buonaparte, almost every youth was urged to become a volunteer, or to enlist for a regular soldier; and almost every one of the early companions of William at school and at play, was by this means induced to enter the army. Frequently, in after years, did he look back with admiration and gratitude to that sovereign and gracious Providence, by which he was delivered from the circle of his young acquaintances at that remarkably critical period; and that he was bound an in-door apprentice, thereby being prevented from enlisting for a soldier, and so falling into their common excesses and enormities of conduct, into a premature grave, and perhaps into perdition! Several times did one or other of his young friends, by finding an opportunity to display before him the tempting guineas and large bank notes, as the price of the ample bounties which were paid to the recruits, endeavour to prevail with William to leave his business, run away from his situation, and join their honourable and merry ranks, in the service of King George: but the good hand of a covenant-keeping God preserved him from the snare, and kept him in the paths of duty and of peace, while the companions of his boyish years, in troops, perished in foreign lands.

Despatched in different directions, to join one or other of the detachments which were constantly embarking for a foreign campaign, many of his young acquaintances, before they had attained the twenty-first year of their age, were cut off in the field of battle, or dragged to an untimely grave by the various diseases which destroyed the flower of our country's youth. The fatal expedition to the Scheldt * especially, in 1809, took away many of the associates of his early days. On the isle of Walcheren, of which the army took possession, they perished miserably by disease, occasioned by the wetness of the country, and aggravated by the excessive use of ardent spirits, which were eagerly taken to counteract the influence of the contagion with which they were afflicted. "The Gin Fever," as the old soldiers called it, killed more than the sword!

* "At the end of July, 1809, a military force of 40,000, including 2000 cavalry, and 16 companies of artillery, commanded by Lieut.-General the Earl of Chatham; and a naval force of 39 sail of the line, and 36 frigates, besides mortar-vessels and gun-boats, under the orders of Rear-Admiral Sir Richard Strachan, sailed from the Downs, 'for the purpose of securing an object exclusively British, the capture or destruction of the enemy's ships at Antwerp or Flushing, or afloat on the Scheldt — the destruction of the arsenals and dockyards at Antwerp, Terneuse, or Flushing — the reduction of the island of Walcheren, and the rendering of the Scheldt, if possible, no longer navigable for ships of war.' On the 1st of August, Flushing was invested. On the 13th, the batteries were completed, and the frigates and mortar-vessels having taken their stations, the bombardment commenced. On the 14th, the cannonade from the fleet was so powerful, and a battery in breach besides being ready to open, that the commander-in-chief, trusting to the threatening aspect of affairs, suspended his operations for a few hours in the afternoon, and sent a summons to the garrison; but this being rejected, the firing recommenced, and the bombardment was most furiously renewed. At one o'clock, on the morning of the 15th, the French made offers of capitulation, which were accepted; and the garrison, amounting to more than 4,000 troops, were made prisoners of war. The commander-in-chief returned to England in the month of September, with the greater part of the land forces, and the remainder only retained possession of the island of Walcheren, till the disease, incident to the climate, more terrible than the sword to the soldier, forced them, after blowing up the fortifications of Flushing, which they had uselessly repaired, to return about the middle of November to hospitals in their own country. It was calculated, that one-half of the soldiers employed had fallen victims to the pestilential marshes of Walcheren during this expedition, which cost about twenty millions sterling."

THE NEGRO'S CRY.

Oh, ye that dwell on Britain's Isle,
Regard the Negro's cry!
Oh, let your sympathy awhile
Indulge the rising sigh!

In cruel chains behold us bound,
With many a dropping tear:
Oh, let us hear the Gospel sound:
Relieve our sorrows here!

No hope beneath, no hope above,
No light with darkness blended;
Strangers to Christian peace and love,
From suffering ne'er defended.

Oh, ye that dwell on Britain's Isle,
Regard the Negro's cry!
Oh, let your sympathy awhile
Indulge the rising sigh!

Go! Christian Herald! preach the grace
That sweetly conquer'd thee;
And let the Negro seek the face
Of glorious Deity.

Yes, we will lend our willing feet,
On wings of love we'll fly,
To tell of Him who waits to meet
Ev'n Negroes when they cry.

ADDRESS OF JOSEPH JOHN GURNEY, ESQ.

TO THE MECHANICS OF MANCHESTER.

HISTORICAL KNOWLEDGE may be considered as comprehending all the information which we receive respecting past events or still existing circumstances, on the testimony of others. It comprehends what we learn from the traveller as well as from the historian, and indeed almost all that we know of every description, about absent persons and things. If faith may be said to lie at the foundation of natural philosophy and mathematics, this is still more obviously true of history in its several branches. It is received by testimony alone: and if testimony is of a sound description; if it is that of an honest man; or if it is confirmed by collateral evidence; or more especially, if it comes from many independent, yet agreeing witnesses, no one hesitates to believe it, and to accept such information as knowledge.

Take the reform bill for an example. You are all of you assured beyond a doubt that it has passed both Houses of Parliament. You are certain that this is true. You know it for a fact. But on what is your knowledge founded? On the declarations of your neighbours, or on the authority of your newspapers. Among the mighty multitudes of men and women who were poured forth, the other day, in your streets, to celebrate the passing of the bill, we may presume that there was not one who did not know the fact. Probably, also, there was not one whose knowledge of it had any other foundation than that of simple faith in testimony.

Having thus endeavoured to classify the knowledge which you are here pursuing, and having briefly glanced at the foundation on which it all rests, I shall now turn to the main subject of my address—its right use and application. It is a common saying that "knowledge is power." He who gives up his mind to a state of darkness and ignorance, and brings scarcely any powers into use but those of his body, is no better than the brute on which he rides. Indeed he is in a far worse condition than the brute, because more responsible. These reflections must be obvious to all.

In looking, however, somewhat more particularly to this subject, I presume you will all agree with me in the sentiment, that as the subject of knowledge is truth, so the true purpose of it is happiness; and that knowledge is rightly applied, only when it promotes the comfort and substantial welfare of mankind.

Speculations which have no practical bearing, are by no means in fashion in the present day. Never was there a time when men were more ready to apply all things to some useful purpose: and this is especially true as it relates to science. We are accustomed to trace the right use and application of chemistry, in the workshop of the dyer, in the stores of the apothecary, in the prescription of the physician; of anatomy, in the skill of the surgeon; of hydraulics, in the powers of the water-wheel; of optics, in every kind of aid to our limited or fading vision. Above all, who that has witnessed the astonishing proofs of human ingenuity, by which this place and its vicinity are distinguished—who that has contemplated the gentle yet resistless movements of the steam engine, and the immense variety of machinery which it keeps in action—who that calls to mind the almost infinite quantity of useful material which is thus daily produced for the benefit of the world—can for a moment doubt the use of the science of mechanics?

Here, by the way, I may venture to express my conviction, that, practised as you are in the effective application of a well-arranged machinery, and aware of the multitude of persons which it is the means of employing, you can be little disposed to join in the idle cry which is sometimes heard against the use of it. Machinery is one means of immensely increasing the powers of man for useful purposes; and that it is our duty, in the sight of God and our fellow-creatures, to make the most of our capacities for such purposes, no sound moralist can deny. The fact is, that this, like every other application of our natural faculties, requires the regulation of moral and religious principle—of that fear of the Lord which restrains from evil, and of that love which "worketh no ill to his neighbour." Without this regulation, it may often be fraught with mischief; with it, it cannot fail to be both safe and desirable.

But let no one suppose that information and science can have no right application, except when they are directed to the supply of our external wants. It is not every species of knowledge, which is capable of being thus immediately applied to our comfort and convenience. But knowledge—in a yet wider range—has uses of its own, of a more refined description indeed, but nevertheless of substantial importance to the welfare and happiness of mankind. These uses may be severally contrasted with certain corresponding temptations which infest the path of learning; and in order to partake of the benefit, we must, in each case, exercise watchfulness and diligence to escape from the peril which lies on the opposite side.

1. Opposed to the danger of pride and self-conceit—the frequent consequence of superficial knowledge—is a benefit already alluded to as arising from a thorough cultivation of mind—the humiliation of man in the view of his own ignorance. The uncultivated mind is left without any conception of the vast extent and variety of things which are the objects even of human inquiry. But let a man fairly give himself to the study of some one branch of knowledge; let him go into the depth and breadth of the pursuit; and he will soon be convinced, that in this single department, he has abundant occupation for his utmost powers. He will be humbled under a feeling of the utter impossibility of his attaining to more than a small portion of the knowledge which is within the reach of man. But let him go farther; let him extend his inquiries on every side, with the zeal and ability of a Boyle or a Bacon, and he will soon perceive that all human knowledge is confined within narrow boundaries—that beyond these boundaries there lies a hidden infinite, into which it is vain for him to attempt to search—for it is known only to the Omniscient. He learns also what is the inevitable condition of human knowledge—that it must ever be founded on belief. Now these are lessons which have a strong tendency to deprive a man of his self-conceit, and to break down the haughtiness of his spirit; and just in proportion as they produce this effect, do they promote his real welfare. Pride is the curse of our species—the root of ambition, covetousness, wrath, malice, and cruelty. But humility works well for the happiness of individuals, and for the peace of society. Not all the pages of all the uninspired moralists who ever lived, can furnish a sentiment of so much weight and efficacy as that which was uttered by our holy Redeemer: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

THE KAMSCHATDALES TAUGHT MEDICINE BY BEARS.

WHEN a bear is wounded by a ball, he gathers leaves and fills up the wound with them. The Kamschatdales state, that they derive their medical knowledge from observing what herbs the bears apply to their wounds, and what method they pursue for recovery when languid and disordered.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER IX.

On the Cultivation of the Temper.

Dear Madam,

THE next topic upon which I wish to offer to you some observations is the cultivation of the temper. You are no doubt aware that temper is a borrowed term, being taken from the consistency of metals, and especially from the state of the edge of tools formed of metals; accordingly we speak of the temper as blunt, keen, sharp, rugged, &c.

The usual signification of the word is, the state of the disposition which is natural to it, and which it exhibits when tried by the various occurrences of human life. Every different individual has a different temper. This difference may arise from an original, native, inherent diversity in different persons. It is however certain, that although perhaps never really eradicated or substantially altered, it may be much modified, subdued, and directed to beneficial purposes. I need hardly say how much of the happiness of a human being depends upon his temper, and that as a subject of education it requires the earliest attention.

There is no doubt but that the disposition thus defined developes itself at a very early period. It is soon easy to discover whether a child is passionate or quiescent, tenacious or docile, &c. Whatever may be the characteristic disposition of a child, it will require attention and culture. The quiescent yielding disposition tends to sluggishness, and is rarely associated with intellectual ability; while the evils attendant upon the neglect of the impetuous disposition are too well known to need enumeration. Similar remarks may be made upon every other species.

It would be undertaking too much to embrace them all in the course of these observations: I shall therefore select one of them, which is by far the most common, I mean the energetic and impetuous.

From the earliest period a child discovers a disposition to direct, to govern, and to please himself. This is the development of the principle of self-love, a native and valuable instinct with which man is endued by the Creator. In proportion, however, as this native propensity is unregulated, or improperly indulged, it becomes powerful, and at no very distant period defies restraint from others, or even that which the individual himself may exert. Have we not often seen in society the disposition which we denominate the violent, an excessive energy and determination amounting to fury, both in the looks, tones, and gestures? The solution of this phenomenon is almost invariably, that the person was what we call a spoiled child. But such a person we generally may have remarked to be unhappy, and the cause of unhappiness to others. Themselves are in a perpetual dread lest their mind should explode in vengeance and violence, or perhaps (for such persons are often kind and generous) are occupied n deeply lamenting the mischiefs they have occasioned, he friendships they have lost, and the feelings they have wounded by their own unhappy temper; while others, especially their own family, witness their lowering countenance with something of the feeling of dread with which the inhabitant of the Indies sees the gloomy clouds which portend the tornado. Not unfrequently do such persons become habitually tyrannical, spiteful, and sarcastic.

All these consequences might have been prevented, had the temper been subjected at a proper time to a proper discipline, and the disposition itself have become he origin of perseverance and activity.

In the first place, it seems to be of the utmost importance to avoid every thing that approaches in the slightest degree to indulgence of any kind. Before you can make him understand the reasons of proper conduct, compel him to pursue it. Never, even while he is an infant, permit obedience to be even delayed.

If you avoid this from the beginning, he will never think of such a thing. Continue the system which makes your wish your law, and which he may never dream of withstanding or questioning. Let him bear the yoke of submission while a child, and he never will be an overbearing, insolent, impatient, or oppressive man.

Soon as he can understand you, show him the reasons why you recommend any particular action: but still expect him to adopt it. Sweetness of temper is the twin grace of docility. Accordingly he will grow up habituated to recognize every species of authority and to obey it. He will cheerfully make those concessions upon which tranquillity depends; whereas the indulgence of self-will assuredly entails upon him a disposition which rankles whenever any thing opposes his inclination.

Obedience to these rules from the earliest period, uniformly and habitually, will never be felt grievous; whereas if you neglect them, even for a short time, you will find yourself so situated, that you must by some violent, yet vain effort, attempt to regain your authority. This is what is called in vulgar life breaking the temper of a child.

Unhappy parents, who feel themselves called upon to attempt such an undertaking! Had they watchfully and habitually directed their conduct according to the principles of good sense, duty, and propriety, such a disastrous event in the history of a family would be unknown. But it never succeeded. Parents of such a character as could possibly have such an effort to make are universally unsteady in their proceedings with their children. To-day they beat or upbraid, and to-morrow atone by exuberant acts of kindness. The child, on the other hand, may have a sore skin from bruises, and a rebellious, revengeful, and discontented heart from his punishment; but his disposition is ruined for ever. I look forward in such cases, and at the distance of a few years behold the children given to lying, concealment, and perhaps theft. I see the unhappy parents without influence over their offspring, lamenting perhaps that they ever had children, or bewailing their hard fate that their children should have been of so unfortunate a kind; and perhaps completing all this mischief by a settled determination not to care whatever their children may be guilty of, and by some other such desperate resolution endeavouring to stem their own conscience, or to alleviate their own disappointment. On the other hand, contemplate in such a scene the verification of a principle of human experience applicable to all mankind, whether parents or children — "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." May your harvest be of a different nature!

I am, dear Madam, your, &c.
CLERICUS.

HERMAN BOERHAAVE, M.D.

IT was the daily practice of this eminent person, as soon as he rose in the morning, which was generally very early, to retire for an hour to private meditation. He often told his friends, when they asked him how it was possible for him to go through so much fatigue, that it was this which gave him spirit and vigour in the business of the day. This he therefore recommended as the best rule he could give; for nothing, he said, could tend more to the health of the body than the tranquillity of the mind; and that he knew nothing which could so well support the various distresses of life as a well-grounded confidence in the Supreme Being.

NOTICES OF THE WALDENSES.

The Waldenses were the first people in Europe, who, persuaded by their pastors, made regulations as a community for public instruction, and who provided, that children of every degree should be taught the elementary branches of education. In singular consistency with their claims to be considered a surviving branch of the primitive church, they alone, of all Christian societies, have honoured in uninterrupted observance the wisdom of the early Christian churches, which proclaimed it to be a bounden duty to provide by authority for the elementary instruction of youth of every class. "Not only do the rich," said Tatian, a Christian writer of the second century, "learn philosophy, but our poor also enjoy the advantages of instruction gratis." One of the MSS placed in the Cambridge University Library, by Sir Samuel Morland, in 1658, and written about the year 1100, was entitled "on the ancient discipline of youth." How valuable would it now be to the friends of education, could it be recovered! and though missing, we have no evidence that it is wholly lost. Reiner, a Roman Catholic writer, about 1230, writes, "Would you believe it, the Waldenses have schools everywhere, forty in one place, forty-two in another; they have translated the Old and New Testament into their vulgar tongue, and so teach them to their children. I myself have examined a clown who could repeat the book of Job by heart; and I have seen others who were perfectly acquainted with the whole of the New Testament!"

In a paper of secret directions given to the Dominican Inquisitors, who were to interrogate persons accused of the Waldensian heresy, towards the end of the thirteenth century, the following extraordinary testimony appears to the efficacy of the system promoted by the Waldenses: "You must not question them in matters of learning, or out of the Scriptures, for if you do, you will find them too much for you." This is given on the authority of Muratori, Dissert. 60. The impartial and honest Thuanus, though opposed to them in religious opinions, writes thus of them about 1590: "It is astonishing, that persons externally so rude and unrefined, should have had so much moral cultivation! You can scarcely find a boy among them who cannot give you an intelligible account of the faith they profess."

The same historian relates an anecdote belonging to a much earlier period—about a century before. A young student, who went among them to try to convert them to the faith of the Vatican, declared, that he had learned more of religion, by listening to the answers of the Vaudois children, while they were being catechized, than by all the learned disputations he had ever heard." He also records, that throughout the whole of Piedmont the well-instructed natives of the valleys were preferred as servants and labourers, so little was their knowledge found to make them idle or dissatisfied with their condition.

"The Noble Lesson," a sort of confesssion of faith in metre, written in 1100, still extant, informs us, that when a man systematically and conscientiously abstained from the excesses of his vicious companions, he was called in derision a Waldensian.

Assistance was sent from England in 1655 for their schools; and about that time was written the eighteenth sonnet of Milton on their sufferings. Cromwell's government interfered with good effect in their behalf; and Queen Mary and Anne afterwards sent liberal donations in aid of the education fund in the Valleys. Those who wish to know more of the history, and present state of this interesting people, will do well to consult the Tours of the Rev. W. Gilly and other Christian friends among them, and will learn with great pleasure the exertions lately made in this country for their benefit.—Quarterly Journal of Education.

MILTON'S SONNET.

ON THE MASSACRE IN PIEDMONT.

Avenge, O Lord! thy slaughter'd saints, whose bones
Lie scatter'd on the Alpine mountains cold!
Ev'n them, who kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worshipp'd stocks and stones,
Forget not: in thy book record their groans,
Who were thy sheep; and in their ancient fold
Slain by the bloody Piemontese, who roll'd
Mother with infant down the rocks, their moans
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
To heaven: their martyr'd blood and ashes sow
O'er all th' Italian fields, where still doth sway
The triple Tyrant; that from these may grow
A hundredfold, who, having learn'd Thy way,
Early may fly the Babylonian woe.

WHY PROTESTANTS REJECT THE APOCRYPHA.

Reasons why the books called the Apocrypha, which in the Douay Bible are named "Tobias, Judith, Esther from the 10th chapter 4th verse, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, Daniel from the 23d to the 90th verse of the 3d chapter and the 13th and 14th chapters, First and Second Maccabees," are rejected by Protestants, and not accounted inspired or canonical.

1. Because none of these books or chapters are found written in the Hebrew tongue, in which all the really inspired scriptures of the Old Testament are written.

2. Because they were never received by the Jewish church as part of the word of God. Paul tells us, that the words of God were committed to the Jews. See Rom. iii, 3, and ix, 4. Now the Lord Jesus often accused the Jews of making void the word of God, by adding their own traditions to it; but He never once accused them of taking from the word; which he surely would have done, if these books which they rejected were the word of God. Josephus, a learned Jew, who lived at the same time with St. Paul, gives an account of the books which the Jews believe to be inspired, which are those which Protestants now receive.

3. Because they were not received by the primitive Christians. They are not included in the catalogue of inspired writings, made by Melito, Bishop of Sardis, in the second century. Nor in the lists made by Origen, in the third century. Nor in the lists made by Athanasius, Hilary, Cyril, Epiphanius, Gregory Nazianzen, Amphilochius, Jerome, Rufinus, and others, in the fourth century; neither are they found in the list of canonical books recognized by the council of Laodicea in the same century, which council was acknowledged by the general body of Christians.

4. Some of these books plainly confess that they are not inspired writings. Thus, in 1 Mac. iv, 46, and ix, 27, it is confessed that there was then no prophet in Israel. In 2 Mac. ii, 24, we are told this book is only an Abridgment; and in xv, 39, the writer begs for pardon if he has not written the history correctly. Would an inspired writer act so?

5. They contain many passages, which contradict the canonical inspired scriptures. Thus, Wisd. xv, 14, which it is pretended was written by Solomon, contradicts 3 Kings iv, 20—25. In Baruch 1—4, we are told that Baruch went to Babylonia; which contradicts Jeremiah xliii, 4—7, where we are told he was taken by force into Egypt. In 2 Macc. xiv, 41 to the end, suicide is praised, in opposition to Exodus xx, 13. In Tobias vi, 19, enchantments are used, which are forbidden in Lev. xix, 26; Deut. xviii, 10, &c. Tobias xii, 8, 9, and Ecclesiasticus xxxv, 3, teach salvation by works, contrary to Rom. iii, 20, 24; Gal. ii, 16; Eph. ii, 9. In Macc. ii, 5, Jeremiah is represented as hiding the ark of the covenant, that the people might have it again when they returned from Babylon; this contradicts Jeremiah iii, 16.

6. Because these books contradict themselves. In 1 Macc. vi, 16, Antiochus is said to have died in Babylon; in 2 Macc. i, 16, he is said to die at Nanea in Persia; and in chap. ix, 28, he is again said to have died in a strange land. That is, he died three times. Tobias v, 18, contradicts xii, 15.

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

THIRD CENTURY.

29. Tertullian, Presbyter of Carthage, the metropolis of Africa, was brought up a pagan. His full name was Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus, and his father was a centurion, who served under the Proconsul of Africa. He was born about A.D. 160, at Carthage, and educated in all the learning and accomplishments which he could derive from either the Greeks or Romans. In his unregenerate state, according to his own representation, he was pre-eminent in vice, and in all respects an accomplished and notorious sinner. He was deeply implicated in the grossest sins of the age in which he lived, and devoted to the sanguinary entertainments of the Amphitheatre. His unblemished virtue in his subsequent life was equally remarkable; and this gave him peculiar advantage in assailing, as he did with irresistible force both of satire and argument, the abominations of heathenism.

We are unable to ascertain, with certainty, the period at which Tertullian embraced the gospel of Christ, nor the means and arguments which led to his conversion. It is thought to have taken place a little before the close of the second century, after a perusal of the Holy Scriptures, to which he was led by observing the triumphant efficacy of the Christian faith over the minds and lives of its professors.

Tertullian became one of the most able defenders of Christianity against the pagan priests and philosophers, at whose instigation the emperors and governors were stirred up to persecute the servants of God. He adhered to the most rigid customs observed among the Christians, practising the severest self-denial; but not without a mixture of superstition. Though not the most discriminating in his theology, Tertullian appears to have been sound in the great principles of the gospel, a man of sincere piety, and a vigorous opposer of the growing ambition of the bishops. His famous "Apology for the Christians," published about A.D. 200, contains many beautiful passages, from which we learn some particulars of the author's disposition, and of the manners of the believers in that age. He says, "We pray for the safety of the emperor to the eternal God, whom emperors themselves would desire to be propitious to them above all others who are called gods. We pray, looking up to heaven with outstretched hands, because they are harmless; with naked heads, because they are not ashamed; without a prompter, because we pray from the heart. Thus, then, let the claws of wild beasts pierce us, or their feet trample upon us, while our hands are stretched out to God—let crosses suspend us—let fires consume us—let swords pierce our breasts—a praying Christian is in a frame for enduring any thing. We are dead to all ideas of worldly honour and dignity: nothing is more foreign to us than political concerns: the world is our republic. We are a body united in one bond of religion, discipline, and hope. We meet in our assemblies for prayer. We are compelled to have recourse to the divine oracles for caution and recollection on all occasions. We nourish our faith by the word of God. Those who preside among us are elderly persons, not distinguished for opulence, but worthiness of character. Every one pays something to the public chest once a month, or when he pleases, and according to his ability and inclination; for there is no compulsion. These gifts are, as it were, the deposits of piety. Thence we relieve and bury the needy, support orphans and decrepit persons, those who, for the word of God, are condemned to the mines or imprisonment. This very charity of ours has caused us to be noticed by some: 'See,' say they, 'how these Christians love one another!'"

Tertullian's works consist of many Tracts on Christian subjects; but they are far less interesting for pious edification, than for their historical notices. Our contracted limits forbid us entering further into their merits. He is charged with embracing at least some of the errors of Montanus, who held several blasphemous or absurd notions: but few particulars are stated, beyond some philosophic refinements of that age, or African superstition.

Whether Tertullian was honoured with martyrdom, which it is said he desired, or not, is not ascertained: he is believed to have died about A. D. 216, or 220.

THE HONOURABLE CHARLES JAMES FOX,

ON THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

The author of a Pamphlet, entitled, "Circumstantial Details of the Last Moments of Mr. Fox," among many interesting particulars, relates the following conversation with that great statesman:—"A nobleman mentioning that he had formed a party of pleasure for Christmas, in which he had included Mr. Fox, added, 'It will be a new scene, Sir, and I think you will approve of it.' 'I shall indeed be in a new scene by Christmas next,' said Mr. Fox. 'My Lord, what do you think of the state of the soul after death?' Lord ——— (confounded by the unexpected turn of the conversation) made no reply. Mr. Fox continued, 'That it is immortal, I am convinced. The existence of the Deity is a proof that spirit exists; why not, therefore, the soul of man? And if such an essence as the soul exists, by its nature it may exist for ever. I should have believed in the immortality of the soul though Christianity had never existed; but how it acts as separated from the body, is beyond my capacity of judgment. This, however, I shall know by next Christmas.'"

"THE COURT OF HOLY INQUISITION."

The following anecdote evinces the ascendancy which this blood-stained court maintained during the last three centuries over the minds of the common people, who from their cradles were endued with such a reverence and enthusiastic passion for the service of this awful tribunal, that it got the better of all sentiments of religion and honour, nay, even of that tenderness which is natural to the human species.

"Philip III of Spain, having been on one occasion so moved by the cries of the condemned, at an Auto da Fè, as to say, 'How hard is it for men to die for their belief!' the Inquisitor General sent to inform him, that the Holy Office expected satisfaction for his crime: nor would he be appeased till the king consented to have some blood drawn from his arm, which the executioner threw into the fire before the whole assemblage of Madrid!"

REFLECTIONS IN THE COLISEUM AT ROME.

BY SIR HUMPHREY DAVY.

It was a still and beautiful evening in May, when I first visited these striking ruins: the last sunbeams were dying away in the western sky, while their bright tints lighted up the scene, and, as it were, kindled the snows still visible on the distant Apennines. In this glow of colouring, the green of advanced spring softened the grey and yellow tints of the decaying stones, and as the light gradually became fainter, the masses appeared grander and more magnificent; and when the twilight had entirely disappeared, the contrast of light and shade in the beams of the full moon, gave a solemnity and magnificence to the spot, which awakened the highest degree of emotion. The beauty and permanency of the heavens, the works of an eternal and divine Architect, were finely opposed to the perishing works of man in his most active and powerful state. And so humble appeared the condition of the most exalted of human beings, so feeble their powers, so limited the space and period in which they act, that I could hardly avoid comparing the generations of man to the swarms of fire-flies which were flitting around me, and sparkling amid the gloom and darkness of the ruins, but which were no longer visible when they rose above the horizon, their feeble light being lost in the brightness of the heavens.

In such moments, and among such scenes, it is impossible not to be struck with the nothingness of human glory, and the transiency of human works. This, one of the greatest monuments on the face of the earth, in a few ages will be but as dust; and of all the testimonials of the vanity or power of man, whether raised to immortalize his name, or, as the pyramids, to contain his decaying bones without a name, none has a duration beyond the existence of a few score generations.

This train of ideas continued to flow with increased force. No new city, I thought, will rise again out of the double ruins of this. No new empire will be founded upon these colossal remains of that of the old Romans. The world, like the individual, flourishes in youth, rises to strength in manhood, falls into decay in age; and the ruins of an empire are like our own decrepit frame, except that they have some tints of beauty which nature bestows upon them.

Time, which purifies, and as it were sanctifies the mind, destroys and brings to decay the body, and amidst these ruins appears to be eternal in its age.

The remains of the palace of the Cæsars, and their golden halls, appear in the distance, their grey and tottering turrets and massy arches reposing as it were on the decaying vegetation; and there is nothing to mark the existence of life, but the few devotees wandering around me, kneeling before the cross, and demonstrating the triumph of a religion, which received on this very spot, in the early period of its existence, one of its most severe persecutions, and which has, nevertheless, by its sanctifying influence, preserved not only all that remains of these relics, and all that was worth preserving of arts and literature, but likewise those institutions which afford us happiness in this world, and hopes of a blessed immortality in the next. How great is the contrast between the present application of this building, connected with holy feelings and exalted hopes, to that of ancient time, when it was used to exhibit to the Roman people the destruction of men by wild beasts, or of men more savage than wild beasts by each other, to gratify a horrible depravity of inclination! And who, in the days of Titus, would have supposed, that a faith, despised for its insignificant origin, and persecuted from the obscurity of its founder and its principles, should have reared a dome to the memory of one of its humblest teachers (St. Peter), more glorious than was ever built for Jupiter or Apollo in the ancient world; and have preserved even the ruins of the temples of the pagan deities, and have burst forth in splendour and majesty, consecrating truth among the shrines of error, employing the objects of idolatrous superstition for the most holy purposes, and rising, a bright and constant light to illumine the darkness which followed the destruction of the Roman Empire!

TESTIMONY OF ROUSSEAU TO THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST.

The following testimony of this philosopher to the glorious perfection of Christ's character is extremely valuable.

"The majesty of the Scriptures strikes me with admiration, as the purity of the gospel has its influence on my heart. Peruse the works of our philosophers, with all their pomp of diction, and how contemptible they appear when compared with scripture! Is it possible, that a book at once so simple and sublime, should merely be the work of man? What prepossession, what blindness, must it be to compare Socrates to the Son of Mary! What an infinite disproportion is there between them! Socrates dying without pain or ignominy, easily supported his character to the last; and if his death had not crowned his life, it might have been doubted whether, with all his wisdom, he was any thing more than a vain sophist. He invented, it is said, the theory of morals; others, however, had before put them in practice, he had therefore only to reduce examples into precepts. But where could Jesus learn that pure and sublime morality, of which he only has given us both precept and example? The death of Socrates, peaceably conversing with his friends, appears the most agreeable that could be wished for; that of Jesus, expiring in the midst of agonizing pains, abused, insulted, and accused by a whole nation, is the most horrible that could be feared. Socrates, in receiving the cup of poison, blessed the weeping executioner who administered it; but Jesus, in the midst of excruciating tortures, prayed for his merciless tormentors. Yes—if the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus were those of a God!"

PRAISE TO GOD.

Had I as many mouths as sands there are,
Had I a nimble tongue for every star,
And every word I speak a character,
And every minute's time ten ages were,
To chaunt forth all thy praise, 'twould not avail,
For tongues, and words, and times, and all would fail.
Much less can I, poor weakling, tune my tongue
To take a task befits an angel's song.
Sing what thou canst; when thou hast spent thy store,
Sit down and weep that thou canst sing no more;
Reblur thy book with tears, and go thy ways,
For every blur will prove a book of praise.

CHURCH OF ST. PETER, AT ROME.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH at Rome is, undoubtedly, the most magnificent pile of modern architecture in the world. This noble structure stands on the site of Caligula's Circus; it was first dedicated by Constantine the Great to the Twelve Apostles. But it was entirely rebuilt during the reign of eleven succeeding popes, and finished in the sixteenth century, having cost the enormous sum of 12,000,000*l.* sterling, which would have cost in our time and country, not less than 36,000,000*l.* sterling. It is 730 feet long; 520 broad; and 450 in height to the cupola, which is itself 620 feet round, and surpasses in magnitude, beauty, sublimity, and costliness, all the pagan temples of antiquity.

From our engraving, a general idea may be obtained of its plan and form. St. Paul's in London is somewhat similar, but much less than St. Peter's at Rome, without considering that this church is approached by a grand and spacious Piazza. The double colonnade on each side, extending in a semicircular sweep — the stupendous obelisk of black marble, brought from Egypt, eighty feet high, standing on a pedestal of thirty more, and surmounted by a brass cross gilt — the two fountains — the portico — and the splendid front of the church, — present such an assemblage of magnificent objects as cannot fail to impress the mind of every spectator with awe and admiration.

The church appears in the back ground, and on each side is a quadruple row of arches, resting on two hundred and eighty-four pillars, and eighty-eight pilasters; the arches support one hundred and ninety-two statues, twelve feet high. The two noble fountains throw a mass of water to the height of about nine feet, from which it falls in a very picturesque manner, and adds greatly to the beauty of the scene. In the centre the fine obelisk is placed.

At the first entrance into St. Peter's, the effect is not so striking as might be expected; but at every step it seems to improve on all sides. The proportions are so accurately observed, that the parts are seen, each to an equal advantage without distinguishing itself above the rest. Although every object in this church is admirable, the most astonishing part is the cupola. On ascending to it, the spectator is surprised to find, that the dome which he sees in the church, is not the same with the one he had examined without doors, the latter being a kind of case to the other, and the stairs by which he ascends into the ball, lying between the two. Had there been the inward dome only, it would scarcely have been seen by those who are without; and had both been one solid dome of so great thickness, the pillars would have been insufficient to support a mass so immense.

To a spectator who stands beneath the dome, an architectural display is presented, more glorious than can easily be conceived. If he looks upward, he is astonished at the spacious hollow of the cupola, and has a vault on every side of him, which makes one of the most beautiful vistas, which the eye can possibly penetrate. To convey an idea of its vast magnitude, it will suffice to say, that the height of the body of the church, from the ground to the upper part of the ceiling, is 432 feet, and that sixteen persons may place themselves, without inconvenience, in the globular top over the dome, which is annually lighted, on the 29th of June, with 4,000 lamps and 2,000 fire-pots, presenting a most enchanting spectacle.

Of the one hundred and thirty statues, with which this church is adorned, that of St. Peter is the most conspicuous; it is said to have been re-cast from a bronze statue of Jupiter Capitolinus. One hundred and twelve lamps are constantly burning around the tomb of this Saint; and the high altar is shadowed by a ceiling, which exceeds in loftiness that of any palace in Rome. The splendid sacristry was built by Pope Pius VI. But by far the greatest ornaments of the interior are the excellent works in Mosaic, all copied from the most celebrated pictures, which are thus guarded from oblivion.

The upper end of the church stands to the west. Here is no separation of that part for the choir, as is the case in St. Paul's, and the other English cathedrals. A side chapel is appropriated to that purpose: so that at first entrance there is a spacious open view, continued quite to the further end of the church; where, aloft, against the wall, is placed the CHAIR OF ST. PETER, supported by the four great doctors of the Latin church, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, St. Ambrose, and St. Gregory; and the representation of a glory above, with angels, &c. all of copper, forming a most costly and noble ornament. But the real chair of St. Peter is pretended to be within that exposed to public view. The ornaments of this chair alone are said to have cost 107,551 Roman crowns, value 5*s.* 6*d.* each.

The pavilion of the great altar, which stands under the cupola, is accounted the finest ornament in the whole work: it is very uncommon, and exceedingly magnificent. It is supported by four wreathed pillars of Corinthian brass, which was taken by Pope Urban VIII from off the Portico of the Pantheon: they are adorned with festoons and foliage of the same metal, disposed in a very agreeable manner. They say that under this altar are deposited half the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul, and that the other half of them is elsewhere: either at the old church of St. Paul without the city, or that of St. John Lateran.

The great cupola is all wrought in Mosaic, as are the four angels immediately under it. Within the cupola itself are the twelve apostles in several compartments, which fill the first great circle that goes round the cupola: above them angels in the same manner; and at the top of the lantern, which rises above the cupola, is represented the DEITY, as an old man with his arms extended, also performed in Mosaic. In the four angles under are represented the four evangelists: the side cupolas are also wrought in Mosaic: the church itself is encrusted with beautiful marble.

It would be endless to enter into particulars respecting the statues, paintings, Mosaics, and basso-relievos, with which every part of this great structure abounds, together with the noble sepulchral monuments of several popes, and that of Christina, queen of Sweden.

We cannot close this brief notice of the noblest architectural monument in honour of the Christian name, without one reflection. Cathedrals, and splendid edifices of that class, have never been celebrated for the ministry of the Gospel of Christ. Commonly there is less of pure Christianity seen and heard within their walls, than in the most lowly building dedicated to the worship of God; and as to St. Peter's at Rome, it would probably be impossible to prove, that amid all its gorgeous ceremonies, a single sermon has been delivered in it, worthy of the names of Peter and Paul, the Apostles of Christ, or that a single soul has been by its imposing forms truly converted to God!

ROME IN ITS ANCIENT GLORY.

ST. AUGUSTINE, who died in Africa, A. D. 430, is said to have ardently wished to have seen three things:—Solomon in his splendour, seated on his throne of ivory and gold — Paul, the apostle, preaching the Gospel of Christ — and Rome, in the days of its glory. Rome had long been the metropolis of the world; and its unparalleled magnificence was celebrated through all nations.

Caractacus, the renowned British king, enjoyed the gratification of the latter wish of that distinguished Christian father, when he was led captive through the streets of Rome; and filled with astonishment on beholding such grandeur, he uttered that rational exclamation, "Is it possible, that a people so wealthy and luxurious, should envy me a humble cottage in Britain?"

Our classic readers will associate with Rome, the recollection of its demigods and heroes, statesmen and orators, historians, poets, and philosophers. They will think of Virgil and Horace, Livy and Tacitus, Scipio and Sylla, Marius and Pompey, Cæsar and Cicero, Brutus and Cato, names which are inseparable from Roman glory.

Rome was built upon seven hills; but three others were afterwards inclosed within its walls. Augustus Cæsar divided it into fourteen wards; and it attained its utmost extent in the reign of Valerian, who died A. D. 270, when its circumference exceeded fifty miles. Authentic documents are wanting by which to determine the extent of its population; some rating it at 6,800,000, in the time of Trajan; while others, among whom is to be ranked the celebrated historian Gibbon, suppose that it never exceeded 1,200,000. Both these estimates appear incorrect; and the truth seems to lie between them: probability fixes the number of souls in Rome, when at its most flourishing state, at about 3,000,000.

Titles, the most extravagant, were given to Rome, by its proud inhabitants. "The Dwelling Place of the Gods"—"The Centre of Imperial Power"—"The Citadel of the Universe"—"The Gate of all Nations"—"The only Place in all the Universe, where Virtue, Empire, and Dignity, fixed their concentrated Abodes"—the "Holy"—the "Victorious"—the "Invincible"—and finally, the "Eternal City."

Rome, when in the full blaze of glory, contained 700 temples, and altars almost innumerable; 3 senacula, or halls of the senate; 21 basilicæ, or stately palaces, for the administration of justice; 15 nymphiæ, or great halls to marry in; 2077 domis, or splendid palaces; and a vast number of private mansions, called insulæ, so separated from one another, that a person might walk round them; 145 public offices; 2 large hospitals; 22 famous porticos, where the people might walk in time of rain, or to avoid the excessive heats of a meridian sun; 29 public libraries; 5 colleges or academies, for the instruction of youth; 254 hand mills for grinding corn; 327 granaries; 39 colossuses of brass; and 51 of marble. Eleven colossal statues adorned the Capitol, or temple of Jupiter; and 19 of gold, and 30 of solid silver, shone in different parts of the city. Six enormous obelisks; 42 lesser ones, with many pyramids; 32 sacred groves; 23 ponds for watering horses; 14 principal aqueducts; 105 fountains; 1352 pools or lakes, brought into the city from distant springs; 17 great squares or forums, 12 of which were used as markets; 117 public baths, and 909 private ones. Some idea may be formed of the public baths from those of Dioclesian and Caracalla; the latter of which had marble seats for 1600 persons to bathe in, without seeing one another; and the former, 3200 seats of polished marble.

The golden palace of the worthless Nero was the largest and the most splendid of Imperial Rome. In the threshold stood a colossal statue of that emperor, 120 feet high. There were three porticos, each a mile in length, and supported by three rows of pillars. The gardens resembled a park, and contained an immense sheet of water, and woods, vineyards, and pleasure grounds, with herds, and even wild beasts. On the banks of the lake, rose various edifices resembling towns. In the palace itself the rooms were lined with gold, gems, and mother-of-pearl. The ceilings of the dining-rooms were adorned with ivory pannels, so contrived as to scatter flowers and shower perfumes upon the guests. The principal banqueting room revolved upon itself, representing the celestial bodies with their motions. The baths were supplied with salt water from the sea, and mineral water from the Solfatara, near Tivoli. The statues of bronze and marble appeared in every part of Rome in such profusion as to form, in the hyperbolical expression of Cassiodorus, "a population numerically equal to the living inhabitants." There were 5 theatres; 2 amphitheatres; and 7 circuses. The Circus Maximus alone, contained seats for 300,000 spectators!

The Flavian amphitheatre, from its stupendous colossal magnitude called the Colisæum, the ruins of which still remain, and fill the mind of the beholder with astonishment, was situated in the centre of the hills, towering as high as their lofty summits. At the inauguration of this amphitheatre, 9000 animals were destroyed; and when the combats were concluded, the arena was suddenly filled with water, on which aquatic animals were seen to contend; and these again gave place to a number of ships that represented a naval battle.

Twelve thousand Jewish captives were employed by Vespasian in raising this enormous edifice, the building of which occupied only two years and nine months. Its seats or steps contained 87,000 spectators; and if we add, at a very moderate calculation, 11,000 placed in the porticos, and 12,000 in the surrounding passages, where moveable seats might be placed, it must have contained at least 110,000 persons, who could distinctly behold the games and combats on the arena. It was of an oval form, whose longest diameter was 615 feet 6 inches, and its shortest 510 feet; the longest diameter of the arena, or pit, was 281 feet, the shortest 176 feet; thus leaving for the seats and galleries a circuit of 175 feet broad. Its external circumference was 1770 feet, covering a superficies of five acres and a half. Its external elevation was 120 feet, consisting of three stories of arcades, embellished with Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian pillars.

No buildings, not even those prodigious piles, the Egyptian pyramids, can vie with the Colisæum. Those were merely massy and vast, the works of rude force, without regard to order, or elegance of design; but the Colisæum required the utmost degree of architectural skill, as well as the resources of a mighty and opulent empire. With a sublime magnificence, which, after the lapse of eighteen centuries, is still contemplated with astonishment in its ruins, it united that elegant simplicity that marks the refinement of cultivated taste; thus affording a specimen of human power altogether wonderful; and a proof of the skill, the energy, the resources, and the grandeur of the Romans.

Of the squares of ancient Rome, that of Trajan was the most conspicuous. It consisted of four porticos, supported by pillars of the most beautiful marble. The roof of the porticos rested upon brazen beams, and was covered with plates of the same metal. It was adorned with statues and chariots of gilded brass; and the pavement was of variegated marble. The entrance was by a triumphal arch at one end; at the other, and opposite, was a temple. On one side was a basilica, on the other a public library. In the centre, rose sublime the celebrated column, crowned with a colossal statue of Trajan; and the equestrian statue of that emperor fronted the basilica. Apollodorus was the architect of this wonderful pile; and so great was the beauty, we might say the perfection of the architecture, and so rich the materials, that those who beheld it were struck dumb with astonishment, and utterly at a loss to find words with which to express their admiration, as is plainly the case with Ammianus Marcellinus; whose very Latin, in reciting his feelings at the view of this matchless structure, is absolutely untranslatable.

Constantius, the emperor, a cold and unfeeling prince, who had visited all the cities of Greece and Asia, and was familiar with the superb edifices of Ephesus, Magnesia, and Athens, was struck dumb with admiration as he proceeded in triumph through the streets; but when he entered the forum of Trajan, and beheld the wonders of that matchless structure, his chilly soul was moved; he felt a momentary enthusiasm, and burst into exclamations of surprise and astonishment. Fixing his attention on the equestrian statue of Trajan, fronting the basilica, and asking "Where such another horse could be found?" he met with a smart repartee from Hormisdas, a Persian prince, and brother of the great Schabour, who accompanied him: "Supposing we find such another horse, who would build him such another stable?"

The very sewers of ancient Rome, for the purpose of draining away the filth of the city, were stupendous; and on one occasion, it required a hundred thousand pounds sterling to cleanse them!

Of all the religious edifices of Pagan Rome, the Capitol, the temple of Jupiter, was at once the most ancient, the most opulent, and the most magnificent. Tarquinius Priscus erected it, in consequence of a vow which he had made in the Sabine war. Tarquinius Superbus, finished it, with the spoils taken from the neighbouring nations; and after the expulsion of the kings, it was consecrated by the consul, Horatius. It stood on a high ridge of ground, occupying about four acres. The front was adorned with three rows of pillars, the other sides with two. The ascent from the ground was by 100 steps. The prodigious gifts and ornaments with which it was at different times adorned, almost exceed belief. Augustus at one time gave to it in coin, gold bullion, and jewels, to the value of 1,600,000*l.* From its site, it was the most conspicuous, and from its destination, the most sacred of all the Roman temples. To it the consuls repaired to be solemnly inaugurated. In it the emperors received the imperial diadem, and were clothed with the regal habiliments. Thither the victorious consuls, followed by their conquering legions, and preceded by captive princes, rode in solemn triumph. In it were deposited the treasures of vanquished monarchs; it was enriched with the spoils of temples and of royal domes, and with the plunder of a conquered world!

In reality, the Capitol was the treasury of the imperial city; the depository of accumulated triumphs, during centuries of victory and conquest. Crowns, shields, and statues of gold, the offerings of kings, heroes, and emperors, blazed on every side, and adorned, with equal profusion, the interior and exterior of this temple of dominion, this throne of empire, this sanctum sanctorum of pagan religion. Its threshold was bronze; the valves of its portals were gold; the roof was bronze, but bronze doubly and triply gilt. The value of gilding alone amounted to 3,000,000*l*. The pediment, the sides, and the summit of the roof presented horses, chariots, heroes, and gods; the Roman eagle, and its attendant, Victory, all of bronze, silver, or gold, glittering to the sun, and dazzling with rival splendour the eyes of the spectators. Deluded by its magnificence, they might well call it "The Eternal City!"

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

His Fellow Workmen.

PECULIAR were the circumstances of William ——— in his situation in the manufactory: but they cannot be accurately understood, without some brief notices of the characters of those who were his principal fellow-workmen.

In the manufactory where William ——— was employed, there were five other apprentices, younger than himself; but none of whose parents were known as professors of religion. There were also six journeymen, who continued in the same employ during the greater part of his seven years of servitude: but only one of them was considered as regarding the forms of public worship. He was an orderly, sober, worthy man; but he was not remarkably qualified to become the undaunted, wise, and eloquent advocate of scriptural religion and personal piety, against the impious jocularity, and the profane levity of his ungodly shopmates. Their impiety occasioned him no little distress, and made him rather shun an opportunity of dispute with them on the subject of religion. Of the remaining five, only one was a man of tolerable sobriety, and all the other four, though excellent workmen in their respective branches of an ingenious fancy trade, were vulgar and gross in the extreme; and their vulgarity was displayed especially, in their senseless reflections upon the forms and spirit of religion. And that which to some may appear astonishing, but which is still by no means uncommon, was, those who were most skilful and ingenious as mechanics, were generally the most determined in their enmity to the realities of vital godliness.

When at any time religion became a subject of conversation,—and sometimes even these haters, both of its spirit and its forms, presumed to talk on that holy and venerable subject,—the characters or histories of Scripture, very imperfectly known, were referred to, as affording the most convenient topics for their stupid and wicked jesting. However awful and shocking such a practice may seem, to those young persons, who, at home, have been brought up by their pious parents "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," this wicked and dangerous practice is known to be not uncommon in our days, in many manufactories. Surely "the LORD will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain," as himself has solemnly declared: how awfully criminal, then, must it be in men,—ingenious and rational men,—to trifle and sport with his holy word! in addition to the violation of the third commandment!

The Dissenters were frequently spoken of: but it was generally for the purpose of ridiculing their custom of serious prayer, and of censuring their presumption, in supposing themselves wiser in matters of religion than their neighbours, and especially the clergy, who had been taught at the universities; and condemning their principles as methodistical, without their understanding either the meaning of that term, or the doctrines or the discipline of the people who call themselves Methodists. They professed themselves to be churchmen: but they denounced their "own parsons" as avaricious; influenced merely by the love of money, which was declared to be their trade; and they were indeed able to refer to instances, well known, which fully justified their severe reflections. Such cases were not uncommonly adduced, as a complete justification of their own irreligion: but these objections were, in reality, only the fruit of "the carnal mind, which is enmity against God."

The general character and principles of these workmen, may be tolerably well inferred, from a short statement of the miserable manner in which the mortal career of four of them was terminated. Though ingenious and clever as mechanics, and capable of earning ample wages, their rooted habits of intemperance always kept them wretchedly and pitiably poor. After a course of drinking for two or three days together, they would come to the shop in a state sufficiently deplorable to excite the commiseration of every feeling heart; and for the remainder of the week their general state of mind was such, as for themselves to describe it by their "having the horrors." An apostle might well ask, "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death." Rom. vi, 21.

The first, an unmarried man, and one of the most agreeable of them when sober, after wasting more than a whole week on one occasion at the public-house, in a course of daily intoxication, left his hated abode, in a fit of gloomy and desperate melancholy. No one knew what became of him; nor were any of his shopmates solicitous about him, as a week at a time was not very unusual for him to be away from his work, spending it in the worse than beastly habit of excessive drinking! His brother, however, after somewhat more than a fortnight, waiting in vain for his accustomed visits, was induced to inquire at Hagley, respecting the corpse of a man, which he had heard had been found suspended in a barn in that parish. From his clothes, he was enabled to identify it, as the body of his unhappy brother; and he learnt, that as the body had been found hanging in the barn, evidently by an act of suicide, and as no person had recognized and claimed it, the overseers of the parish had ordered it for burial.

All parties were deeply affected by the report of this dreadful tragedy: but no one, except William, seemed to lay it to heart, considering it as an awful proof of the testimony of the holy Scriptures, that "the way of transgressors is hard." Prov. xiii, 15.

The second of his fellow-workmen, a widower, did not make his exit by actual and direct suicide, but in a way not much more honourable. He was necessitated, through his habits of drinking to excess, to procure a lodging at a public-house, in which he spent much of his earnings, his landlord having seized his furniture for rent. Thus, he was compelled to abandon housekeeping. Intemperance in the father had beggared his two daughters, one of whom was lame; the debasing habit had reduced his bodily frame to a state of extreme nervous debility, which seriously impaired his fine abilities as a workman; and after a course of several days drunkenness, he was seized with a fit of illness, which rendered useless medical skill, and he died wretchedly, in a miserable apartment, at a low public-house! Such a father,—and there are many such,—may be considered as deserving the execrations of his children, rather than their blessing.

The third, a man of superior genius, and of tolerable education in middle life, was not married to the insinuating woman, who lived with him in furnished lodgings. The same fell habit of drinking to excess, debilitated his once noble and athletic frame; which, invaded by an attack of fever, suddenly sunk. His associate in wickedness, "without natural affection," abandoned him in his affliction, when he could no longer support her, and he was conveyed to the workhouse, where he lingered in suffering for a considerable time. In the character and place of a pauper, his proud spirit being degraded, he was to appearance generally sullen in the extreme, but not penitent; he would sometimes utter the most horrid blasphemies even in his distress; in which state he continued till his death, and even then, in an agony of rage and despair, he used expressions the most shocking to those who were near him, declaring that he would not die. He refused the benevolent offers of instruction and prayer which were made by a pious Methodist, who, on account of his benevolent attentions to the sick, was allowed by the guardians of the parish of Birmingham to have constant access to the sick and dying in the workhouse.

The fourth, though respectably brought up, had been a grenadier officer in the army; but greatly enfeebled by that abominable practice which had been fatal to his shopmates, became in a few years incapable of work, and was obliged to have recourse to the parish for relief and support. Unwilling to go wholly into the poor-house, he dragged on a most miserable existence for several years, subsisting upon the contributions of a few friends, in addition to the parish allowance: but exhibiting in his emaciated frame, and his ragged clothes, a striking picture of the most extreme wretchedness.

Other workmen were occasionally employed by the master of William: but in manners they were very little different from those already described, and scarcely in any thing superior to them; and considering the radical depravity of human nature, and the corrupting influence of evil example, it must be regarded as a singular and gracious interposition of a sovereign and merciful Providence, that William was prevented from falling into those courses, which hurried others of his shopmates into the same debasing, criminal, and ruinous enormities.

DISCOVERY OF TOBACCO.

"The envoys, on their way back, for the first time witnessed the use of a weed, which the ingenious caprice of man has since converted into an universal luxury, in defiance of the opposition of the senses.

"They beheld several of the natives going about with firebrands in their hands, and certain dried herbs, which they rolled up in a leaf, and, lighting one end, put the other in their mouths, and continued exhaling and puffing out the smoke. These rolls they call tobacco, a name since transferred to the plant of which they were made. The Spaniards were struck with astonishment at this singular indulgence, although prepared to meet with wonders."—W. Irving's Columbus.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER X.

On Behaviour.

Dear Madam,

The topic which now presents itself as the subject of a few observations, is that branch of behaviour usually denominated manners. You will not be surprised that I should think it worth your attention. You are aware that the subject is deemed of great importance in every rank of society, from the family of the nobleman, whose sons travel for the sake of acquiring the most finished style of manners, down to the cottager's wife, who is desirous that her children should be "pretty behaved." The subject is indeed as important as it is usually deemed. Dr. Paley has remarked, in his Evidences of Christianity, that one passage in which the Saviour of the world himself has given "advice to the guests at an entertainment, seems to extend to what we call manners, which," he adds, "was both regular in point of consistency, and not so much beneath the dignity of our Lord's mission as may at first sight be supposed; for bad manners are bad morals." Like, however, many other subjects, it has been much misunderstood, and many false maxims taught and adopted, and more mischief has been thereby produced than might without explanation be readily believed.

I apprehend, that, as in the case of all other virtues, the principle is of the highest importance from which manners should be cultivated. What a variety of mistakes, however, are made upon this part of the subject? With some it is laid down as an axiom, that the entire manners of a person must be artificial, that nature is incapable of suggesting or sustaining propriety of address. Other persons contend, that the manners of the higher classes of society alone are truly polite, and that the manners of all other classes can be so, only as they imitate their superiors. This I apprehend to be a very common maxim; for although the nobility are so seldom seen, or at least are not seen with sufficient frequency by the multitude to become their model, yet they imitate the manners of those who have frequent opportunity of moulding their behaviour by that standard. And the same may be said of every rank in society: we find persons come as near to it as they can, by imitating the manners of the class next above them. Thus the nobleman imitates the prince, the 'squire imitates the nobleman, the gentleman the 'squire, the farmer the gentleman (hence partly the new designation, gentleman-farmer), the cottager imitates the farmer. Thus the manners of the first orders in society influence in a decreasing ratio the manners of every subordinate class. Hence it is evident that very few persons have their own manners, or the manners precisely appropriate to their own situation. Where one man has sufficient true nobility, like Franklin, to go up from the lowest to the highest classes of society, retaining his native characteristic manners, how many do we see, who, the instant any chance of rising is afforded them, begin to imitate the manners of their patrons or superiors. A man, for instance, who from being a respectable tradesman becomes a "public man" in a city, and as a member of the corporation occasionally transacts public business with the nobility, will often dress like some distinguished patrician, vainly imitate the indefinable smile and look which marks the man of hereditary distinction, and even affect his very infirmities and vices, dress like him, and imitate his very walk and mode of putting on his hat. How often have I seen this! and I have often been able to recognize the original in the imitation, though a bad one.

Now it appears to me, that the rule which on many accounts hereafter to be specified should be adopted, is this—Be natural—Be yourself—Imitate no one. It is indeed most evident to me, that the imitation of any one is a species of the capability of hypocrisy, which is often allied to general insincerity. If not already insincere, I think the affected man will soon become so. Is not this reasonable to expect from him who habitually cultivates a practical lie?—for such a man lies in manner, at least. On the other hand, it seems to be a very law of our being, that the inward character should be seen in our external appearance. It is a provision made by our all-wise Creator for affording an opportunity of knowing the real disposition of our fellow-men.

Add to this, that every man's native manner, if he be a good man, is sure to be more pleasing than the most successful imitation even of the best manner of another can possibly become.

I put these together because they are inseparable. Whence comes the charm every heart acknowledges, when we observe the good boy or girl of a humble family bred up in the country, or indeed of a good person of any age, in any station of life, whose manner is simply the expression of the internal character, and when that internal character is good? It may not be polished; but every rightly constituted mind will allow, that it is more pleasing than any merely acquired or adopted polished manners. We love such a manner, because we are so formed as to perceive the excellence of truth of all kinds, and because we are convinced that in such an instance we are presented with sterling truth. It is well known also, that the natural manner of a good child or man interests and pleases, not only much more, but much longer than those which are artificial. The man indeed with the latter manner may please for a time; we are fascinated, we are interested in such a finished specimen of art; but we become accustomed to it; our native love of truth and dislike of simulation reoperates; we cease to admire, and we cannot love it. The artificial rose might be so near a representation of nature, both in its colour, structure, and perfume, as even to amaze and interest us for a time, but soon should we feel the preference returning for that paragon of flowers itself, which had derived its freshness from the dews of the May mornings, and its odour from the subtle and inimitable chemistry of nature.

Add to this, that nature is so powerful a principle, that soon or late it will operate. Artificial manners may be cultivated and sustained for an evening, a week, but ultimately we become wearied under the fatigue of the effort, and both act and seem as we really are. The consequence is, that the eye and the ear and the heart of mankind recognize the diversity, and an imperceptible yet insuperable distrust is engendered in their mind respecting a person who can wish, or really attempt thus to transform himself. How many a man also might have been very useful and very much beloved, but all whose valuable qualities have never been called into action by society, owing to this very circumstance! He has even perhaps been peculiarly slandered, passed over, and insulted. Many years roll away, and he is lost in speculations, why the energy and the attainments of which he is conscious have never been noticed by the world? He has injured himself.

Hence, therefore, the following rule may be deduced:—That all excellence of manners must be derived, like all other moral excellence, from the establishment of the best internal principles. Make your child honest, and his eye will have a beauty and a penetration and a dignity, which no attention to the mere exterior could produce. Make him humane, kind-hearted, and he will really have an expression of benevolence in his countenance, which no languid simpering of affectation could enable him to assume. Make him industrious, prompt, active, and virtuous upon principle, this will give genuine elevation to his brow. Make him full of the love of purity; make him in love with genuine inward excellence of all kinds; make him value titles, money, fame, according to the true standard, and he will have a noble yet natural and delightful air, which no imitation of some fancied Sir Charles Grandison could give him. In a word, elevate his mind and you will elevate his countenance; enlighten him with knowledge; inspire him with a sense of honour; improve his heart, and then the more you leave his manners to nature, the better. At the same time I think it quite lawful to point out defects or to correct improprieties as such. Nature is always lovely; yet sometimes even her most genuine and lovely productions need to be trained and pruned, or drawn out. It is but little of it however that is really needed. Nothing is so detrimental to all kinds of excellence as a morbid and excessive desire of improving upon nature. Know when to stop: and the point is,—when you have developed nature most clearly.

I scarcely need add, that these rules must be systematically and perpetually applied. If the subject be attended to only upon select occasions, the effect must be unhappy. What awkward, affected, or contemptible ways may be seen in almost every party, especially composed of the middling classes. Look around, and you will hardly see any one who is acting naturally. They have put on their best manners as they do their best clothes, and their want of ease both in the one and in the other shows that they are not accustomed to them. There is the citizen, who is natural enough behind his counter, has left all his domestic manly, plain, honourable address behind him, and is trying to be elegant. His wife is no more the matron, she is aping the fine lady. The daughter at home is an agreeable, good-natured, unaffected hoyden: she is now sentimental, timorous, can hardly speak or step, she lisps, is nervous, liable to faint. Her brother has no more the honest, unaffected ease of a tradesman's son: he is dressed: see that constrained motion of his arms and his elbows, his stiff neck, his exquisite bow: hear him speak, and you are reminded at once of the French for this species of foppery—parler gras. What different and far more pleasing beings will they be to-morrow when at home! If you were to go home with them to live in their family, you would see, that before the first week was over, under some circumstances or other, they would all suddenly come down from their superbness, and speak out very naturally, to their great relief and your own.

Sometimes very ludicrous accidents have happened through the folly to which I am now adverting. There is one related in a very sensible little work by Mrs. Child upon the subject of education, which, by the way, I almost wholly recommend.

A family expected company. Negligent of their manners when in each other's society only, it was found necessary to give the poor children a lesson extraordinary for the reception of the visitors. Particularly they were ordered, when the company came, and any lady or gentleman spoke to them, to say, "Yes, Ma'am —No, Ma'am—Yes, Sir—No, Sir—Pretty well, I thank you, Sir;" and always to make a bow or a courtesy. The visitors came: the children stood in the constrained, because unusual attitude of order, politeness, and decorum; and the instant the people entered the room, they all began: the girls made a courtesy, the poor boys made a bow, and all together exclaimed, "No, Ma'am—Yes, Ma'am—No, Sir—Yes, Sir—Pretty well, I thank you, Sir." The visitors were confounded, and the children having performed their lesson, all ran out of the room together, and assumed their own natural, easy, and neglected demeanor!

I hold no mistake to be so clear, as that anybody can be upon a select occasion, with success and ease, what he is not habitually. Fancy the man habitually rough attempting to appear sentimental on an occasion; the blunt man attempting to be smooth; the repulsive man attempting to smile ("grins, horribly, a ghastly smile!"); the vulgar man attempting to be delicate;—I need add no more, except an apology for the length of this Letter, and an intimation, that if you will allow me, my next Letter shall contain a continuation of the subject.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.
Clericus.

ADDRESS OF JOSEPH JOHN GURNEY, ESQ.

TO THE MECHANICS OF MANCHESTER.

2. But a view of our own ignorance, and the humility into which it leads, by no means entails a low and unworthy estimate of the native powers of man. Permit me, therefore, to express my firm conviction, in the second place, that knowledge has few uses more desirable—that it can be applied to few purposes more important—than that of imbuing us with just conceptions of the nature of the human mind.

Let a student dive into the depths of chemistry, or climb the heights of astronomy; let him exercise himself in mathematical demonstrations; let him range the fields of natural history; or store his memory with the records of the past: and he cannot remain insensible to the inherent capacities of his own mind. The powers of perception, reflection, reason, and memory, will be unfolded and strengthened as he proceeds; and ample will be the evidence with which his own experience will furnish him, that the intelligent spirit within him is a something quite distinct from his bodily frame—endued with wondrous faculties which are all its own. And if such a conviction be the result of his own experience, that conviction will not fail to be strengthened by the view which his studies will unfold to him, of the prodigious efforts which have been made in the various departments of science and literature, by minds of a still larger capacity. A crowning evidence of this important truth, will be afforded him by the genius of a Galileo, a Milton, a Locke, or a Newton.

It is an astonishing proof of the mental perversion to which we are all liable—and, I may add, of the danger of that little knowledge which puffs up the learner—that some persons, who pretend to pursue the path of science, entertain the absurd notion that mind is matter. Just in proportion to their professed zeal in cultivating the rational faculty, is their senseless endeavour to degrade its character, and finally to reduce it to nothing.

I trust that the intelligent mechanics whom I am now addressing, and who are furnished with abundant proofs, in their own experience, of the native power of mind, will ever be preserved from so foolish and dangerous a notion. True indeed it is, that matter and mind are closely connected in that wondrous creature, man; and that, by some mysterious law of nature, they are capable of acting, with great force, one upon the other. But the radical and essential difference between them, is evident from the fact that they admit of no similarity of definition. Mind is that which thinks, wills, reasons, and worships. Matter is that which is solid, tangible, and extended. To talk of their being the same, is to propose a contradiction in terms. Assuredly there can be no more identity between them, than between the azure of the heavens, and the green fields, or the dusty streets on which we tread below!

No sooner shall you succeed in imparting to some exquisite specimen of machinery a single ray of intelligence, than I will surrender my doctrine, and allow that mind is matter. Till then, I shall depend on the conclusions of my reason, or rather on my native conviction, that they are essentially and unalterably distinct.

The atoms of which our bodies are composed are in a state of perpetual flux, and not one particle of the matter which once belonged to us can now be called our own. Yet we never lose our personal identity—we are the same rational and responsible individuals as ever. How can we account for this fact, except by allowing that the mind exists independently of matter? Yet although our material atoms are perpetually flying from us, and are separated from each other by death, not one of them ever perishes—they are atoms of matter still. How idle then is the notion that our purer and nobler part, endued as it is with characters so infinitely superior to those of matter, falls a prey to death, and ever ceases to exist!

On the one hand, therefore, we cannot descend too low in a humble view of our dependent condition, and of the blindness which is here our necessary portion; and, on the other hand, we cannot rise too high in a just contemplation of the spiritual nature of the human mind—a spark of the Divine intelligence, breathed into man by his Creator, and formed after the image of his own eternity. Between the known capacities of the soul of man, and its revealed everlasting existence, there is a perfect fitness.

Let no man start in unbelief, at the notion of the eternity to which he is destined; for, independently of revealed religion, which is its proper evidence, our known inherent powers proclaim it to be probable. Nor can we deny that this probability is confirmed by the analogy of science; for, whether we reflect on the inconceivable greatness of nature, or attempt to dive into her unsearchable minuteness, we are compelled to confess that infinity does, in a remarkable manner, characterize the counsels, and distinguish the works, of our Almighty Creator

That a just view of the spiritual nature of the soul, is of great importance to our welfare and happiness, is extremely obvious. The materialist, who reduces himself to the rank of a mere machine, must presently give up every notion of his own responsibility—not only in reference to an eternal future, but even as it regards the present life. It is the natural tendency of his sentiments to make him the prey of his carnal propensities; and thus he becomes a source of misery, both to himself, and to society at large. But who does not know that our individual happiness, as well as the order and peace of society, are promoted, in a wonderful degree, by the subjection of our bodily powers to the guidance and government of the rational faculty?

THE TEACHER SENT FROM GOD.

The moon had clear'd the eastern hill,
  And full o'er David's city shone,
When all within its walls were still:—
  All, did I say? No, there was one
Of stately port, and noble birth,
Call'd great among the sons of earth.

He, with a quick and timid step,
  As though some threat'ning foe was nigh,
Came to the spot where Jesus slept,
  With anxious heart and earnest eye;
And this the salutation given—
"Thou art the Teacher sent from heaven!"

"Thou art a Teacher from on high:
None else such mighty works could do;
Diseases at thy bidding fly;—
Wonders like these we never knew;
The sick restor'd; the dead arise;
Satan himself before thee flies!"

Thus did the Jewish Ruler hail
Him, who indeed was sent by God,
Jehovah's counsel to reveal,
And rescue sinners by his blood.
How did our blessed Saviour teach?
Where and to whom did Jesus preach?

Sometimes within that splendid pile,
The boast of Judah's favour'd land,
Admiring multitudes the while
Beheld him, with supreme command,
As He its Lord and Master were,
Turn out the bold intruders there.

Sometimes He stood upon the shore,
As crowds collected on the strand;
And taught amidst the billows' roar,
Who could the winds and waves command:
There mighty works the Saviour wrought,
There to his feet the sick were brought.

Then would He mount a vessel's side,
And teach upon the deep blue sea;
Whose eye could through its caverns glide:
Lord of the ocean's depths is He.
Silver, and gold, and pearl, and gem,
Are known, and order'd forth by Him.

Sometimes from off the mountain's brow,
When He the night had spent in prayer:
His people reap the harvest now,
The seeds of which were scatter'd there;
When with his Father he would plead
For all their wants in time of need.

Is not the Saviour teaching still?
The wheels of providence He turns;
All is subservient to his will,
'Tis He prevents, and He confirms.
What comfort to his saints to know
That He controls their every foe!

Does He not by his Spirit teach
All whom his Heavenly Father gave?
That "small still voice" their hearts must reach,
He must conduct whom Christ will save.
Our Lord ascended up on high,
And captive led captivity,

This to procure for all his own:
Who can its value e'er explain?
The depths and heights will ne'er be known,
Until his people with Him reign;
Then shall they find that living bread,
By which their souls were daily fed.

What did he teach?—One only theme—
'Twas this, "Ye must be born again!"
He came by dying to redeem
Millions among the sons of men;
But through one process all must go;
This new existence all must know.

Whom does he teach? His word has flown
Through every clime, to every land;
All who the Saviour's name have known
Must soon at his tribunal stand;—
The monarch—those of noble birth—
The poorest of the sons of earth!

Then how important to them all,
That each should understand it well!
We cannot now on Jesus call,
As when he came on earth to dwell;
But for His Spirit we can pray,
For grace to help from day to day. S. Hopkins.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

As denoted by the Fulfilment of Historical Predictions, traced down from the Babylonish Captivity to the Present Time. By the Rev. Alexander Keith, Minister of St. Cyrus: author of the Evidence of Prophecy." 2 vol. 12mo. bds.—Whyte, Edin. pp. 674.

Reflecting men of all classes, and of all parties, are beholding with astonishment the portentous "signs of the times." Every one is convinced, that changes of no ordinary character are about to take place among the nations. Never since the creation of the world, has there existed so singular and eventful a period of society. Wondrous revolutions have taken place in different periods of time, by which many and remote nations were permanently affected. But no previous state of mankind has been at all like the present. "Knowledge shall be increased," said the inspiring angel to the prophet Daniel, looking forward to our times.

Knowledge has increased: and it is still increasing through the world, in a manner far beyond that of any past period; and this most interesting fact gives the principal character to the present "signs of the times." The ancient and venerable systems of paganism throughout the East are rapidly dying under the light of knowledge; and thousands of their former professors are denouncing them as the greatest curse upon mankind. Mohammedan imposture and delusion, under the rising of the same glorious sun, are fleeing away. Popery, with his "Holiness," the "Beast," its worshipped head, is becoming every day more contemptible before the light of the Holy Scriptures; and though infidelity may rage, its advocates shall be covered with shame—and truth shall prevail—"for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea!"

Mr. Keith, in his invaluable work on "the Evidence of Prophecy," has proved himself to be a wise and discriminating observer of the "signs of the times," and one worthy of being trusted. His present volumes are a most excellent addition to his former work, and one which we most cordially recommend to our readers. We are confident, that more solid scriptural information on the subject of divine prophecy, may be gained from these two small volumes, than from many a whole library. If we may commend any parts in particular, they will be Chap. VII, containing a most edifying view of the rise, progress, and abominable impieties of Popery, vol. i, page 81 to 136; and Chap. XIII, on the First and Second Beast (Imperial and Papal Rome), vol. ii, page 427 to 449.

"In whom, after ye believed, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise."—Eph. i, 13. The nature of sealing, consists in the imparting of the image or character of the seal to the thing sealed. To seal a thing is to stamp the character of the seal upon it. Now the Spirit of God doth really and effectually communicate the image of God to real believers in Christ, which image consists in righteousness and true holiness. Then are we truly sealed by the Spirit of God, when the Holy Ghost stamps the image of grace and holiness so obviously, so evidently upon the soul, as that the soul sees it, feels it, and can run and read it. Brooks.

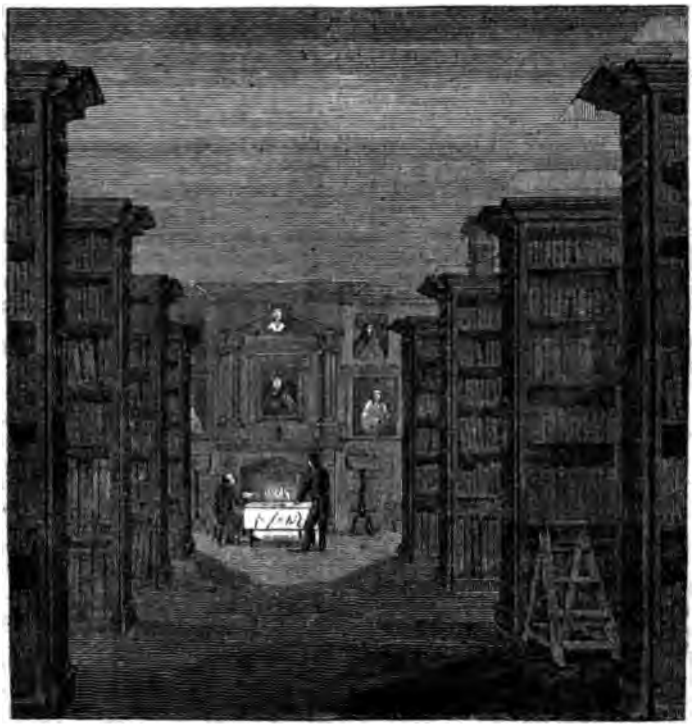
THE CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE.

!8. PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY. DECEMBER 15, 1832.



DR. WILLIAMS'S LIBRARY, RED-CROSS STREET, LONDON

DR. WILLIAMS'S LIBRARY.

ER IX of the "Christian's Penny Magazine," ns a historical sketch of the Bodleian Library ford, the most splendid collection of books ging to the Church of England. We now comply he wishes of several of our friends in furnishing lar sketch of the largest public library belonging English Dissenters.

iel Williams, D.D. the founder of this Institu- was born in 1643, or 1644, at Wrexham, in ghshire. Although he did not enjoy the advan- of a regular academical education, yet "from five old," he had no employment but his studies, and eteen, he was regularly admitted as a preacher." nusual application, united to great vigour of soon raised him above all adventitious circum- s, and eventually secured to him that rank gst his contemporaries, which is conferred only real worth. His early resolution to devote him- o the Christian ministry amongst the Nonconfor- , formed at a time when all the severities of an rant government were called forth against them, be regarded as a striking illustration of the on of his character; which is yet more fully oped by the fact, that he was amongst the very first young men, who had the piety and courage to identify themselves with those venerable confessors, who had been ejected from their respective pastoral charges, by the Act of Uniformity.

Prevented by the persecutions of the times from public preaching, he received an invitation to become chaplain to the Countess of Meath, in Ireland. This he gladly accepted, which led to his settlement as the pastor of the Presbyterian Church, in Wood Street, Dublin; the duties of which office he discharged for nearly twenty years, with great reputation to himself, and with general acceptance to the people. While in this city, to which he became a kind of exile for conscience sake, he married a lady of honourable family and eminent piety, with whom he received a considerable estate. The troubles of Ireland in 1687, led him to resign his pastoral charge in Dublin, and retire to London, where, the following year, he had the happiness of witnessing that glorious Revolution, which gave permanence to English liberty.

The Revolution extricated the Presbyterians from their embarrassments, and introduced Mr. Williams to the new king, with whom he possessed a useful influence in Irish affairs. He was now elected pastor of a numerous congregation, assembling in Hand-Alley, Bishopsgate Street, London. From his friendship with Richard Baxter, and his superior talents, he was chosen to succeed that great man in the Lecture at Pinners' Hall.

In 1701, having been for some time a widower, he again formed a matrimonial alliance with a lady of considerable fortune, which he used with frugality in his personal expenses, that he might be able the better to accomplish several benevolent designs, for the benefits of posterity.

In 1709, Principal Carstairs sent him, from Scotland, a diploma of Doctor in Divinity, inclosed in a silver box, an honour which he merited both as a scholar and a theologian. "After having stung to inexorable rage the Earl of Oxford, by his faithful remonstrance against intolerance and the Pretender, he was happy enough to escape his revenge by the death of the Queen" (Anne), "and to present the congratulation of the Dissenters to King George I, on his accession to the British throne."

Memoirs of this excellent minister are to be seen in "Palmer's Nonconformist's Memorial," vol. ii, p. 640; "Wilson's Dissenting Churches," vol. ii, p. 198; "Bogue and Bennett's History of Dissenters," vol. ii, p. 417; to either of which we refer our readers.

Dr. Williams deserves the high praise of employing a large fortune, in relieving the suffering confessors of the truth of Christ, in assisting his poorer brethren in the ministry, and in encouraging young ministers in their entrance on their holy work: thus his life was rendered a public blessing; and his last will, dictated by the warm affections of a heart devoted to charity, to literature, and to catholic, scriptural Christianity, did not suffer his usefulness to be terminated by his death.

Besides the settlement to his wife, and legacies to his relations, he left donations for the education of youth in Dublin, and the support of a preacher in the native Irish; to the poor of the congregations in which he had been minister, and of the parish in which he had lived; to several ministers' widows; to different Presbyterian churches in the country; to the college of Glasgow; and to several Institutions for the diffusion of knowledge and the propagation of the gospel.

Dr. Williams, possessing an extensive collection of valuable books, conceived the idea of forming a Public Library, for the use of his brethren, who were excluded by their nonconformity from the stores of literature at the Universities. His friend Dr. Bates had also been, during a long and studious life, as Mr. Howe expressed it, "an earnest gatherer, and, as the phrase is, devourer of books," with which he had so great an acquaintance, that an eminent divine, a dignitary of the church, said, "That were he to collect a library, he would as soon consult Dr. Bates as any man he knew—he knew how to choose, and was curious in his choice—nothing mean was welcome to his library, or detained there." Such a collection was of course most desirable, and on the decease of its possessor, Dr. Williams purchased it for 500*l.* or 600*l.* to be added to his own valuable library.

By his last will, dated June 26, 1711, Dr. Williams appointed his books, after duplicates and useless volumes were removed, to be for a public library, "whereto such as his trustees appoint shall have access, for the perusal of any book in the place where they are lodged." He also directed his trustees to purchase some cheap freehold edifice to receive the library; but if not able to obtain eligible premises, they were empowered to erect them, but they were to be "not pompous or too large."

He also appointed 10*l.* per annum for a librarian, together with the accommodation of the house—a stipend long since found inadequate as a remuneration for the duties of the office. Though Dr. Williams departed to his reward in February 1716, yet the preliminary arrangements for carrying into effect the provisions of his testament, were not completed till 1727, when the trustees, not finding any suitable building, purchased the site of the present library for 450*l.* and obtained from the Court of Chancery, permission to appropriate 1,618*l.* out of the founder's estate, for the erection of the house, according to the estimate.

The building exceeding the estimate by a considerable amount, and the trustees thinking it inexpedient again to apply to the Court, issued a circular among their friends, who, both among the Independent and Presbyterian denominations, liberally contributed to the completion of the work, and about the close of 1729, the trustees transacted their business at the house.

Dr. Williams's Library has received since that period many valuable additions, by the munificence of several eminent ministers and laymen of the "Three Denominations," among whom Dr. William Harris stands pre-eminent, having bequeathed a noble collection of 240 folio, 364 quarto, and 1355 octavo volumes to the trustees. Its increase, has, however, been gradual; for, unlike the libraries of the Universities, and other privileged bodies connected with the national ecclesiastical establishment, it does not augment its volumes at the expense of authors and publishers, but simply by the voluntary donations of those individuals, who can appreciate the importance of such an Institution to the Dissenters of the metropolis.

The frontage of the building is in perfect accordance with the wishes of the founder; for though it presents the appearance of great respectability, yet it has not the air of a public institution. The ground floor, which contains spacious parlours, is devoted to the service of the librarian, together with the other apartments on the basement story. By a staircase, ornamented with portraits, the visitor ascends to the library itself, which occupies two spacious rooms on the first floor.

The front room, which extends the whole width of the building, is fitted up with mahogany glass cases and presses, which have a very uniform and elegant appearance. Over these cases are ranged twenty-five original portraits of distinguished Puritan and Nonconformist ministers. The chimney-piece to the left is adorned with a fine portrait of Dr. Williams, while that on the right is ornamented by a brilliant likeness of the Rev. Richard Baxter.

The second room occupies the whole depth of the premises, and is fitted up with twelve stalls, above which are arranged nearly forty portraits. In the upper part of this room is a handsome wainscot press, which contains some valuable MSS, and other articles that are rare and curious. These apartments are capable of receiving forty thousand volumes, though the catalogue contains only about half that number. There are however many very rare tracts, early editions, and costly works in the collection. Of the Rare Tracts, it will be enough to say there are 238 volumes of sermons and tracts, published during the civil war of Charles I, of which, the sermons preached before the Parliament, fill 32 volumes. Among the early editions may be enumerated "The Salisbury Liturgy," A. D. 1530, finely illuminated; "The Hours of the Virgins," Paris, A. D. 1498, of which the printing and wood-cuts are finely executed. Of the costly works, it will be sufficent to mention the classic pages of Grævius and Gronovius, extending through more than 30 folios, with that great national work, Rymer's Fœdera, in 20 vols. folio.

Amongst the MSS, are a beautifully illuminated Bible; a well-written copy of Wyckliffe's Testament, in black letter, about the reign of Henry IV. But there are two copies of the Scriptures, which are peculiarly calculated to interest the pious visitants, from the circumstances under which they were transcribed. The older MS contains "The Old and New Testaments in short hand, 1686," which were copied, during many a wakeful night, by a zealous Protestant, in the reign of James II, who, fearing that the attempts of that monarch to re-establish Popery would terminate in the suppression of the sacred scriptures, resolved at least to secure a copy for his own use, by this ingenious method. The other MS contains the whole book of Psalms, and all the New Testament, except the Revelation, in 15 vols. folio, written in characters an inch long, on a black paper manufactured on purpose, and with a white ink. This perfectly unique copy, was written in 1745, at the cost of a Mr. Harris, a tradesman of London, whose sight having decayed with age so as to prevent his reading the Scriptures, though printed in the largest type, he incurred the expense of this transcription, that he might enjoy those sources of comfort, which are "more to be desired than gold, yea than much fine gold."

Should our readers desire to know more concerning the munificent benefactions of Dr. Williams, we refer them to the Congregational Magazine for February 1825.

DECLINE OF ROME FROM ITS ANCIENT GLORY.

"Rome in its ancient glory," we reviewed in our last number: it will be proper now to contemplate its "Decline and Fall."

Profanely dignified with the epithet of Eternal City, elated with conquest, intoxicated with luxuriousness, and drunk with the blood of nations and of the saints of God, Rome said, in the emphatic language of Scripture, "I sit a queen, and am no widow, I shall never see sorrow." But He that sitteth in the heavens, righteously determined her fate. John, in the visions of prophecy, beheld an "angel come down from heaven, having great power; and the earth was lightened with his glory." Rome, under the mystic title of Babylon, was the object of his awful mission, as signified to the devout apostle; who further records, "And he cried mightily with a strong voice, saying, Babylon the Great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird. For all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies. And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues. For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities.—How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her: for she saith in her heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." Rev. xviii, 2—7.

We must refer our readers to any Protestant Commentary on the book of the Revelations, or to Newton's Dissertations on the Prophecies, for a more full exposition of the predictions in Chapters xvii, and xviii. It will not be possible for us in this place to give more than brief notices of a few particulars relating to the "Decline of Rome," a subject which has rendered many large volumes truly interesting.

Again and again has the cup of Divine retribution been brought to her lips; and under repeated draughts, though the bitter dregs are yet to come, instead of an object of terror, she has become an object of contempt, or rather of commiseration, to every beholder. She, who had arrayed herself in the splendour of a conquered world, and gathered into her treasuries the riches of the people, was ten times successively taken, sacked, and burnt, by the congregated hordes of the East and of the North: who, impelled horde upon horde, like the waves of a tempestuous sea, burst every opposing mound, and completed the destruction of her widespread empire.

A. D. 408, Rome was besieged by Alaric the Goth; he was bought off by a present of 500*lbs.* weight of gold; 30,000*lbs.* of silver; 4,000 silk garments; 3,000 skins of purple dye, and 3,000*lbs.* of pepper. It was, however, taken by the same prince in 410, and plundered for six successive days; its inhabitants were butchered, and its stately palaces and temples burned. It was again taken by the Vandals, under Genseric, in 435. The imperial palace was forced; its treasures and rich moveables were seized; fourteen successive days were spent in plundering indiscriminately; and the Vandal fleet departed for Africa laden with spoils, amongst which were an immense number of statues, half the covering of the Capitol, sacred vessels enriched with precious stones, and those which Titus Vespasian had taken from the temple of Jerusalem. In 476, Rome was again captured by the Heruli, under their king, Odoacer. Augustulus was deposed, the title of emperor abolished, and Rome ceased to be an imperial city. In 492, it again shared a similar fate from Theodoric the Goth; who took it after three years' siege, during which, the famine was so great, that wheat was sold for an amount equal to six guineas a bushel. In 536, it was taken by Belisarius. In 538, it was besieged one year and nine months by Vitiges the Goth; retaken and plundered several days by Totila, in 547; and also in 550; and to finish the catastrophe of this renowned capital, it was given up for plunder for forty successive days by Teia, the last Gothic monarch, in 552, before it was retaken by Narses, and the government was transferred to Ravenna.

These calamities were, however, but the anticipation of her fate. The sun of Italy had not altogether ceased to shine, and the star of the Eternal City was not yet set in darkness. Rome was yet glorious in her greatness. She was not indeed destined, again, with shield and spear to overwhelm the prostrate nations. The terror of her kings, consuls, dictators, and emperors, had for ever ceased: but arrayed in the cloak and the cowl, the pall and the mitre, she again sent forth her armies, and exercised over the minds and consciences of men, a more terrible dominion than she had hitherto exercised over their bodies.

Christianity having been corrupted, its scriptural institutions perverted, and a prelacy established, this "mystery of iniquity" arose (2 Thess. ii, 7; Rev. xvii, 5) to its highest pitch, by the assumptions of the prelate of Rome to be the Vicar of Christ, and the Vicegerent of God. 2 Thess. ii, 4. His legions, holy cheats and sanctimonious swindlers, under the denominations of Carmelites, Franciscans, Dominicans, &c., and clothed with the official appellation of Cardinals, Nuncios, Legates, and Inquisitors, swarmed in every land, turning the tide of idolatrous veneration, with a current of wealth and industry, toward the Eternal City and its blaspheming Pontiff, till she was, in a more perfect degree than ever, a "Lady of Kingdoms," and made to sing as a harlot, being replenished and made glorious in the midst of the seas. Long time hath she glorified herself and lived deliciously, and long have the kings of the earth, to the impoverishment and ruin of their poor subjects, held a most fascinating commerce with her in pipings and trumpetings, in fornications and murders: long have they lived deliciously with her, and their wailings over her accelerating ruin have been hideously dreadful. But they are utterly unavailing. The mighty Angel has already cast the mill-stone into the midst of the sea; and his voice, awful and unerring in prophecy, is now heard more tremendous in providence, saying, "Thus shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all."

We are informed that the illustrious Scipio, when he entered fallen Carthage, could not refrain from tears; a pensive silence seized upon him, which he at length broke with these lines from Homer:

"The day will come when Troy shall sink in fire,
And Priam's people with himself expire."

Polybius, the historian, who was his companion on this occasion, asking what he meant by Troy and Priam's people, the conqueror, without naming Rome, gave the historian to understand, that in Troy and Carthage he foresaw the fate of his own country. "The greatest states," said he, "have their period; after which Fortune overturns what she took pleasure in raising."

Political events since the era of the Reformation have seriously affected the interests of Rome and its blasphemous domination; and the most melancholy forebodings of Scipio, and others, seem now rapidly accomplishing. In 1791 the population of the Eternal City had dwindled to 166,000: but in 1813 it had further declined to 100,000, of whom 10,000 were gardeners and shepherds. It is believed now to be reduced to about 80,000! So rapid a depopulation is almost without parallel. European revolutions have doubtless contributed to this surprising reduction, but the greater part is ascribed to the increased action of the malaria, which appears to be investing the city on every side. There are extensive districts in Rome which are nothing more than villages, inhabited by the peasantry, whom the pestilential atmosphere has compelled to abandon their habitations in the country. Every year too this invisible scourge is advancing. Every year it invades some fresh street, some new square or quarter; and every year its terrible influence is augmented. The hills and elevated grounds within the walls of the city, where this insalubrity in former times was never felt or suspected, are now affected by it in the summer. The Porto del Popolo, a part of the Corso, the entire quarters Quirinale, of La Trinita del Monte, and the Trastavere, are already deserted. The city indeed presents everywhere the appearance of ruin. As there are many more houses than inhabitants, the houses are never repaired; when they get out of order, the occupiers move to others. Neither doors, stairs, nor roofs are ever replaced: they tumble to pieces and are allowed to remain where they fall. Multitudes of convents have thus acquired the appearance of ruins, and many palaces, no longer habitable, are left without even a porter to take care of them.

"Rome in the Nineteenth Century," a work of great celebrity, in a series of letters from that city, written in 1817 and 1818, supplies us with ample testimony to the fulfilment of Divine prophecy in relation to that metropolis of the world. The intelligent author says, "Between the Sabine Hills on the East, and the hills of Viterbo (Monte Ciminus) on the north, the bold ridge of Mount Soracte rose from the plain, insulated from every other height, the most striking, the most picturesque, and, excepting the Alban Mount, the most lofty and beautiful of all the amphitheatre of mountains that surround three sides of the plains of Latium. Far as the eye can reach, the Campagna stretches in every direction, to the base of these hills To the west, a wild sullen flat extends to the sea. A profusion of bushy thickets, and a few solitary trees were scattered over the broken surface of this uninclosed and houseless plain;—for a plain it is—since at the distance of sixteen miles, where we now stood, we distinctly saw Rome.

"Over this wild waste, no rural dwelling, nor scattered hamlets, nor fields, nor gardens, such as usually mark the approach to a populous city, were to be seen. All was ruin: fallen monuments of Roman days —grey towers of Gothic times—abandoned habitations of modern years, alone meet the eye. No trace of man appeared, except in the lonely tomb, which told us he had been. Rome herself was all that we beheld. She stood alone in the wilderness as in the world, surrounded by a desert of her own creation. It may perhaps be soothing to the contemplation of the traveller, or the fancy of the poet, to see the once beautiful Campagna di Roma abandoned to the wild luxuriance of nature, and covered only with the defaced tombs of her tyrants, and the scarce visible remains of the villas of her senators; but it is melancholy to reason and humanity to behold an immense tract of fertile land in the immediate vicinity of one of the greatest cities in the world, pestilent with disease and death, and to know that like a devouring grave, it annually engulphs all of human kind that toil upon its surface. The unfortunate labourers employed in the scanty cultivation occasionally given to the soil to enable it to produce pasturage for cattle, generally fall victims to the baneful climate. Amidst the fearful loneliness and stillness of this scene of desolation, as we advanced through the long dreary tract that divided us from Rome, a few wretched peasants, whose looks bespoke them victims of a slow consuming disease, occasionally reminded us of the tremendous ravage of human life, which this invisible and mysterious power is annually making."—Vol. i, 99, 100.

"Nothing is more striking to a stranger than the sombre air which marks every countenance, from the lowest in Rome. The faces even of the young are rarely lighted up with smiles; a laugh is seldom heard, and a merry countenance strikes us with amazement, from its novelty. Rome looks like a city whose inhabitants have passed through the cave of Trophimus."—Vol. iii, p. 196.

It seems therefore probable, that the moment is not far distant, that is to strip this Queen of Cities of her splendour, and of all her glory to leave her nothing but her immortal name. That great city, which made all nations rich by the multitude of her merchants; which has commanded the estates, the bodies, and the souls of men; which has arrogated the title of Eternal, is apparently doomed to fall at length under the stroke of an invincible enemy: while the pernicious dogmas of her pontifical sovereign, with the blasphemous titles which he arrogantly assumes, "the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming." 2 Thess. ii, 8.

Some persons, even in England, talk of the "Throne of the Pope," as the most dreadful of powers! and profess to be alarmed at the strength of Popery, and the consequent danger of Protestantism! In the presence of the open Scriptures, Popery cannot flourish; and the irreversible sentence of Omnipotence is gone forth, that every opposing enemy shall perish, especially the "Man of Sin," with all his delusions: "for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

"Sin is but launching an arrow at the heart of God: it recoils, and returns into the transgressor's own heart, in which it will fester to all eternity."

"The worm that eats out the goodness of a mere moral man, is Self."

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

His Conversion.

The parents of William were not decidedly religious: yet they were not altogether unmindful of the best interests of their children. Still as they had been "regularly christened in the parish church," their Christianity was not in the least doubted. At school they learnt the church catechism, and they were generally sent to church on a Sunday morning; and, unless they were taken out for a walk in the afternoon or evening, a chapter or more was usually read in the historical parts of Dr. Wright's folio "Family Bible." The notes, and especially the splendid plates, supplied them with both instruction and amusement.

Even this practice, more indeed than was to be seen of piety in the families of most of his neighbours, but lamentably deficient in every thing peculiarly religious, was not without profit to William: it brought his mind into contact with the word of God; and he never forgot the occasional and superficial reading of the Bible in those days. Besides which, at school, a chapter was appointed to be learnt by each scholar, during the holidays, to be repeated on his return; and this exercise was not without its fruit: for though William took no delight in the spiritual doctrines contained in the holy scriptures, but felt a rooted dislike to them, as requiring the heart to be surrendered to God, and a course of life corresponding, yet he well recollected throughout his subsequent life, the deep impression produced upon his mind by the learning of the parable of the prodigal son, the account of the rich man and Lazarus, and the first chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews. Especially the following affecting passage, relating to the rich voluptuary: "And besides all this, a great gulf is fixed between you and us, so that they who would pass from hence to you cannot, neither can they pass to us that would come from thence." Luke xvi, 26.

The awakening declaration of "a great gulf fixed" between the righteous and the wicked in the world of spirits, a great gulf impassable, could not be forgotten, but frequently revolved in his mind, as if inscribed upon the soul of William, then about nine years of age; and though he never mentioned it to any individual, it was never eradicated.

These impressions appear to have been somewhat nurtured by the habit of learning the collect for the day every Sunday, to repeat on the Monday morning at school. The short time that William was at the Methodist Sunday school, already mentioned, was not entirely lost, nor the exercises altogether forgotten and vain: but they appear to have contributed to deepen the convictions already made, and to enlarge the mind towards good men, who might be found even among those who were Dissenters from the church of England.

When, in 1803, William was bound apprentice, his mother, anxiously alive to his welfare, furnished him with a Pocket Bible, a Prayer Book, a little mahogany box for writing apparatus, and a knife and fork. These constituted the whole of his fortune in setting out in life: but the Bible formed a part of that fortune, and that was a treasure: the books were indeed few, but they consisted of the best, and God in tender mercy blessed them, as the means of enriching his soul.

Divine providence, in about a year afterwards, removed his parents to reside in his father's native village, about thirty miles distant, as we have already observed. Thus was William cut off from direct intercourse with his parents: but the painful dispensation was manifestly ordained in mercy to him, and made subservient to his greatest advantage. On a Sunday, while the other apprentices went home to their friends, William, separated from his master's family, the workshop being his sitting-room, was much alone, but in occupation which he found highly favourable to reading and reflection, and the means of proving the resources of his own mind.

The Bible was constantly perused by William: at first chiefly for the purpose of passing away the time: but its wondrous histories engaged his attention, and were soon felt to be attractive. They became familiar, and his mind by this means was enriched; if not with "the apostles' doctrine," yet with the edifying biography of God's ancient servants, and with his recorded dispensations of judgment and mercy to mankind, showing the difference, both in the character and the eternal destiny "of him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not."

Early impressions upon the mind of William were thus deepened by the reading of the Bible; and a tone of seriousness pervaded his spirit, which governed his tongue and his general behaviour, and which procured for him the sincere respect and confidence of his master, and of all his fellow workmen.

He had learnt about forty songs to sing at his work; but he now began to dislike them, as neither edifying, nor agreeable to the principles and practices of those holy men of God mentioned in the sacred scriptures. He at once decided and left off singing them, endeavouring to obliterate them from his memory; and, as the apostle recommended "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs," William learnt several of those in the "New Version," particularly, parts of the fifty-first, the sixty-seventh, and the hundred and forty-sixth Psalm.

His words began to be used at this time with more care, that none might be contrary to the direction of our Saviour, "Let your communication be Yea, yea; Nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." Matt. v, 37.

Having completed the fourteenth year of his age, William commenced, at Whitsuntide 1804, keeping an account of the principal incidents of his servitude; and which he continued during the six remaining years of his apprenticeship, noting down also all the little sums of pocket money given him by his master in the course of that time, with all his earnings at overwork.

His master being a superior workman, his business was remarkably good, so that he considered it necessary to work even on Sundays, sometimes, for the purpose of completing orders by the time appointed; and on many occasions William has worked the greater portion of the Lord's day, in the early part of his apprenticeship, at no small sacrifice of his peace, knowing it to be contrary to the righteous law of God. But this is believed to be not an uncommon practice in Birmingham, with those of fancy trades, when business is plentiful. How dreadful must be the guilt of those, who have ever read or heard the command of God, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant." Exod. xx, 8—10.

William heard this law read every Sunday at church, and he felt that it is wrong thus to desecrate and profane that portion of our time, which our Maker has mercifully sanctified, claimed as his own, and allowed it to us, only for the purposes of his worship, and the business of our happiness and salvation! The benighted pagans will rise up in judgment against sabbath-breakers, to their most awful condemnation!

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XI.

The Desire of Pleasing.

Dear Madam,

The subject of this Letter is nearly related to the general topic of the last. The desire of pleasing is of course to a certain extent the object of the attention we pay to manners. Against this desire, under the regulations I endeavoured to assign in my last, there can be no objection. Every person is bound to render himself as agreeable as he can to all around, consistently with the immutable laws of truth and integrity. My object now however is, to contemplate the desire of pleasing when it becomes the sole motive in the formation of manners. You are aware that the Letters of Chesterfield are devoted to this topic; and, if I mistake not, the object of pleasing society is inculcated in them to an extent inconsistent with the claims of conscience.

Having perhaps set the object I have in view before you, you will allow me to proceed to the following observations.

1. When carried to an excessive extent, it can rarely consist with genuine uprightness of the moral principle.

I am supposing the desire to please every body to operate, by universal smiles, by agreement with them in opinion upon all possible occasions, and by endeavouring to make every body as well pleased with himself as possible.

Accordingly a person actuated by this motive seeks to know what subject a man excels in, and sets him to talk upon it, not for the purpose of gaining information, but of giving him an opportunity of displaying his acquirements, well knowing that the complacency he feels in his own skill will be insensibly transferred to the person who gave him the opportunity of shining. I have often seen this course pursued; and although the adroit flatterer hardly spoke, but merely listened with the utmost attention, I have heard him praised as a man of the most agreeable conversation! It is a rule of this species of tactics, never to disturb the prejudices of mankind, never to argue, never to contend, except with a view to give the victory to the opponent. I cannot pretend, in a single Letter, to trace all the various modes in which this principle shows itself. The preceding may be sufficient to recal such characters to your recollection.

You will, I doubt not, agree with me, that such principles and such conduct argue, that the love of truth is at a very low ebb, and that the moral feelings must in general be greatly sophisticated. Truth of any kind is not the object of such persons, and truth they must often sacrifice. Accordingly, in proportion as these views and this disposition are cultivated, the moral principles become endangered. The usual result is, that such a man becomes a heartless, selfish sycophant, who, under the utmost versatility of manners, pursues a settled purpose of self-interest. If without any particular object in view, such a person usually exhibits soon or late an enfeebled intellect. He becomes a mere driveller in understanding. The mind within assumes the incertitude and the sycophancy of character of the external manners: so sure is perversion of all kinds to lead to its own punishment. But this state of the character cannot long consist without its being known to our fellow-creatures. "Soon or late," says Mrs. Barbauld, "whatever be our arts of concealment, we are taken for what we are." Every one speedily knows, that such a person is a "mere man of the world," who says an abundance of pretty things, but "never means what he says." Every heart instinctively knows, that such a man never would become a firm friend, a refuge in distress of any kind, or even a sympathizing companion. Distrusted, and perhaps ridiculed, how unhappy is such a character; yet perhaps as years increase his delusions will only become augmented!

All that I have said, and all that I could say upon this part of these observations is comprised in a single sentence in one of Dr. Knox's essays (I quote from memory). "When you see a person perpetually smiling, and agreeing with you in every particular, Beware of counterfeits, for such are abroad."

2. Another evil resulting from this principle is, that soon or late the genuine character will operate, and produce an abundance of inconveniences.

A man may continue the system of pleasing for a long time, yet, except his mind is absolutely imbued with habits of versatility, that is, unless he is a finished deceiver, the native independence of our nature, the inherent love of self-will, the force of real character will ultimately break through every disguise, and a very different being appear to have been concealed throughout beneath the mask.

I hold it to be an axiom in this sort of matters, that soon or late a man will act according to his genuine character. Nor is it a little remarkable, that in such cases a man becomes disagreeable — oppressive, domineering, and even cruel, in proportion to his former suppliancy and obligingness. Perhaps our genuine character may be somewhat like a bow, which rebounds with a violence proportioned to the restraint which it had sustained.

Certain it is that the most violent quarrels and sturdy animosities that ever the world beheld, on the great scale of national, or the minor scale of social intercourse, have been preceded by exuberant complaisance. As if the God of Nature had inserted self-correctives in the human constitution, such parties are the most strenuous in their abuse and hatred of one another. The lesson to be derived from the whole is, that in educating a child the utmost care should be exercised to secure right principles of every kind, and to induce him chiefly to be solicitous respecting them; that a person in whom these prevail is sure ultimately to please, and to give the most permanent and delightful satisfaction; and that attention to the manners, independent of the cultivation of the heart, is an instance of that disunion of principle and practice, which occasions corrupt principles and inconsistent practice.

I am, my dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

ON CONFIDENCE.

It being necessary for the organization and maintenance of society, that dependence and reliance should be both mutual and universal, that all mean and ungenerous suspicion should be banished from every breast, and that, influenced by Christian liberality, we should regard every one as the same honest character as ourselves, an opportunity is thereby unavoidably offered for the successful practice of craftiness and deceit upon the unsuspecting and inexperienced. It is the commission of such villany as this, which renders the life of man one continued state of agitation and anxiety, and prevents our attainment of that unruffled tranquillity which all nature unites in offering. "It must needs be that offences are, but woe unto that man by whom the offence cometh."

ADDRESS OF JOSEPH JOHN GURNEY, ESQ.

TO THE MECHANICS OF MANCHESTER.

3. STILL more important, however, is it for the happiness of mankind, that our whole nature, both bodily and rational, should be subjected to the moral principle—or, in other words, should become obedient to the commands of the Deity. Certainly, then, the highest use, the first and best application of all literary and scientific pursuit, is to confirm our belief in the Creator and Supreme Ruler of the universe—to establish and enlarge our acquaintance with God.

It is a lamentable fact, that this noblest end of knowledge is far from being always followed. Many persons who are engaged in scientific inquiries, live in the daily forgetfulness of their Heavenly Father, and are sometimes found to doubt and even to deny his existence. This strange perversion of man's intellect, can be ultimately traced only to the corruption of his heart; but it appears to be occasioned partly by the absorbing nature of philosophical pursuits, which may easily so fill the unguarded mind as to leave no place for the Author of all knowledge and wisdom; and partly by the habit which too much prevails among philosophers, of resting in second causes. They trace the phenomena of nature to the laws through which nature is governed, and they accustom themselves to speak and write, and, finally, to think of these laws, as if they were sentient and intelligent beings.

The absurdity of this mode of thought, as it relates to the creation of God, must be evident to every considerate mind. I walk into one of your factories, and inquire of the owner, or rather of the intelligent head-man, what is it which regulates the moving scene, and keeps the machinery working at a uniform pace. "Oh! sir," says he, "it is that governor in yon corner of the room. You see those two balls which are always in rotation. When the rapidity of the steam engine is too great, they expand by the centrifugal force, and by partly closing a valve in the pipe of the boiler, diminish the quantity of the steam which acts on the engine. On the contrary, when the motion is too slow, the centrifugal force of the balls abates, the circle round which they move is lessened, the valve opens, and the power is again increased. Thus, sir, the whole machinery is kept moving at an even rate."

But who governs the governor? Who provided it with its balls? Who placed it in its right position? Possibly the ingenious individual with whom I am conversing.

Were I seriously to impute to this most useful yet inanimate machine, the actual government of the works, and even the settlement of the sales and purchases, you would not fail to call me a madman or a fool. Yet precisely of the same degree of madness and folly is that philosopher guilty, who goes no further than his second cause, forgets his Creator, and ascribes the orderly arrangement of the universe, and all its glorious phenomena, to the LAWS OF ATTRACTION AND MOTION.

Here I must recur to that first principle in science to which we have already alluded—a principle worked up in the constitution of our nature, and which we know to be true, though we cannot prove it, that every effect must have an adequate cause. When I contemplate the heavens and all their starry host; when I take into view, as a complete system, the planets, the moons which attend their course, and the sun around which they move; when I behold, in myriads of fixed stars, the centres of as many more systems of the same description; when I extend my conceptions to a countless number of these systems, moving round some common centre of unspeakable magnitude—I am compelled to acknowledge that here is a stupendous effect, for which only one cause can by any possibility account—I mean the FIAT of an Intelligent and Omnipotent Being.

Constrained as we are by the very structure of our minds, to rely on the uniformity of the operations of nature, and taught by long and multiplied experience, that every organized form of matter has a beginning, we cannot, as it appears to me, avoid the conclusion, that the vast machinery of the heavens once began to exist; and, being convinced of this truth, we are absolutely certain that nothing could cause its existence, but the power of an eternal God. Thus do reason and philosophy persuade and constrain our consent to a record of the highest moment, contained only in Scripture—"IN THE BEGINNING GOD CREATED THE HEAVEN AND THE EARTH."

But let us take some particular part of the created universe—some single plant—some individual animal. For example, let us occupy a few minutes in considering the structure of my friend and brother there, who is sitting in front of me, and whose existence, as we all know, can be traced to a beginning. Let us examine him body and mind. First, as to his body—it is full of contrivances—full of the evident results of the most profound science, and of the nicest art. How perfectly, for example, is the structure of his eye fitted for the reception of those rays of light, which are falling upon it in all directions from visible objects! How nicely are the rays refracted by its several lenses! How easily do they glide through the pupil! How comprehensive, yet how perfect, is the picture formed on its retina—a picture reversed to inspection from without, but all in upright order to the percipient within! Here, indeed, is the science of optics displayed in its perfection. Then turn to his ear. How finely does it illustrate the principles of acoustics! How nicely are its cavities fitted for the reception and increase of sound! How accurately does the drum in the centre, respond to the undulation from without!

Look at that most convenient of levers—my brother's arm; with what ease does he apply its forces! How nicely are its elbow and its shoulder adjusted for their respective purposes; and how admirably is the whole completed by the addition of a hand! Think of the union of strength and pliancy which distinguishes his spine—an effect produced by machinery of the most elaborate description! Contemplate his joints—the hinge where a hinge is wanted—the ball and socket where his comfort demands that peculiar structure; all lubricated by ever-flowing oil; all working with a faultless accuracy! Think of his muscles, endued with that curious faculty of contraction, by which he is enabled to move his members! Think of the studied mechanical adjustment by which, without ever interrupting each other's functions, these muscles pull against each other, and keep his body even! Then turn your attention to his blood; a fluid in perpetual motion—supplied with pure air in one stage of its journey, and, in another, with the essence of his food; and conveying the elements of life, every few moments, to every part of his body; driven from the heart by one set of vessels, and restored to it by another; those vessels most artificially supplied with valves to prevent the backward motion of the fluid; while the pump in the centre is for ever at work, and makes a hundred thousand strokes in a day, without ever growing weary! I will not now dwell particularly on the still more complicated structure of his nerves, on the chemistry of his stomach, on the packing of the whole machinery, on the cellular substance which fills up its cavities, on the skin which covers it, on the sightliness and manly beauty which adorns the fabric. I will rather turn to the mind, which does, indeed, complete the man—its subtle powers of thought, memory, association, imagination—its passions and affections—its natural and moral capacities. Surely we must all acknowledge that our brother is a wonderful creature indeed—an effect for which it is utterly impossible to imagine any adequate cause, but the contriving intelligence and irresistible power of an all-wise Creator.

You tell me that our friend has a father—a grandfather—that he looks back on an indefinite series of progenitors. This fact only strengthens my case. Certain it is that his own structure, both of mind and body, contains numerous and unquestionable proofs of design. Where there is design, there must of necessity be a designer. The parent, as we are all perfectly aware, is not that designer. Our understanding can find no rest in the mere medium of production. We are compelled to have recourse to an unseen and superior power, and to confess that the designer is God. But if the workmanship displayed in the formation of the individual proclaims the wisdom and power of God, still more conspicuously are they manifested in a succession of generations—in the wondrous capacity bestowed on every kind of living creature to produce its own likeness.

Were it possible that a series of successive finite beings should exist from eternity (a notion which, in my opinion, disproves itself), and supposing it to be possible, were it probable, or even certain, that mankind have so existed—our argument from a design to a designer, would still remain untouched. It would continue to apply with resistless force to every individual of the species.

But it so happens that we are able to trace not only every individual man, but our whole race to an undoubted beginning. That beginning, which took place about six thousand years ago, is plainly recorded in Scripture, and the record is supported by the conclusions of science. You are doubtless aware how extensively of late years scientific inquiry has been directed to the examination and classification of the surface or crust of our globe.

(To be continued.)

THE LAST DAY.

Jehovah comes, in solemn state—
Archangels shout, and trumpets sound—
Behold! the guilty nations quake—
"The bridegroom comes!" they all resound.

See! sinful man recoil with fear,
Astounded now vain mortals see
The Judge of quick and dead draw near,
Enrob'd in glorious majesty.

The trumpet sounds in loudest strain;
"To judgment!" angels sound on high,
"The Lord omnipotent doth reign!"
Loud Hallelujahs rend the sky.

The dead stand forth, both small and great;
Martyrs and prophets! Awful sight!
The wicked call—Alas! too late,
Ye mountains, hide us from the light!

Vessels of mercy—show your plea,
Convicted stand before your God;
"Jesus, our plea rests all in Thee,
Redeem'd and ransom'd with thy blood."

"Come, O ye blessed"—"enter rest,"
"The kingdom promis'd of your God,"
To dwell as angels—ever blest,
To praise the Saviour, praise the Lord!

THE MOSAICAL AND MINERAL GEOLOGIES,

Illustrated and Compared by W. M. Higgins, F.G.S. &c.
London, Scoble, Chancery Lane. 8vo. pp. 168.

"The undevout Astronomer is mad," says a wise writer; and must we not form the same opinion of an undevout Geologist? Professors of natural science there have been, and those of great name, who have pursued their investigations and studies with an undevout mind: but surely it must be impiety to search into the works of nature, neglecting the glorious, self-existent, almighty Creator and Preserver of universal nature! And this impiety is an insult to reason—it is madness!

Mr. Higgins justly observes, "It is a matter of importance to those who are convinced of the authenticity of the Bible, that its philosophy should be properly understood, investigated in its details, and compared with nature: and should the examination conducted by them be at first unsatisfactory, and the harmony of God's word and works unapparent, the combination of irresistible arguments, which had convinced them of the truth of revelation, will lead them to conclude that there are imperfections in their knowledge, or errors in their deductions.

"The man who has been unconvinced of the divine character of the Bible by the arguments which are so powerful to Christians, will compare Geology and the Mosaical history of the Creation with different feelings. Should he be unable to reconcile the statements of the two, he will not hesitate to prefer his own deductions to the clearest assertions of the scriptures, and perhaps adduce it as a fresh argument against its authenticity.

"It would be well for such a mind to remember, that Geology is as yet only in its cradle, and its nurses have scarcely recognized the features of its countenance. Many of those facts which are now received as principles, may hereafter be found exceptions, and thus overturn all those deductions which are built upon them: and as so many theories, proposed by men of acknowledged genius, have been disproved by the accumulation of knowledge, so it is possible that those upon which he is placing so much reliance, may hereafter share the fate of their predecessors." p. 2, 3.

We regard this work of Mr. Higgins as entitled to the favour of the Christian public; as it contains a large portion of most valuable matter, which illustrates and confirms the Mosaic account of the Creation. It will form a valuable companion to a very interesting new work on a kindred subject, by Sharon Turner, F.S.A. and R.A.S.L., entitled, "the Sacred History of the World, Part the First, from the Creation to the Deluge, attempted to be philosophically considered."

Mr. Higgins will bear with us in suggesting, that in the event of a second edition of his work (which we hope will be soon demanded), a smaller size and a cheaper form would be desirable.

THE LADYE CHAPEL, ST. SAVIOUR'S CHURCH, SOUTHWARK.

THE LADYE CHAPEL.

Antiquity and architectural beauty have been pleaded as reasons for the preservation and repairing of the Ladye Chapel, Southwark. This plea has been regarded by the public; by whom liberal subscriptions have been afforded, to enable its guardians to render it an ornament to the neighbourhood, peculiarly attractive to passengers over London Bridge.

We sincerely venerate hoary antiquity, and we are delighted admirers of architectural beauty: on both these accounts, therefore, we rejoice in the preservation and repair of this ancient chapel. But our minds cherish associations with this building of a far more interesting character as Christians. We recollect that this edifice has been consecrated by the testimony of many noble Martyrs, who, in the days of "Mary the bloody," counted not their lives dear, so that they might finish their course with joy in testifying the gospel of the grace of God, before the cruel and fiend like Romish prelates, by whom these holy confessors of Christ were sentenced to the stake.

A few notices of the last examination of that eminent servant of Christ, John Bradford, conducted in this Chapel, Jan. 31, 1555, before the Lord Chancellor and several Popish bishops, will not fail to interest our readers.

It will be proper previously to remark, that Bradford was one of the six famous preachers, appointed by King Edward VI, to itinerate through the kingdom, as Home Missionaries, to call the people to attend to the gospel of Christ, as contained in the Holy Scriptures. His letters to London, Cambridge, and other places, show the earnestness with which he laboured as a preacher. Fox speaks of the imprisonment of Bradford thus:—"He was first committed to the Tower, then unto other prisons, out of the which neither his innocency, godliness, nor charitable dealings could purchase him liberty of body, till by death, which he suffered for Christ's cause, he obtained the heavenly liberty of which neither Pope nor Papist shall ever deprive him. From the Tower he came to the King's Bench in Southwark; and after his condemnation, he was sent to the Compter, in the Poultry, in London, in the which two places, for the time he did remain prisoner, he preached twice a day continually, unless sickness hindered him; where also the sacrament was often administered; and through his means, the keepers so well did bear with him, such resort of good folks was daily to his lecture, and to the ministration of the sacrament, that commonly his chamber was well nigh filled. Preaching, reading, and praying, was all his whole life. He did not eat above one meal a day, which was but very little when he took it, and his continual study was upon his knees.—Very gentle was he to man and child, and in so good credit with his keepers, that at his desire, in an evening, when prisoner in the King's Bench in Southwark, he had license, upon his promise to return again that night, to go into London without any keeper, to visit one that was sick, lying by the Steel-yard. Neither did he fail his promise, but returned unto his prison again, rather being before his hour than breaking his fidelity."

The principal charge against Bradford, as it was against most of the martyrs in Mary's reign, was the denial of the Romish doctrine of Transubstantiation. Being seated in judgment in the Chapel, the Lord Chancellor addressed Bradford—

"Well, yesterday thou didst maintain false heresy concerning the blessed sacrament, and therefore we gave thee respite till this day to deliberate."

Bradford. "My lord, as I said at the first, I spake nothing of the sacrament but that which you allowed, and therefore reproved it not, nor gave me any thing to deliberate."

Lord Chancellor. "Why, didst thou not deny Christ's presence in the sacrament?"

Bradford. "No, I never denied nor taught, but that to faith whole Christ, body and blood, was as present at the bread and wine to the due receivers."

Lord Chancellor. "Yea, but dost thou not believe that Christ's body naturally and really is there, under the forms of bread and wine?"

Bradford. "My lord, I believe Christ is present there to the faith of the due receiver: as for transubstantiation, I plainly and flatly tell you, I believe it not."

Here Bradford was called "Diabolus: for we ask no question," said the Lord Chancellor, "of transubstantiation, but of Christ's presence."

Bradford. "I deny not his presence to the faith of the receivers, but deny that he is included in the bread, or that the bread was transubstantiate."

Bishop of Worcester. "If he be not included, how is he present?"

Bradford. "Forsooth, though my faith can tell how, yet my tongue cannot express it, nor you otherwise than by faith hear it, or understand it."

After much consultation among themselves, and occasional questioning of their prisoner, he was asked by the Bishop of Durham, "When Christ began to be present in the sacrament? whether before the receiver received it, or no?"

Bradford answered, that the question was curious and not necessary; and further said, that as the cup was the New Testament, so the bread was Christ's body to him that received it duly, but yet so that the bread is bread. For, added he, "in all the Scripture ye shall not find this, Non est panis, There is no bread." Much ado was hereabouts, calling Bradford, Heretic; and he desiring them to proceed on in God's name: he looked for that which God appointed for them to do.

Lord Chancellor. "This fellow is now in another heresy of fatal necessity, as though all things were so tied together, that of mere necessity all must come to pass."

But Bradford prayed him to take things as they be spoken, and not wrest them into a contrary sense. "Your lordship," says he, "doth discern betwixt God and man. Things are not by fortune to God at any time, though to man they seem so sometimes. I speak but as the apostle said, Lord, see how Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Prelates, are gathered together against thy Christ, to do that which thy hand and counsel hath before ordained for them to do."

"Here the Lord Chancellor began to read the excommunication—and Bradford fell down on his knees, and heartily thanked God that he had counted him worthy to suffer for his name's sake. And so praying to God to give him repentance and a good mind, after the excommunication was read, he was delivered to the sheriff of London, this being purposed of his murderers, that he should be delivered from thence to the earl of Derby, to be conveyed into Lancashire, and there to be burned in the town of Manchester, where he was born. But their purpose was altered, for they burned him in London."

Bradford was not executed until the first day of July; during which time he was harassed by repeated disputations with the Romanists. Bonner, bishop of London, the bishop of Chichester, the archbishop of York, two Spanish friars, one of whom was confessor to King Philip, came to him from day to day, to endeavour to induce him to recant.

Fox has preserved the substance of these disputations. In an answer to an observation of the bishop of Chichester, "He is a heretic, and so none of the church, that doth hold any doctrine against the definition of the church," Bradford emphatically said, "O my lord, will ye condemn to the devil any man that believeth truly the twelve articles of the faith, wherein I take the unity of Christ's church to consist, although in some points he believe not the definition of that which ye call the church? I doubt not but that he which holdeth firmly the articles of our belief, though in other things he dissent from your definition, yet he shall be saved!" "Yea," exclaimed the bishop, "is this your divinity?"

John Leaf, a young man in the twentieth year of his age, an apprentice to a tallowchandler, was executed at the same stake with Bradford, in Smithfield, and for refusing to subscribe to the Popish doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Fox says, "It is reported of the said John Leaf, by one that was in the Compter at the same time, and saw the thing, that after his examination before the bishops, when two bills were sent to him in the Compter in Bread Street, the one containing a recantation, the other his confessions, to know which of them he would put his hand to, first hearing the bill of recantation read unto him, because he could not read himself, he refused it. And when the other was read unto him, which he well liked of, instead of a pen he took a pin, and so pricking his hand, sprinkled the blood upon the said bill, willing the reader thereof to show the bishops, that he had sealed the same bill with his blood already."

Fox describes particularly the resigned and peaceful manner of their deaths, and adds, "Thus they ended their mortal lives, like two lambs, without any alteration of their countenance, being void of all fear, hoping to obtain the prize that they had long run at; to which I beseech Almighty God happily to conduct us, through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen."

The Engraving represents the interior of the Virgin Mary's Chapel, commonly called the Ladye Chapel, and appended to the ancient collegiate church of St. Saviour's. The roof of the Chapel is divided into nine groined arches, supported by six octangular pillars in two rows, having small circular columns at the four points, forty-two feet long. It is, at present, chiefly used for holding the consistory, or bishop's court—the north-east corner being expressly fitted up for that purpose, with table, desk, and elevated seat: in this place are also held the visitations for the deanery of Southwark, the other parts having served for the stowage of lumber.

In this chapel is the monument of Lancelot Andrews, who died Bishop of Winchester, in 1626. The effigy, on this monument, represents him in his robes of Prelate of the Garter; but the face is much damaged. He wears a black cap and a small ruff; a book held in his right hand lies on his breast. On a tablet over the tomb (whereon were placed his arms, between two figures of Justice and Fortitude) is the following inscription:—

> Sept. 21. Die Lunæ Hora matutina fere quarta, > Lancelotus Andrews, Episcopus Wintoniensis, meritissimum Lumen Orbis Christiani, mortuus est
> Ephemeris Laudiani.
> Anno Dom. 1626. Ætat. suæ 71.

And at the head of the tomb,—

> Monumentum quod hoc restitutum. Anno 1761.

On the pavement, near Bishop Andrews' tomb, are two ancient stone coffins; one of which is represented in our engraving; but we have no account left, where or at what particular time they were found, nor is it known to whom they belonged. They are unquestionably of great age.

There is also in this Chapel a grave-stone of a bishop in pontificalibus, supposed to have been for the celebrated William of Wykeham, bishop of Lincoln, who was buried in this church.

Of the many vicissitudes this Chapel has undergone since the mass was sung, and the incense smoked, and the candles burnt before the altar of our Lady, the most degrading was its conversion into a bakehouse, in which state it continued for "threescore and some odde yeares." In the year 1607, Mr. H. Wilson, tenant of the Chapel of the Holy Virgin, found himself inconvenienced by a tomb, and applied to the vestry for its removal, which was consented to, he making the place up again in any reasonable sort. In this state it continued till the year 1624, when the parish expended the sum of 200*l.* on its repair.

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

His Conversion, continued.

The master of William cherished the senseless prejudices against Dissenters and Methodists, which are entertained by those who do not understand the spirit and claims of true religion. He was totally ignorant of their principles, and indeed of those of the church of England, to which he professed to belong: but about the commencement of the apprenticeship of William, his master was induced, by a pious old lady, a member of the church under the care of the late Rev. Jehoiada Brewer, Independent minister of Livery Street chapel, to go and hear her pastor, and William accompanied him. The large chapel, with its crowded congregation of attentive worshippers, astonished both William and his master; and the sermon, delivered in Mr. Brewer's peculiarly serious and awakening manner, seemed to affect him, while it added to the impression already produced on the mind of William, by the various means already noticed. His master declared that it had done him good; and for that reason, he thought he should go to hear Mr. Brewer, constantly every Sunday. But the sermon was like our Lord's description of the seed sown by the way side, which the fowls of the air devoured: for meeting with a "friend," it was late at night when he returned home, and in a state of senselessness by intoxication! Thus the imaginary good derived from the sermon was lost, and he was not known ever to go again to hear Mr. Brewer, or to enter a chapel of the Dissenters.

Occasionally, on Sundays, his master went to church in the morning: though usually he stayed at home, posting and settling his accounts, or forming plans for the business of the week. But William, when not detained at work, went regularly to church, as he was required, leading the other boys, he being the senior; and while they were allowed to visit their friends, after the afternoon service, William came home to his solitary apartment of the workshop. That was a place, which would not have been chosen as the most eligible for religious improvement; nevertheless, he found it like Jacob's dreary lodging at Luz, truly a Bethel; and many profitable hours did he spend in it, treasuring up in his mind the saving testimonies of the Divine word.

Although William had been instructed by his mother from his childhood to "say his prayers every night," particularly the Lord's prayer, yet for several years he had neglected that practice, until, after his mind had been affected by the reading of the Holy Scriptures, his conscience would allow him no longer to neglect it. At first he contented himself with saying the Lord's prayer after he had lain down in bed; but in a short time, this would not satisfy his mind. He was necessitated to kneel down to prayer; and more than once, when it had been forgotten, did he rise from his bed to perform that duty. Even this measure of "saying his prayers," was not sufficient for a long period to pacify his conscience; and he then had recourse to the "Whole Duty of Man," a volume which he obtained from his mother, soon after he had entered on his servitude.

This was a book which William read much, and laboured with considerable care to keep the holy law of God as therein enjoined; by which, however, he was never able to gain satisfaction. The short ejaculations, extracted from the Psalms, and contained in that volume, appeared exceedingly suitable; and William learnt a great portion of them, which he frequently used, during the day and his waking hours, with considerable benefit and delight to his soul. He was accustomed to rise in the morning much earlier than his fellow apprentices, for the opportunity of saying his prayers out of the Whole Duty of Man: but the habit of reading his prayers became tiresome and unsatisfactory, as few of the forms were altogether in accordance with his experience and state of mind. He used, therefore, parts only, and made additions in his own words extemporaneously, according to his necessities; until, wearied with this mode, he found that he could express himself with tolerable accuracy and fluency without that help; and he was delighted with the discovery, that the people of God, whose habits of piety are testified and pourtrayed in the Scriptures, were accustomed thus to pray.

It may also be observed, that the Whole Duty of Man contributed but very little to lead the mind of William into a clear and full view of the gospel; but rather to obscure it, and to strengthen those legal and dark notions of the method of salvation by Christ, which are natural to the newly awakened, but self-righteous mind. But although not privileged with the friendship of a judicious Christian counsellor, whose rich experience of evangelical truth had qualified him to give solid instruction to a young inquirer after "the good old paths of the prophets and apostles," it is believed that the Lord the Spirit was the gracious and efficient teacher of William.

During the apprenticeship of William, the character of the ministry in the parish church was not reputedly evangelical: nor could William recollect any serious impression ever produced upon his mind, by all the sermons he heard in it in the course of seven years' attendance, except in three instances; and those were by visiting ministers. The first two were on one Lord's day, and from the same preacher, an entire stranger to William: but the effect of his discourse was never lost. The texts of the minister were, in the morning, "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?" Heb. ii, 3; in the afternoon, "Continue in prayer." Col. iv, 2. The texts and the sermons upon them, could not have been more suitably chosen for the spiritual benefit of William; and it appeared, that the Divine blessing attended the word delivered in a manner unusual in that church. There was something in the illustration of those scripture passages, and in the manner and the tones of the preacher, altogether different from that which was common: and many in the congregation took particular notice of it, so as to make it a subject of conversation for some time; and it was reported that Dr. Croft, the aged curate, declared, that he would never suffer him again to enter his pulpit.

The other instance was by the visit of Dr. Legge, Dean of Windsor, afterwards Bishop of Oxford, brother of the Honourable Mr. Legge, of Aston Hall near Birmingham, and son of the late pious Earl of Dartmouth. The discourse, on behalf of the Blue Coat Charity School, was preached by the Dean, upon that most inviting passage, Luke xi, 13, "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children; how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?"

Perhaps nothing could have been more appropriate to the exercises of mind experienced by William, than the subject of the text; and the sermon itself was the happy means of leading him to an enlarged apprehension of that momentous and interesting doctrine—the influences of the Holy Spirit upon the mind of man: and it served as a preparation, leading him to read, with an interest altogether new, several hitherto obscure parts of the Bible, especially the epistles of the apostle Paul.

A sermon preached by Dr. Booker of Dudley, at St. Philip's church, on a week day, at a feast of the Druid's Club, was instructive in a very considerable degree to the mind of William. As his master was a "Druid," and proud of the honour of belonging to that society, he gave the apprentices a holiday, for the purpose of seeing the procession: but William was most solicitous to hear the sermon, for the privilege of which, he most willingly paid one shilling and sixpence. The text was 1 Pet. ii, 9, 10, "Ye should show forth the praises of him, who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light: who in time past were not a people, but now are the people of God."

The sermon appeared of a singularly novel character; but most truly delightful to William; as it exhibited a striking outline of the ancient system of pagan Druidism practised by our forefathers, as testified especially by Julius Cæsar, to whom the Doctor referred, contrasted with the benevolence, excellence, and happy effects of Christianity. Not having at that time read Cæsar, and not knowing much concerning the religion of the ancient Gauls and Britons, William was enlarged in heart by the contrast, with gratitude to God for the blessings and treasures of the gospel, and determined to know more concerning the horrible system of the "venerable Druids."

Another sermon was the means of considerable edification to William,—"The Star in the East," delivered by Dr. Claudius Buchanan, at St. Mary's chapel, in 1809: the celebrated discourse which that gentleman published under that title, on his return from India. The darkness and superstition, the degradation and cruelties of paganism, as stated by the Doctor in his discourse, deeply affected the mind of William: especially his declaring, that "if a poor Soodra were known to read the Shaster to another of his caste, the reader was liable to have his tongue cut out, and the hearer to have melted lead poured in his ears."—William was therefore led to resolve on making some efforts, if it should ever be in his power, in future life, to promote the extensive diffusion of the blessings of divine Christianity.

The process of the conversion of William to the truth of the gospel of Christ, will be somewhat indicated by a remarkable circumstance, which brought his decision to the test about two years before his apprenticeship terminated. From a near connection of his master, in the way of business, with some patrons of the "Stage," it was usual for him to have a number of tickets to the theatre, once or twice in a season, when he commonly gave one to each of the apprentices. William went to the theatre by this means, many times: but without any peculiar gratification, and the last play he ever saw, was "the admired Comedy of Speed the Plough." But the profanation of the Divine Name, which was repeatedly used in the performance of that piece, and the frequent appeals to Heaven by the performers, on occasions of a trifling nature, as if for mere embellishment to their sentences, so shocked him, while he remembered the reading of the "Ten Commandments" at church every Lord's day morning, and the solemn responses to them addressed to Almighty God, that he wondered the roof of the building did not fall upon the impious beings, as a judgment upon their profane hypocrisy. He resolved therefore, on that account, that he never would go to another play as long as he lived. The impiety of every play that William had seen, appeared a sufficient reason for his determination; yet his mind was not a little perplexed to understand, how so many of the clergy, whom he saw at the theatre, could sit, and by their presence sanction such daring profanity. But he could decide only for himself; and concluded it best for him to leave the clergy to reconcile their own conduct with the law of God, if it were in their power. Besides, the riotous and filthy behaviour of the "company" in the gallery; their vulgar and indecent shoutings, making the house to resound, and calculated to defile or corrupt the most virtuous and vigorous mind; the daring boldness and the immodest habits of the female performers; and the general appearance of the attendants about the theatre, produced reflections which penetrated his mind with a conviction, that the system of amusement altogether, was not only opposed to the principles of scriptural religion, but extremely pernicious to youth, and in itself highly injurious to society.

In these opinions William was confirmed by the fact, that one of the talented and admired performers, was brother to one of his workfellows: he having, as many others it is known had done, wasted a fortune before he betook himself to the stage for support. By means of this connection, the general habits of the performers in private life were frequently a subject of conversation; and numerous instances of extravagance and profligacy, licentiousness and criminality, of those in that profession, were mentioned among the workmen: and that which formed a fruitful topic of jocular conversation to these men of debased mind relating to the demoralizing influence of the theatre, is amply confirmed by the history of the stage in all countries.

The next season William respectfully and modestly declined the offer of a ticket by his master, observing, that he would rather stay at home. His master appeared to apprehend the reason, but made no reply; nor did he take any notice of it, until some time afterwards, when he had more play tickets, and then he sent an order into the manufactory to inquire, "How many Methodists are there in the shop, who will not go to the play?" He had said, he knew William was a Methodist, and he would take care that he should not have an opportunity of refusing another ticket. Thus, though he was scrupulous in not going to any place of worship among Dissenters, even on Sunday evenings, when he was allowed some time to go out for two or three hours, to return not later than eight o'clock, yet he was considered and called a Methodist, simply on account of his habitual seriousness.

William was now decided for God; he had laid hold on his everlasting covenant by faith in Christ Jesus, and he was enabled to cast all his care upon the Lord. His master hated his religious spirit: but he reverenced his upright character; and on many occasions he was known to declare, he could trust him with any thing, either for his ability as a workman, or for his honesty as a good lad; and that he was sure he never should have another like him in either of those respects.

We here pause in our narrative of the Birmingham Apprentice; intending, in our new volume, to give some particulars of his subsequent life, which we think our readers will find both interesting and profitable.

REFLECTIONS ON THE WORKS OF NATURE.

To whatever part of the habitable globe our attention may be directed, to the frozen regions of the North or the torrid climes of India and the East, we still meet with ceaseless specimens, before unknown, of the unrivalled workmanship of that God whom all creation owns as Lord. But our admiration is especially excited by the various productions of the fruitful soil: it is there that beauty shines in the gayest luxuriance.

From the gaudy tulip with its variegated stains, and blooming blushing rose, to which the proudest beauty at the monarch's court feels flattered on being compared, to the humblest moss that courts the seat of solitude and desolation, all displays perfection. It is here that, lost in astonishment at the countless variety that defies classification, we are compelled by the consciousness of that truth which cannot be gainsayed, to admit the existence and superintending care of that Being, whose offspring alone we are, and by whom we live, move, and breathe.—Johnson.

THE GREATER FOOL.

In a sermon preached by Bishop Hall upon his eightieth birth-day, that faithful preacher relates the following story:—"There was a certain lord who kept a fool in his house, as many a great man did in those days, for their pleasure; to whom this lord gave a staff, and charged him to keep it, till he should meet with one who was a greater fool than himself; and if he met with such a one, to deliver it over to him. Not many years after, his lord fell sick; and indeed was sick unto death. His fool came to see him, and was told by his sick lord that he must shortly leave him. 'And whither wilt thou go?' said the fool. 'Into another world,' said the lord. 'And when wilt thou come again?—within a month?' 'No.' 'Within a year?' 'No.' 'When then?' 'Never.' 'Never!—and what provision hast thou made for thy entertainment there whither thou goest?' 'None at all.' 'No!' said the fool; 'none at all? Here, take my staff then. Art thou going away for ever, and hast taken no order, whence thou shalt never return? Take my staff; for I am guilty of no such folly as this!'"

STATISTICS OF YORKSHIRE.

Yorkshire, the largest county in England, is bounded on the East by the German Ocean; on the West by Lancashire and part of Cheshire; on the North by Durham; and on the South by the counties of Derby, Nottingham, and Lincoln. Yorkshire extends about 115 miles from East to West, and about 90 miles from North to South. From its great extent, this county is divided into three parts, called the North Riding, the East Riding, and the West Riding, according to their situation with respect to York; and these are subdivided into 26 hundreds, and 563 parishes, containing 73 market towns, and 2,330 villages.

The North Riding, bounded on the north-east and east by the German Ocean, is remarkable for high hills, called the Eastern Moorlands, which occupy a dreary space of about 30 miles from east to west, and 15 miles from north to south, penetrated indeed by many beautiful and fruitful dales, particularly those of Reyesdale, Wensleydale, Eskdale, and Bilsdale, which contain each from 10,000 to 15,000 acres. Though the air of this division is generally cold, arising from the great elevation of the Moorlands, computed at from 1,400 to 1,500 feet above the level of the sea, it is considered as the most healthy in the county of York. In this division are the ancient boroughs of Malton, Northallerton, Richmond, Scarborough, and Thirsk.

The East Riding, bounded on the east by the Ocean, though less conspicuously marked by the bolder features of nature than the other parts of the county, contains scenes of great magnificence, especially where the sea or the Humber enters into view. This part is distinguished for its range of hills called the "York Wolds." Their greatest height is not supposed to exceed 600 feet; but their extent is computed at about 400,000 acres. Half a century ago, barley and oats were the principal kinds of grain used in this district of the county; but within that period, vast inclosures have been made, its dreary swamps have been cultivated, and wheaten bread alone now forms the food of servants and labourers. The East Riding includes the ancient boroughs of Beverly, Hedon, and Hull, the latter of which, situated on the Humber, is the grand emporium of foreign trade for that part of the kingdom, and is reckoned the fourth commercial port in England.

The West Riding is much more extensive than the other divisions of Yorkshire, being supposed to contain 1,586,000 statute acres. Here are situated the ancient boroughs of Aldborough, Boroughbridge, Knaresborough, Pontefract, and Ripon: but many of its commercial towns far exceed them in population. Three districts are noted in this division: the level, the diversified, and the mountainous: this latter contains the three remarkable mountains of Pennigart, Ingleborough, and Wharnside, being estimated at the heights of 3,930, 3,987, and 4,052 feet respectively.

This division of Yorkshire may safely be pronounced one of the greatest manufacturing districts in the world. It possesses, indeed, very great local advantages: on every side the raw materials abound, and coals are plentiful, consequently they are cheap. The manufactures carried on at Leeds, Wakefield, Bradford, Halifax, Huddersfield, and populous places adjacent, comprise broad and narrow cloths of all qualities, shalloons, calimancoes, and flannels, with every kind of woollen goods. From Sheffield, cutlery and plated goods, and solid silver plate, are exported in large quantities to all parts of the globe. In the vicinity of most of the above places, the soil was originally little better than waste; but from the increase of population, consequent upon the introduction of manufactures, and its invariable accompaniments, abundant manure, and a ready market for produce, the land has been rendered equally valuable with that of districts naturally more fertile, and the face of the country has assumed a totally new aspect.

Yorkshire is distinguished for its rivers, the principal of which are the Ouse, Aire, Don, Derwent, Colder, Wharf, Nidd, Ure, and Hull, all terminating in the Humber, which enters the German Ocean between Yorkshire and Lincolnshire.

ADDRESS OF JOSEPH JOHN GURNEY, ESQ.

TO THE MECHANICS OF MANCHESTER.

Geology is a favourite study in the present day, and few persons of any education are now unacquainted with the classification in question. We have the primitive rocks; the transition, the secondary, the tertiary, and the alluvial; each bearing the marks of a watery formation; and each maintaining its own order in the series, notwithstanding the frequent interruption from below, of vast protruding masses supposed to be of fiery origin. The secondary rocks in particular, composed of alternate layers of sand-stone and lime-stone, are replete with fossil remains of plants and animals—the intelligible remnants of a once abundant, but now obsolete life.

Now among all these remains, not a trace is to be found of man. Man therefore, beyond all reasonable question, is comparatively a modern creature. And not only is this true of the human race, but of the other species of animals and plants, which now enliven and adorn the world. If I am correct in my apprehension of the subject, they are all, or nearly all, NEW; belonging to an order of nature distinctly different from that which these ancient rocks display. For ever therefore must we lay aside the idle notion of an infinite series of finite creatures, producing their own likeness. Geology affords a palpable evidence, that the present order of animal and vegetable life had a commencement within some period of moderate limits.

But we have not yet stated our whole case. While the secondary rocks display to the geologist an order of created beings prior to the present, the primitive rocks—those vast masses of granite and gneiss which form the lowest and oldest tier of the crust of the earth—are wholly destitute of these curious remains of animal and vegetable life. From this fact we may fairly infer, that time was, and at no immeasurable distance, when there existed on the surface of our globe, no plants or animals whatsoever. Not only therefore is man comparatively modern—not only may all the different species with which we are now acquainted be traced to a first origin—but all preceding orders of living and growing creatures, must have had their commencement also within the limits of time. Undoubtedly, therefore, the existence of the human race, together with the whole present and past system of animal and vegetable life, is an effect which nature and philosophy compel us to ascribe to some adequate cause. Every one knows that this adequate cause can be only one—THE FIAT OF OMNIPOTENT WISDOM.

From these remarks, you will easily perceive how false is the notion entertained by some persons, that geology is fraught with a sting against religion. So far from it, this delightful science has done much to confirm the Scripture record, and to complete that natural proof of a supreme intelligent Being, on which all religion hinges. Let it ever be remembered, that of all persons in the world, the Christian has the least reason to fear the influence of truth. Truth is the very element which he breathes. It is his hope, his strength, and his life. From whatsoever quarter it bursts in upon him, he hails its approach, and greets it as his firmest friend. His motto is unchanged and unchangeable.—Magna est veritas et prævalebit—"TRUTH SHALL TRIUMPH."

To look through nature up to nature's God, is indeed a profitable and delightful employment. While I would warmly encourage you to cultivate so desirable a habit, I wish again to remind you that the wisdom and power of God—displayed as they are in the outward creation—are inseparably connected with his moral government. Just in the degree in which we are obedient to that government—just in the degree in which our faculties, both bodily and mental, are subjected to God's holy law—will all the knowledge which we acquire be blessed to our own happiness, and to that of our fellow men. Hence we may form some idea of the vast importance of that fourth branch of knowledge, to which allusion was made in the early part of this address, and on which I shall now make a few remarks—I mean moral and religious knowledge.

And where is this to be obtained? Certainly we may furnish our minds with some considerable portions of it by reading the book of nature and providence; but there is another book which must be regarded as its depository—a book in which all things moral and spiritual, belonging to the welfare of man, are fully unfolded. True indeed it is that natural science proclaims the power and wisdom of God; that the perceptible tendency of his government makes manifest his holiness; and lastly, that the surplus of happiness bestowed on all living creatures demonstrates his goodness. I believe it is also true that the law of God is written, in characters more or less legible, on the hearts of all men. But for a full account of his glorious attributes—for the knowledge of religion in all its beauty, and strength, and completeness—we must have recourse to the Bible—we must meditate on the written word. There the whole moral law is delineated with a pencil of heavenly light. There man is described in his true character. Above all, "LIFE AND IMMORTALITY" are brought to light by the Gospel." "This is LIFE ETERNAL, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent!"

Do not imagine, my friends, that I am about to preach you a sermon; that is not my present business; but I consider it to be strictly within the order of my subject, to invite and encourage you to seek diligently after that knowledge, on subordination to which, depends the ultimate utility and advantage of all other mental cultivation. I beg of you therefore, not to neglect the daily perusal of the Holy Scriptures. When you return home in the evening from your day's business, and before you retire to rest, devote a little time, I beseech you, to the collecting of your families together. Read a chapter in the Bible to them, in a serious and deliberate manner; and then pour forth your prayers to that God, in whom you live and move and have your being—to that God who can alone bless your labour and your study, and preserve you in peace, virtue, and safety.

The religion of the Holy Scriptures will sweeten your sorrows, and sanctify your pleasures. It will keep not only your family circle, but your own minds, in right order; and while it will discountenance all vain notions and false speculations, it will enlarge and improve your faculties, for every wise and worthy purpose.

But you ask me, on what moral and religious knowledge is founded? I answer, on that which is the basis of every other branch of knowledge—BELIEF.

I have endeavoured to make it clear to you, that even philosophical and mathematical knowledge inevitably rest on certain principles which are received only by an intuitive conviction, or natural faith; and that historical knowledge depends solely on that peculiar kind of belief, which is produced by testimony. I might have gone further—I might have reminded you, that your circumstances preclude the greater part of you from making philosophical experiments for yourselves, and from engaging in those mathematical calculations, on which depends the certainty of astronomical science. You are compelled to take for granted the results of other men's inquiries and labours; and you do not hesitate to believe those results to be true. And why? Because you rely on the testimony of books,—on the testimony of your lecturers. A few moments' thought will convince you, that almost all the knowledge you possess, of nature and philosophy, as well as of geography and history, rests on no other basis whatsoever, than faith in testimony.

PARAPHRASE OF DEUT. XXII, 1—10.

Give ear, O Heav'ns! thou outstretch'd Earth, attend!
Let all creation mute observance lend;
Jehovah speaks! who gave all nature birth:
Listen, O Heavens! and give attention, Earth!

As fruitful showers my doctrine shall be found;
My speech like dews that gently bless the ground;
As vernal rain upon the springing grass,
My saving word, my quickening truth shall pass.

Because I publish to the world abroad
The mighty works, the glorious name of God,
Ascribe ye greatness to our God, and bring
An offering meet to earth's Eternal King.

He is the Rock, and perfect is his way,
His power and glory Earth and Heaven display;
A God of truth, no sin can bear his sight:
Pure are his ways, and all his judgments right.

But man! frail man! corrupted is his race,
Perverse and crooked still the ways they trace;
Thro' every age the same dark spots will show
His nature sinful—and its produce, woe.

And is it thus that ye requite the Lord!
Thus, foolish people, trampling on his word!
Thus heedless, scorn a Father's gracious voice,
Nor make his glorious name your grateful choice!

His people still the Lord his portion calls,
And Jacob's lot to HIM apportioned falls,
He found him helpless 'midst the howling wild,
He saw—he pitied—brought him forth, and smil'd.

He led him on, instructed thro' his youth,
Guided his path, and fed his soul with truth,
Watched o'er his way with love that never slept,
And, exquisitely kind, his Israel kept.

THE PRAYING FAMILY SAFE.

POLANUS speaks of a town in the territory of Bern, in Switzerland, consisting of ninety houses, all of which were destroyed by an earthquake, except the half of one house, where the master of the family was earnestly praying with his wife and children to God. Thus was the promise fulfilled; "He shall call upon me, and I will answer him; I will be with him in trouble, I will deliver him and honour him."

IDLENESS.

It is storied of a Spanish woman, who went about begging from door to door, with her three children, that when a French merchant offered to take the eldest of them into his service, she haughtily refused, assigning for a reason, that she did not know but her son might yet live to be king of Spain! We fear such wayward ideas of dignity are not uncommon; and the habits superinduced by them prove they are no less pernicious. They who always brood over the golden egg, neglect that which is more precious than gold, even if it could be multiplied according to their most sanguine anticipations; for what so prolific a mother of vice as idleness? "Among all those, who, within my knowledge," says Dwight, "have appeared to become sincerely penitent and reformed, I recollect only a single lazy man; and this man became industrious from the moment of his apparent, and, I doubt not, real conversion. The sinful prostitution of his time and talents, and his ready admission of temptations to his heart, fix the idler in a regular hostility against all the promises and threatenings of Religion: while his self-conceit makes him too wise, willingly to receive wisdom even from God." We would therefore strenuously enforce it on parents especially, to maintain amongst their children a system of active employment, as one of the best means of rendering them upright and honourable in society. The peculiar bias of their respective dispositions being ascertained, let them have something to do according with it—something to keep the body or mind incessantly at work—something which will make relaxation itself an exercise, and exercise a relaxation. Discipline like this cannot fail of realizing its own reward; whereas the neglect of it must inevitably bring along with it a proportionate degree of punishment. Whatever the Spanish lady might have imagined, we may be quite sure, beggary afforded no greater facilities to the enthronement of her first-born drone, than labour could have done. "The hand of the diligent shall bear rule, but the slothful shall be under tribute."

THE HAPPY LIFE.

BY SIR HENRY WOTTON.

How happy is he bred and taught,
That serveth not another's will,
Whose armour is his honest thought,
And simple truth his utmost skill.

Whose passions not his masters are,
Whose soul is still prepar'd for death;
Unty'd unto the world by care
Of public fame, or private breath.

Who envies none that change doth raise,
Nor vice hath ever understood;
How deepest wounds are giv'n by praise;
Nor rules of state, but rules of good.

Who hath his life from rumours freed;
Whose conscience is his sure retreat;
Whose state can neither flatt'rers feed,
Nor ruin make oppressors great.

Who God doth late and early pray,
More of his grace than gifts to send;
And entertains the harmless day
With a religious book or friend.

This man is freed from servile bands,
Of hope to rise or fear to fall;
Lord of himself, tho' not of lands,
And having nothing, yet hath all.

THE EARTHENWARE MAN'S PRAYER.

Related by the father of the Rev. Mr. Gregg, late of St. Alban's, in whose barn the poor old man had lodged for the night, and where he was overheard the next morning.

"Thank God I have slept soundly to-night, and so this morning am pure and well. Thank God my ass is well, and has ate a good lock of hay, her crust of bread, and drank half a pail of water. God bless us both to-day! and give me strength to walk afoot, that I may'nt be forced to get up and ride the poor beast, for she has luggage enough already. God Almighty send that folks may want my wares, and that somebody may take a liking to my ballads; and them as can afford it may give me some victuals and drink, that I may not give my ballads to servants for it, when their masters and mistresses don't know on't. God Almighty lead us through green lanes, where my poor ass may light of good cropping, without running into other folks' grass or corn; and that, poor thing, she mayn't tumble down and hurt herself, and break my wares. And God Almighty incline somebody to give me a night's lodging; and that I may have a dry barn, and some barley straw too (an't please God); I am grown old now, and a hard bed is worse than it used to be. But I don't distrust God Almighty's care, for he never let me want in my life; and so his great and holy name be praised now and evermore. Amen."

Is there not in all this an honest simplicity and grateful confidence in God, suited to humble and instruct thousands with more spiritual attainments and advantages?

INTERPRETATION OF WORDS OR ACTIONS.

There is no word or action but may be taken with two hands, either with the right hand of charitable construction, or the sinister hand of malice and suspicion; and all things succeed as they are taken. I have known evil actions, well taken, pass for either indifferent or commendable. Contrarily, a good speech or action, ill taken, scarce allowed for indifferent, an indifferent one censured for evil, an evil one for notorious. So favour makes virtues of vices; and suspicion makes virtues faults, and faults crimes. Of the two, I had rather my right hand should offend: it is safer offending on the better part. To construe an evil action well, is but a pleasing and profitable deceit of myself; but to misconstrue a good thing is a treble wrong—to myself, the action, and the author. If no good sense can be made of a deed or speech, let the blame light upon the author. If a good interpretation may be given, and I choose a worse, let me be as much censured of others, as that new conceit is punishment to myself.—Bp. Hall.

-FIELDS, OR NORTHAMPTON, CHAPEL.

IELDS CHAPEL, of which the Engraving is a t representation, was originally built for a re, and called the PANTHEON. It was opened for musement of the public, in the year 1770, at a l when London was favoured with but very few elical clergymen. The devoted Mr. Romaine en labouring as Rector of St. Ann's Blackfriars, hing to large congregations, with only about or four clerical colleagues of a like serious spirit whole metropolis.

Pantheon, not receiving the public patronage, to pay the speculators, was closed, and offered to ; when it was taken by several friends of religion, tted up as a place of worship, and called Northn Chapel, being on the estate of the Earl of ampton. Divine service was commenced in it, privately, on Saturday evening, July 5, 1777, on occasion the late Rev. John Ryland, of Northn, officiated, by license under the Toleration Act. e following day, it was publicly opened by the Herbert Jones and the Rev. William Taylor, two men of the Church of England, whom the prors had engaged as the stated ministers.

ssrs. Jones and Taylor, not having come to terms he Rev. W. Sellon, minister of St. James' Clerkenin which parish Northampton Chapel is situated, prosecuted by that gentleman, and obliged to tinue their services after about eighteen months.

igious worship having been suspended for some , the Countess of Huntingdon opened it as her l, on Sunday, March 28, 1779. The Liturgy of Church of England was continued, and the Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Haweis, one of the Counchaplains, officiated. In a short time, Mr. Haweis ited before the Spiritual Court, and obliged to tinue his services, which he did not resume till the decease of the minister of the parish at that

The Rev. C. Glascott, another of Lady Huntingchaplains, was also introduced to officiate, but on obliged to withdraw by the same unchristian . The Rev. Thomas Wills, another chaplain of the Countess, visited Spa-Fields Chapel, as it was called, a little time after it had been opened by Mr. Haweis; and from the withdrawment of Messrs. Haweis and Glascott, he was the principal clergyman who officiated; but expecting similar treatment, he and Mr. Taylor, before mentioned, determined on seceding from the Church of England, rather than the Gospel should be excluded from this place, in which a very large congregation had been gathered.

This chapel is a circular building, with a handsome, neatly-ornamented dome; it has two galleries all round, one above the other, supported by small columns about six inches in diameter, which give it a light appearance. The chapel will accommodate about 3,000 persons; and, from its first opening, it has generally been well attended, supplied chiefly, till within a few years, by ministers of the Establishment.

Spa-Fields Chapel deserves especial notice, on account of its connection with the formation and progress of the various great religious Institutions which are the glory of our country and the means of blessing to the world. The London Missionary Society, the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Religious Tract Society, the Home Missionary Society, and others of a kindred spirit, have always found in this congregation generous friends and supporters. Connected with this chapel is a Charity School for clothing and educating 35 boys and 25 girls; a Sunday School; a Benevolent Society for the Relief of the Sick; a Maternal Society for the relief of Lying-in Women; and a Juvenile Society for assisting Females; besides several others for the support of aged and infirm Ministers of the Countess's connection, and in aid of the Missionary Societies.

PRINCIPLES AND GOVERNMENT OF LADY HUNTINGDON'S CONNECTION.

The following extract from a reply to an inquiry as to the principles of this Society, will be interesting to many: it was written in 1796.

"We desire to be esteemed as the members of Christ's Catholic and Apostolic church, and essentially one with the church of England, of which we regard ourselves as living members. And though, as the Church of England is now governed, we are driven to a mode of ordaining ministers, and maintaining societies not amenable to what we think abused episcopal jurisdiction; yet our own mode of government and regulating our congregations will probably be allowed essentially episcopal. With us a few preside. The doctrines we subscribe (for we require subscription), and what is better, they are always truly preached by us, are those of the Church of England, in the literal and grammatical sense. Nor is the liturgy of the Church of England performed more devoutly in any church, nor the Scriptures better read, for the edifying of the people, as those who attend our Sunday congregations can witness."

ADDRESS OF JOSEPH JOHN GURNEY, ESQ.

TO THE MECHANICS OF MANCHESTER.

(Concluded from p. 230.)

What then can be more irrational than to refuse to receive religious knowledge—because it rests, in part, on the same foundation? The doctrines of Christianity are founded on facts; and those facts are the subject of testimony. And we are sure that the facts are true, and therefore that the doctrines resting on them are divine, because the testimony in question is at once abundant in quantity, and sound in character. I cannot now enter on a detailed account of the historical evidence, by which are proved the genuineness of the Holy Scriptures, and the reality of the events which are there recorded. But since you are accustomed to receive the testimony of your lecturers with implicit confidence, I beg of you on the present occasion to accept my own. I believe I am an honest man, and I have long been accustomed to investigate the subject. I am ready, then, to declare in your presence—in the presence of all Manchester—of all England—of all Europe—nay of the whole world—that there are no facts whatsoever within the whole range of ancient history, of the truth of which we have more abundant and conclusive evidence, than of the Death and Resurrection of Jesus Christ. Indeed I know of no ancient events on record, of which the evidence is nearly so much accumulated, or nearly so strong.

The resurrection of Jesus Christ, together with the miracles of Christ himself and his apostles, are our sure vouchers that the Author of Nature, who can alone suspend or reverse its order, was the Author of Christianity. These miracles bore no resemblance to the false pretences of the fanatical and superstitious. They were, for the most part, immediate in their operation; wrought in public; utterly incapable of being accounted for by second causes: and of so broad and conspicuous a character, that no deliberate eye-witness could be deceived respecting them. Nor were they in point of fact improbable events. Who will deny that the dark and degraded condition of mankind required an outward revelation of the Divine will? Who will not allow that miracles are a suitable test—the most suitable one which we can imagine—by which the truth of such a revelation might be established? Who does not perceive, that under such circumstances, it was credible—nay highly probable—that God would permit or ordain them?

True indeed it is, that they were directly opposed to the course of nature. Otherwise they would not have been miracles—they would not have answered their purpose. But is it not equally opposed to the known order of things, that an honest man, in bearing witness to these facts, should tell a deliberate lie? Is it not yet more at variance with that order, that he should persevere in that lie through life, and sacrifice every worldly advantage, and even life itself, to the support of it? It is not a far greater breach of every established probability, that twelve men, of the same virtuous character, should all tell this lie—should all persevere in it without deviation—should all sacrifice their property, their peace, and their reputation—should all be willing to lay down their lives, in its maintenance? Is it not, lastly, an actual moral impossibility, that this lie, accompanied by no temporal force and no worldly advantage, but by every species of loss and affliction, should triumph over the prejudices of the Jew and the favourite habits of the Gentile—should be accepted and believed by myriads—and should finally enthrone itself over the whole Roman empire?

But the truth of Christianity does not depend solely on those miraculous facts to which we have now adverted. Prophecy duly fulfilled is itself a miracle, equally applicable to the proof of religion; and the Scriptures abound in predictions, of which history has already recorded the fulfilment. The events by which many of them have been fulfilled—for example, the spread of Christianity, and the dispersion of the Jews—are familiar to us all.

I wish I could persuade you to examine the prophecies scattered over the Old Testament, and meeting us at every point in a most unartificial manner, respecting the Messiah who was to come. I wish I could induce you to compare them with the history of his birth, life, character, ministry, death, resurrection, and ascension, contained in the four Gospels. You would find the prophecy and the history tally with a marvellous precision; and since the Old Testament can be proved to have been written long before the coming of Christ, you would find yourselves in possession of an evidence of which no cavils could deprive you, that Christianity is God's religion. When a lock and a key are well fitted, a fair presumption arises, even though they be of a simple character, that they were made for each other. If they are complex in their form, that presumption is considerably strengthened. But if the lock is composed of such strange and curious parts as to baffle the skill even of a Manchester mechanic—if it is absolutely novel and peculiar, differing from every thing which was ever before seen in the world—if no key in the universe will enter it, except one; and by that one it is so easily and exactly fitted, that a child may open it—then indeed are we absolutely certain that the lock and the key were made by the same master-hand, and truly belong to each other. No less curiously diversified—no less hidden from the wisdom of man—no less novel and peculiar—are the prophecies contained in the Old Testament, respecting Jesus Christ. No less easy—no less exact—is the manner in which they are fitted by the Gospel history! Who then can doubt that God was the Author of these predictions—of the events by which they were fulfilled—and of the religion with which they are both inseparably connected?

But independently of all outward testimony, and of the evidence of miracles and prophecy, Christianity proclaims its own divine origin, by its character and its effects. This is a subject on which we appeal to your native good sense, to your practical feelings, to your personal experience. Christianity is the religion of truth, because it is the religion of holiness. In vain will the student search the pages of Plato and Aristotle—in vain will he examine the conversations of Socrates—in vain will he dive into the disputations of Cicero—for a moral system so complete, so simple, and so efficacious, as that of the Bible. Where within the whole range of uninspired ethics, shall we find any thing worthy even of a moment's comparison with that divine saying, in which the whole law of God is comprehended and concentrated? "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

Accustomed as many of you are, in your factories, to the printing of a thousand beautiful patterns on your cottons and your muslins, you will be at no loss to understand and appreciate a memorable saying of Lord Bacon's—that truth differs from goodness, only as the seal or dye differs from its print; for that TRUTH PRINTS GOODNESS.

In the goodness of Christianity—in the purity of its law—in its display of the holy attributes of God—in its revelation of an awful and glorious eternity—in its actual efficiency for the moral restoration of our species—in the perfect fitness of that Saviour whom it unfolds to our spiritual need as sinners in the sight of God—we have abundant experimental proof of its truth and divine origin. Time forbids a farther discussion of the subject. Allow me then, in conclusion, to bear my deliberate and solemn testimony, in the words of an apostle—and may that testimony, by whomsoever borne, satisfy all understandings, and imbue all hearts! May it be upheld and exalted on every side! May it surmount all opposition—may it pervade the whole land—may it spread from pole to pole—may it be as unrestrained and diffusive as the winds of heaven!—"OTHER FOUNDATION CAN NO MAN LAY THAN THAT IS LAID, WHICH IS JESUS CHRIST."

My address is now concluded. I thank you for your kind and serious attention. I heartily bid you farewell; and may the blessing of the Lord Almighty rest abundantly on the Mechanics of Manchester!

CHRISTMAS HYMN FOR MDCCCXXXII.

Arise, my soul, from sin's dark pris'n!
Jesus, thy sun, on thee has ris'n.
Wake from thy long captivity,
Christ is born to ransom thee.
Hark! the herald-angels sing
Glory to our Infant King.

He comes! the lov'd and only Son
Hath left his Father's radiant throne.
Ten thousand years were wrapt in night—
He comes, who said, "Let there be light!"
Hark! the herald-angels sing, &c.

Lo! he veils in mortal clay
Th' effulgence of his Deity.
See, it bursts in glory through Emmanuel! God our Saviour view!
Hark! the herald-angels sing, &c.

All hail! the dawning eastern Sun!
Thy giant race thou hast begun.
We hail Thee! Source of life and light,
The chaser of thy people's night.
Hark! the herald-angels sing, &c.

The seraphs hush their harps to hear
That name—transfix'd with love and fear—
Jesus! redeeming by his blood
His people from their cursed load.
Hark! the herald-angels sing, &c.

He, ev'n thy Saviour, saith to thee,
"Surely I come: have faith in me."
"Amen! ev'n so, Lord Jesus, come,
And take thy child in mercy home."
Then shall heaven's high arches ring,
Glory, glory to our King!

THE CHRISTIAN DIRECTORY,

A Guide to Daily Walking with God, for Young Persons. By Thomas Timpson, Author of "Church History through all Ages," &c. 18mo. pp. 180. James Dinnis, 62, Paternoster Row.

A little work has lately appeared with the above title, which we think promises to be very useful to young Christians. To a large class of these such a summary of Christian doctrine and practice must be particularly so, because it contains in a few pages, concise directions for their guide in that most important of all subjects, daily communion with God. Its cheapness will, we hope, place it in the hands of many who could not afford to purchase more expensive works; and the deep tone of its spirituality will, we doubt not, communicate something of its own character to the hearts of those who use it for their guide. To raise young Christians to eminence, is evidently the aim of the worthy Author: but not to that eminence which is dangerous from its height. His desire is to render them eminent in holiness, and in the fear of the Lord; and we think the method is judicious, which he has adopted to promote this end: we therefore cordially recommend it to our readers. We subjoin from his table of contents, the list of chapters into which the work is divided. I. Address to Young Christians. II. Evidences of Christianity. III. The Gospel method of Salvation. IV. Catechism of Christianity. V. Guide to Prayer. VI. Guide to the Lord's Supper. VII. Daily Self-Examination. VIII. Daily Resolutions. IX. Divine Promises for every day. X. Personal Hymns. XI. Chronological Index to the Bible.

"THIS ONE JESUS."

THE following is quoted in Mr. Green's "Reminiscences," as a fine stroke of satire given by the Rev. Robert Hall at Cambridge, when expounding that part of the Acts of the Apostles which refers to Festus's declaration of Paul's case to Agrippa; "but had certain questions against him of their own superstitions, and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive." "Observe the contemptuous manner in which this Festus speaks of the Saviour of the world, as 'one Jesus' which was dead. It is very remarkable, that this one Festus owes all his celebrity to this one Jesus; for had it not been for this one Jesus, we should never have heard any thing of this one Festus; for his name is never mentioned in profane history."

CHRISTIAN PRACTICE AND PRINCIPLE.—A real Christian will be more just, sober, and charitable than other men, though he will not rest for salvation on justice, sobriety, or charity.—Mrs. H. More.

INFLUENCE OF A SENSE OF GOD'S PRESENCE.—"There is nothing that so powerfully governs the heart, that so strongly excites us to wise and reasonable actions, as a true sense of God's presence."

PREFACE.

HEBREW PROPHETS, illumined by Divine inspiration, beheld the future condition of the world under the reign of Messiah. Contemplating the glories of that blissful period of intelligence and purity, they declared that "wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of the times;" and the Conductors of the CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE, believing this infallible oracle of God, have continued their humble labours to the close of the second year, in the hope of contributing thus to advance the kingdom of Christ, promoting at the same time the moral strength and sure prosperity of their country. And if numerous testimonies of Clergymen of the established church, and of Ministers of other Christian denominations in different parts of the empire, as to the utility of their efforts, are to be regarded, they have the happiness of having in a great measure succeeded in their endeavours.

Protestant Christianity, in all its distinguishing principles, as sealed with the blood of martyrs, has uniformly been inculcated in the CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE. Its Conductors hold with sacred regard — the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures — the mystery of the adorable Trinity — the divinity of the Son of God — his all-sufficient atonement for the sins of the whole world — sanctification by the Holy Spirit — and the necessity of personal holiness to qualify for a blissful immortality, — as the essentials of the glorious Gospel of the blessed God: and these life-giving doctrines ever form the glory of their honoured Periodical. They can hold no fellowship with the principles of Socinian infidelity: and while they hope ever to cherish the most tender solicitude for those who are included in the church of Rome, they will feel it their sacred duty fearlessly to expose and denounce the unscriptural delusions, the pernicious practices, and the persecuting spirit of that antichristian communion.

Patriotism and philanthropy also constitute chief essentials of their religion. All the great institutions, therefore, which adorn our age and bless our country, have their cordial approbation and support. The Bible Society, Missionary Societies, School, Temperance, Sailors', District Visiting, and Christian Instruction Societies, have an auxiliary in the CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE, which identifies its labours with those divinely-benevolent associations, as is abundantly proved by the pages of this volume. Christian Instruction Societies especially have been materially aided by it; not only by its scriptural contents for evangelical information, but in some instances in their funds, by profits on its weekly sale — a plan which is seriously recommended to their different district committees.

In this year's volume will be found, a considerable share of information on the present State of Religion, both at home and abroad; with a selection of papers on Church History, calculated to awaken the inquiries of young Christians to this important but neglected subject; letters on Education; and a large collection of original Essays, critical, experimental, and practical, which it is hoped will tend, under the Divine blessing, to enlighten the minds and confirm the faith of the growing disciples of Christ.

Sincere and grateful acknowledgments are tendered to the many contributors to the CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE, for their valuable communications, by which its pages have been enriched, and a continuance of their various favours is respectfully solicited.

Divine Providence, in the eventful period which is closing, has removed to their eternal reward several of the most eminent servants of Christ; whose virtues adorned our British Israel, and whose labours have blessed the world: in reviewing the past, therefore, every Christian must pray the great Head of the Church, that by his good Spirit the bright example of such devoted disciples as HILL, and WILBERFORCE, and MORE, and WINTER, and HUGHES, may animate their survivors to follow in the same path, with an increased measure of zeal, expecting from God the honour of double usefulness.

Liberty has been gloriously extended during the past year; and by the truly politic and philanthropic measure of the Abolition of Colonial Slavery, a foul stigma has been wiped from the national character of Britain. In accomplishing this noble work, the cause has been aided by the pages of the CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE: and its Conductors hail the early extinction of Slavery in America as a natural consequence, leading to the establishment of universal freedom, preparatory to the blessedness of a Christian Millennium!

Education advancing with still accelerating progress, the appetite for intellectual food has increased in the same proportion. The extraordinary thirst for knowledge which is prevailing must be promptly met, and provision must be made for its sufficient supply. This is demanded of the elders of the church, alike by duty, interest, and religion; requiring that the spirit of investigation, especially in the youthful mind, should be directed in a safe course, and guided in that channel which leads to goodness, to greatness, and to God. Infidelity is rampant in our crowded cities, fostering the corrupt propensities of human nature: and unless its deadly progress be arrested by the omnipotent energy of divine truth, and its baneful principles neutralized by the diffusion of Christian doctrine — that renovating instrument of the Eternal Spirit — irreligion and immorality, disloyalty and anarchy, will assuredly prevail, prostrating the far-famed national glory of Great Britain!

In anticipating the new year, arrangements have been made for the CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE to maintain uncompromising hostility against every anti-social principle, and to execute its high objects in a still more engaging and efficient manner. Every reader will thereby render a service to the cause of religion and his country, by employing his influence in extending its circulation. Besides several series of original Essays on the most important branches of intellectual and religious improvement — Scripture Illustrations and Antiquities, Notices of the most useful new Publications, and the advancement of Christian Knowledge — it is intended to give particular attention to the State and Progress of Religion throughout all the nations of the world, the Revival and Progress of Religion in Britain, the importance of Bible Classes, Young Men's Societies, Sunday School Teachers' Associations, and every branch of instruction calculated to render the CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE a register of "whatsoever things are venerable, just, pure, lovely, and of good report," and still more interesting to its increasing readers, — a suitable, worthy, and welcome Companion to every Christian Family in the British Empire!

THE CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE.

No. 31. PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY. January 5, 1833

GREAT BRITAIN RECOMMENDING THE BIBLE TO ALL THE NATIONS OF THE WORLD.

DISSEMINATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

Great Britain, as every intelligent observer perceives, has arrived at a most momentous crisis of her history. The year upon which we have entered, portends events of the most extraordinary character. A Revolution, different from every thing in former times, is evidently taking place. Thanks to Divine Providence, "whose kingdom ruleth over all," it is not like any of those recorded in the annals of our country: it is being accomplished without the unsheathing of the murderous sword, and without the bloodshed and miseries of a civil war. It is a revolution effected by means of increasing knowledge.

Enlightened public opinion is prevailing, and carrying forward our national affairs in a progress which no coalition of human power can possibly arrest. We exceedingly rejoice in the prospect: because, by the revealed decree of Heaven, it is declared, "knowledge shall be increased" to regenerate and sanctify a depraved world.

We are painfully aware, that much of the knowledge which is now influencing the public mind, is not sanctified by the fear of God. We cannot but regret to perceive, that many of the "master-minds" in our extraordinary times, make no pretensions to piety, and decline the direct advocacy or patronage of revealed religion and pure Christianity. But we also know, and we exult in the inspiring fact, that no learned society exists in our land, nor has any individual arisen, respectable for learning and purity of moral principle, having the temerity to impeach the integrity, or to question the divinity of the Bible.

Scepticism itself also must admit, that notwithstanding the licentiousness of many of our fellow countrymen, and the virulent attacks that are made upon every religious institution, Christian truth has sanctified much of the general mass of the knowledge which is diffused through the nation; and amid all the speculations of the age, no man of liberal education and sound morals, has possessed hardihood sufficient to lead him seriously to attack the Holy Scriptures.

Believers in Divine Revelation should not omit to regard this most remarkable of all the "signs of the times" in which we live. Every one, even those who are looked upon as practical infidels, have been constrained to bow to public opinion in favour of the Bible; and to do homage to the sacred volume, as the inspired word of God.

Great Britain, as represented in our engraving, influenced, in a great degree, by the Holy Spirit, under whose gracious inspiration that blessed word of everlasting life was written, by means of its various religious Institutions is recommending the Bible to all the nations of the world. We are not insensible of the commanding majesty of Great Britain, by means of her naval and military power, supported by her amazing resources of wealth. Divine Providence has exalted and magnified our nation in these respects: but still more, and in a far higher degree, by granting her the ability, and by giving her the disposition, to recommend the Bible to all nations; translated into their various languages by the devoted and persevering labours of her pious missionaries, and offered to them gratuitously, as the divinely-appointed means of their eternal salvation.

Although we cannot particularize every step towards the elevation of Great Britain to this privileged condition, to be prepared to recommend the blessed word of everlasting life to all the nations of the earth, we cannot omit to notice the translation of the Holy Scriptures into the Chinese language, used, it is believed, by nearly one-third of the human family. The ancient, populous, and ingenious, but degraded and idolatrous nation of China, engaged in preparing for us an article of our food which we use every day, has peculiar claims upon Christians, for sympathy, prayer, and religious exertion to make them acquainted with the Gospel of Christ. Two independent translations of the Bible into the Chinese language have been completed; doubtless under the merciful direction of a gracious Providence. And though Christian Missionaries are at present excluded from the empires of China and Japan, at least in their character of evangelical preachers, the Holy Scriptures are prepared for the reception of that numerous people; they are beginning to manifest dissatisfaction with their debasing idolatries; and a spirit of inquiry after truth is arising in those regions. Dr. Carey of the Baptist, and Dr. Morison of the London, Missionary Society, must be reckoned among the most honoured of mankind, in having so greatly contributed by their astonishing labours to enlighten and bless that immense portion of the children of men.

"The British and Foreign Bible Society," as the special means of recommending the Holy Scriptures to all nations, must not be forgotten in this place. But as, in the third Number of the Christian's Penny Magazine, we gave an account of that most noble Institution, our observations here must be few. In the "Brief View of the Plan and Operations" of that Society, published in 1831, ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-THREE translations of the Holy Scriptures are specified, a recapitulation of which is as follows:

Reprints	44
Re-translations	5
Languages and Dialects, in which the Scriptures had never been printed before the Institution of the Bible Society	72
New Translations commenced or completed	32
	153

"The Brief View" adds—"Thus it hath pleased Almighty God to unite the hearts of many, 'as the heart of one man,' in the sacred and delightful work of publishing to 'every nation under heaven,' those Scriptures which His divine providence has wonderfully preserved till now uncorrupted, amidst the convulsions and infidelity of a sinful world.

"The progress and success of the British and Foreign Bible Society during a period of twenty-seven years; the simultaneous anxiety to possess the Sacred Records, among nations remotely distant from each other; and the remarkable and unexpected openings which have appeared, from time to time, for translating the Scriptures into languages and dialects hitherto unknown even to the most learned, are facts so plainly beyond the bounds of human foresight and experience, that it would be presumption to ascribe these propitious circumstances, and the blessings which have followed the circulation of the Scriptures, to any other than to the overruling wisdom and love of Him 'who ordereth all things in heaven and in earth,' and who is 'wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working.'

"After presenting this Sketch of the Institution, any thing like a formal appeal, on its behalf, to the liberality of the Public, would be superfluous. When it is considered that the Society is engaged in promoting the translation, printing, or distribution of the Scriptures, or portions of them, in more than One Hundred and Fifty different languages and dialects; that it stands pledged to aid numerous Bible Societies already formed and still forming in different parts of the world; and that, after issuing more than Seven Millions of copies of the Scriptures, and expending upwards of One Million Seven Hundred Thousand Pounds sterling, the demands upon its services appear rather to have increased than diminished;—when these circumstances, together with the simplicity of its principle, the catholicism of its spirit, and the extent of its proceedings, are deliberately considered, no additional motive can be wanted to stimulate the inhabitants of the British Empire to promote, by all means in their power, the interests of an Institution, which promises, if liberally and extensively supported, to become a blessing to the whole earth."

IMMORALITY OF CHRISTIANS INJURIOUS TO THE HEATHEN.

OUR missionaries are singularly impeded in their benevolent efforts to convert the heathen to Christianity. Most of their difficulty arises from the immorality of those who profess the religion of Christ. The following is lamentably applicable even to our times. Bartholomew de Las Casas, after giving Charles V a picture of the cruelties committed in the New World by the Spaniards—"This," says he, "is the reason why the Indians are so ready to make their mock at the God we worship, and persist so obstinately in their incredulity. They are persuaded that the God of the Christians is the most evil of all gods,—because the Christians, who worship him, are the most wicked and corrupt of all mankind!"

IF we entered the world with the same feelings with which we enter for the first time into a theatre, and if the curtain of the universe were to be rapidly drawn up; struck with the grandeur of every thing we saw, we should not be capable of refusing our homage to the Eternal Power which had prepared for us such a spectacle. But who thinks of marvelling at what he has seen for fifty years? What multitudes are there, who, wholly occupied with the care of obtaining subsistence, have no time for speculation! The rise of the sun is only that which calls them to toil, and the finest night in all its softness is mute to them, or tells them only that it is the hour of repose.

CHRISTIAN EMPLOYMENTS.—We have employments assigned to us for every circumstance in life. When we are alone, we have our thoughts to watch; in the family, our tempers; in company, our tongues.—Mrs. H. More.

THE FIRST DAY OF THE FIRST MONTH.

"Future events are known to God alone." To what a series of events, novel, calamitous, or beneficial, affecting Great Britain, its families, or individuals, the First Day of the First Month may introduce, the most intelligent and penetrating observer cannot foresee, and dares not presume to foretel. "Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world," Acts xv, 18: it is our business, therefore, with cheerful confidence, to pursue our daily duties, assured that our Almighty Father "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will," Eph. i, 10; and that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Rom. viii, 28.

What will be the events of this year? is an inquiry proposed by many, and revolving in the minds of more. Every reflecting person seems anticipating changes and improvements: while not a few are agitated with fears and gloomy forebodings. Not only the sagacious politician, the speculating merchant, and the Christian philanthropist; but the humble mechanic and the agricultural labourer are considering "the signs of the times," and looking for occurrences new, unheard-of, and surprising.

With "the march of intellect," there is an advance of Providence. The Kingdom of God is approaching; and He appears, by passing events, to be preparing to illustrate speedily his own most gracious predictions recorded in Holy Scripture. Narrow-minded prejudice and unprincipled oppression shall be overthrown by the increase of divine light and truth. Our favoured country shall still more fully be blest. Our God declares, "I will also make thy officers peace, and thy exactors righteousness. Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders: but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise." Isai. lx, 17, 18. The Lord hasten it in his good time!

"The First Day of the First Month" is mentioned three several times in the Holy Scriptures; and the events to which they immediately led were of the most instructive character: on each of them we will make a few observations.

1. In connection with Noah's preservation from the Deluge. "And it came to pass, in the six hundredth and first year, in the first month, the first day of the month, the waters were dried up from the earth: and Noah removed the covering of the ark, and looked, and behold the face of the ground was dry." Gen. viii, 1—3.

Noah, the venerable patriarch, beheld, on this first day of the first month, the superficies of an uninhabited world, purged from the pollutions of the degenerate and the corrupt millions of his fellow-creatures. Whether in all its primitive beauty and loveliness, and its natural richness, it appeared to delight the holy man, we cannot tell. Whether the widely scattered fragments of ancient buildings, and the wretched remains of their infidel inhabitants, were visible, we do not know. But an immensely extended surface, noiseless, unoccupied, and void, presented itself to his astonished view—inducing him to reflect on the dreadful indignation of God, and to anticipate scenes and events of which he could previously form no conception. The earth must again be peopled: generations, through successive ages, must spring from him: but what would be their character, habits, principles, and final destiny, that new beginning of time could not make manifest, nor could his privileged intercourse with God lead him clearly to determine, without the special revelation and inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

2. In relation to the commencement of the Levitical Dispensations. "On the first day of the first month shalt thou set up the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation. Thus did Moses: according to all that the Lord commanded him, so did he." Exod. xi, 2—6.

This was the establishment of that dispensation of grace and mercy, which, though only a shadow of good things to come, designed to be superseded by the Gospel economy, exhibited to the thousands of Israel, in the daily sacrifice, "the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world." Extensive and pernicious was the defection, which, from time to time, appeared among the Israelitish nation; yet, we have every reason to believe, that tens of thousands were, from generation to generation, brought to a sense of their guilt and to true repentance, looking through the burnt-offerings and oblations, the incense and priesthood, to behold the "Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world."

3. In connection with Hezekiah's reformation of religion. "Now they began on the first day of the first month to sanctify, and on the eighth day of the month came they to the porch of the Lord: so they sanctified the house of the Lord in eight days; and in the sixteenth day of the first month they made an end, and they went in to Hezekiah the king," &c. 2 Chron. xxix, 17, 18, &c.

Without considering the awful declension and defection of the nation from Divine institutions, during several preceding reigns, in the last of which the temple of God had been shut up by the impious Ahaz—and the extent of the reformation which was effected by Hezekiah, in restoring the appointed services of religion, and in circulating the Holy Scriptures (see Prov. xxv, 1)—the wondrous and beneficial consequences of this first day of the first month cannot be fully appreciated. The inspired writer describes this reformation and some of its blessed effects, 2 Chron. xxix, xxx, xxxi, xxxii, which appears to be one of the most instructive parts of sacred history; and we have reason to conclude, that this good work was accompanied by the conversion, the sanctification, and the salvation of multitudes. "And in every work," &c. 2 Chr. xxxi, 21.

Nothing precisely similar to either of these remarkable events can possibly take place on the first day of the first month of 1833, in Great Britain: but who is prepared to say that this will not introduce a new era, unspeakably interesting to our country, and beneficial to the whole world? Something unusual "the signs of the times" seem to warrant us to expect, and loudly call upon every Christian to be earnest in calling upon God for the communication of the blessings of the everlasting covenant. Every pious patriot will feel it his happiness to pray—"God be merciful unto us, and bless us," &c. Psal. lxvii, 1, 2.

"Shine mighty God, on Britain shine,
With beams of heavenly grace;
Reveal thy power through all our coasts,
And show thy smiling face."

THE CROWN OF THORNS.

"The mockery of reed, and robe, and crown,
Of plaited thorns, upon his temples press'd."

There still exists a plant in Palestine, known among botanists by the name of the "thorn of Christ," supposed to be the shrub which afforded the crown worn by our Saviour at his crucifixion. It has many small sharp prickles well adapted to give pain, and as the leaves greatly resemble those of ivy, it is not improbable that the enemies of Messiah chose it, from its similarity to the plant with which emperors and generals were accustomed to be crowned; and thence that there might be calumny, insult, and derision, meditated in the very act of punishment.—Russel's Palestine.

MORAL STATISTICS OF CLERKENWELL.

Mr. Editor,

Your interesting papers on the Statistics of different parts of the kingdom have been the origin of the following desultory notices of that part of the metropolis in which I live. They will, I think, be found to contain some remarks of interest to your Readers in general, and would prove very acceptable to your numerous friends in the parish to which they relate.

Clerkenwell consists of the united parishes of St. James's and St. John's, the former of which, since the building of the new church in it under the present commission, is divided into the districts of St. James's and St. Mark's, to which will be added the Battle-bridge district, when the church now building there is completed. The population of the whole parish, by the last census, is 47,634 souls—a number sufficient to form one of our first rate county towns, as Oxford, Exeter, Leicester, or Nottingham.

Means of Religious Instruction.—The following is the existing provision for the religious instruction of this vast multitude.

The Establishment has the churches of St. James, St. John, and St. Mark, with St. James's Chapel of Ease, Pentonville	4
Independent.—Claremont Chapel, and Rawstorne Street Chapel	2
Calvinistic Methodist.—Spa Fields Chapel	1
Baptist Chapel in Goswell Road	1
Wesleyan Chapel in Wilderness Row	1
Scots Church in Chadwell Street	1
Friends' Meeting House in St. John Street	1
	11

To these will shortly be added the new church at Battle-bridge, and an Independent chapel in St. John Street.

Five of these places of worship are large, and fully attended: the others are much smaller: and estimating them as accommodating about 1,500 each, which perhaps is high, they will give room for something more than a third of the population.

An evangelical ministry has been established in the parish church for the last thirty years. The inhabitants have the privilege of electing their own minister: and the writer well remembers the violent struggle which took place at the period alluded to, which ended in the election of that venerable servant of God, the Rev. Henry Foster, though strenuous efforts were made for a length of time afterwards to remove him. Upon his death, the contest was again renewed; but the present vicar, the Rev. T. Sheppard, was elected notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the adverse party; and it is not likely that the scenes of commotion which disgraced the parish at the time referred to, will be again repeated. The new church of St. Mark is favoured with the ministry of the Rev. T. Mortimer, and is regularly crowded with a very large and attentive congregation.

Claremont Chapel has a very large congregation, under the pastoral care of the Rev. J. Blackburn, the zealous secretary of the Christian Instruction Society. This institution, to which every Christian must wish great success, without ostentation, is efficiently labouring, especially in this parish, in the cause of the Gospel. The lectures of this Society to Mechanics are calculated to be of the very highest service to the class for which they are principally intended, and by the great ability displayed in them they are worthy the attention of all.

The Calvinistic Methodist Chapel is that known by the name of Spa Fields Chapel, and is in the Countess of Huntingdon's connection. Nearly all the churches and chapels in the parish have Sunday schools attached to them; and we may estimate the number of children receiving religious instruction in this manner at about 1,500.

Observance of the Sabbath.—Religion may be expected to flourish or decline, in proportion to the regard or neglect of the Lord's day. Though efforts have been occasionally made by the parish officers to promote a stricter observance of the Sabbath, much remains to be accomplished under this head. We still see many shops opened on the Lord's day morning; and though the alehouses and liquor shops are kept closed during the time of Divine service, there is undoubtedly a considerable number of the worthless sheltered in them all the day: news-venders also display their attractive placards; and of late tobacco-shops are opening in every neighbourhood, and set all regard to the Sabbath at defiance, as far as they dare. But the most open violation of the day of rest is by the omnibuses and stage coaches, and every other description of carriages, in the New Road, which are rattling up and down from morning till night, to the great annoyance and danger of those who are going to or from Divine worship, and to the scandal of any place professing a regard to the fourth commandment.

Prisons.—In this parish are two of the county prisons, the "House of Correction," and the "New Prison, Clerkenwell;" in the former of which are sometimes crowded no less than one thousand prisoners, either under sentence or for trial; and between the two, an average of upwards of that number of offenders against the laws of their country are at all times to be found. The want of classification in these receptacles of the vicious, and especially the little attention paid to their religious instruction, sufficiently accounts for the lamentable fact, that the general effect of imprisonment is, not the reformation of the offender, but the confirmation of his character in villany, and the destruction of all hope of future amendment. What a degrading picture of human nature is presented by a prison! How are we to account for the great bulk of offenders against the laws? It is not true that they are driven to their crimes by poverty; a man of sound principles, however poor, will still be honest:—nor even by ignorance; for no one is so ignorant as not to know the difference between mine and thine. The only true solution of the fact is given in the indictment upon which they are tried—that they "had not the fear of God before their eyes, and were moved by the instigation of the devil."

In this parish also the quarter sessions for the county are held, on Clerkenwell Green. The building has an eminently beautiful front, and calls up in the mind a feeling of regret, that so handsome a structure should be devoted to the investigation of crime, and the punishment of the lawless and profligate.

The Theatre.—A survey of the moral condition of any place possessing a theatre, must be very imperfect without a notice of its influence upon the inhabitants. Sadler's Wells in this parish is, I believe, the oldest theatre in or near London, and is conducted so respectably as to merit being considered one of the best of those establishments. It is not my design to trespass upon your columns with a dissertation on the stage; but I must mention one fact in illustration of the influence of the theatre—a fact easily verifiable by any one who perambulates London with his eyes open. It is, that wherever a theatre is established, in its immediate neighbourhood is to be found a colony of those wretched beings, who, while they call loudly for our compassion, cannot but excite our abhorrence and disgust. First corrupted and degraded by man, they take a tenfold and terrible vengeance for the wrongs they have suffered, by spreading in every direction the most loathsome of all bodily diseases, and a degree of mental corruption infinitely more appalling. To the theatre these miserable outcasts look as a principal means of support, in its neighbourhood they are invariably settled, and to it they seem to be as necessary adjuncts as the stage itself or any of its trappings. This fact, independent of all other considerations, renders the playhouse a heavy curse to the neighbourhood in which it is established.

I fear the foregoing remarks will not be thought very flattering by my fellow-parishioners; upon reviewing them, however, I think they contain only what truth and justice demand. Nothing can be farther from my intention than to represent Clerkenwell as inferior in its moral condition to the rest of London: indeed I think the parish would gain much in comparison with many others. The staple trade is watch making; and the inhabitants are undoubtedly entitled to a high character for industry; while every part of the world in which a watch is found will bear testimony to the ingenuity and superior excellence of their workmanship. There is a Savings Bank in the parish, to which a multitude of its prudent inhabitants continually resort; and on the Sabbath, most of the places of worship are filled with hearers, respectable in appearance and attentive in their deportment. It cannot be denied, however, that there is still abundant room for the labours of the Christian Philanthropist, and a loud call in the parish for increased exertions in the cause of truth and virtue.

The chief topographical curiosity in the parish, is the "New River Head,"—the fountain-head of that wonderful system of hydraulics by which the greater part of London is supplied with the purest water that is used by its inhabitants. May it soon be equally famous for an abundant supply of the "water of life," that every virtue may spring up and bear fruit in it a hundredfold, and that throughout its whole extent true piety may "grow as the lily, and cast forth its roots as Lebanon."

TRANSMIGRATION OF SOULS.

The doctrine taught by Pythagoras and embodied into the Pagan religion, that the soul of man, never dying, tenanted new-born bodies in succession, was, with all its high colourings, and however adorned with all the imagery of poetic fiction, as the bard's inventive mind disposed, but a corruption of the Christian Resurrection. Notwithstanding the fabulous embellishments and romantic exaggeration of the philosopher and his sociales, the doctrine of the resurrection shines forth in all the glory of uncorrupted truth, and forms that immoveable foundation on which Christianity has been founded;—it is, of a truth, that rock on which a house if built cannot be overthrown, though the wind and seas rise up against it. It has been universally acknowledged from all periods of the world; and were it not preserved in the sacred volume, and stamped with the attestation of the Most High, yet even then we have a glorious hope of immortality implanted within us, never to be eradicated, to which the dying agonies of each infidel adds a confirmation, which no violence can shake, or sophistry gainsay.

"None is good but God; nothing is good without God; heaven would be nothing without him; earth with him would be made the beginning of heaven."

OBSERVATIONS ON THE INFANT SCHOOL SYSTEM.

It is very seldom that circumstances are favourable to an entire and faithful statement of the advantages or disadvantages attending the system of infant schools, because the subject is seldom expatiated upon, except in sermons, or books designedly intended to gain the contributions of the charitable in order to support these institutions. It is, however, the wish of the writer of these remarks, who has had the benefit of observation of several infant schools during several years, to state as impartially as possible the impression made upon his mind, both respecting the benefits and the disadvantages attending the system. Disadvantages, he conceives, unquestionably attach to it; and as in most other systems of human invention, cannot wholly be avoided; while at the same time the benefits immensely preponderate. He will endeavour to state both of them separately. His observation will have respect to circumstances as they are, not as they might become upon improvement.

Among the disadvantages resulting from the circumstances respecting infant schools as they now exist may be reckoned one, that the persons who propose themselves for the office of masters and mistresses are generally not sufficiently informed, or rather educated, themselves, to admit of their occupying the situation with the greatest advantage to the children. When the age of children in an infant school is considered, which is from two to seven years old, that age the most important of all others to the future habits and moral character of the children, it will be acknowledged that the teachers ought to be persons of the best common sense, who have themselves imbibed habits of propriety of every kind, who are well informed upon the subject of education, who are aware of the dangers to be avoided, and of the good to be aimed at. Here however I must acknowledge, that, as far as my observations go, such persons are rarely found among the teachers of infant schools. They are not unfrequently enthusiastic, self-opinionated, and impeded by all the disadvantages of ignorance. Yet the salary paid them (seldom less than 100*l.* per annum) ought assuredly to secure persons well educated and trained to the office of instructors. It has been ascertained as a fact, that the majority of persons thus employed at present have been mechanics of some kind or other, who, finding business not answer, have undergone six weeks or two months' training at some central school, and thenceforward commence a labour, which requires perhaps more than any other an intelligent mind, much knowledge of the human heart, and an acquaintance with the sentiments of the best writers on education. With all the native conceit of ignorance, the teachers of infant schools are generally impatient of any suggestion from others. I have known instances, in which intelligent visitors have ceased to advise, from very discouragement itself: and upon a change of the master being suggested, it has been replied, that it is a doubt whether a better could be obtained. Hence the masters have been permitted to go on in a noisy, inefficacious mode, out of despair of amending the preceptor, or of exchanging him for a better.

The preceding remarks will be deemed important by each reader, in proportion as he understands the value of proper qualifications in the teacher of an infant school in respect to the moral and intellectual welfare of the children.

Another disadvantage attendant upon infant schools is, that the system itself does not provide for the learning to read of the children, although in many schools a portion of the day, both in the morning and afternoon, is devoted to the work of teaching reading and spelling, and which is conducted generally in a separate room, or in a part of the room not otherwise occupied. The method of teaching the letters and of teaching reading is very nearly that of the old system of the "school for children."

The advantages of an infant school are numerous, and are sufficient to counterbalance every defect.

1. The children are thereby removed out of the way of their parents during five or six hours every day, at a very moderate expense; the parents, and especially the mother, being at liberty to pursue any avocation, or to attend to her domestic duties.

2. Habits of cleanliness are promoted among the children at that age at which they are likely to become durable; it being an universal requirement of these institutions, that the children come with clean hands and faces, with hair neatly combed but not curled, with clean and mended clothes, &c.

3. The writer cannot profess himself to be one of those who have formed high expectations from the intellectual culture to be expected from these institutions. The lessons indeed themselves exhibit a great array of various learning—arithmetical tables, poetical quotations, grammar, geography, and even geometry! It is important to remark, that the lessons are almost universally sung or chaunted. The writer has often made the following experiment. Having heard the children chaunt, without hesitation, and all together, the Pence Table or the Time Table—such as, 60 seconds make a minute, 60 minutes one hour, 24 hours one day, 7 days one week, 4 weeks one month, 12 months one year, 365 days one year—has desired the teacher to bring to him the three or four of the children of both sexes whom he considered to be the cleverest and best taught in the school. He has then asked them separately, how many days in the year, or weeks in a month, or minutes in an hour, and he has almost always found, that when dissociated from the chaunt, and from the rest of the particulars of the table, and from the order of the table, the children gave a false answer. He suspects that almost all the knowledge apparently possessed by the children in an infant school is of a similarly doubtful nature. Still he thinks good results are to be anticipated from the questioning of the children in the history and doctrines and precepts of the scriptures, which is part of the system, and which, if kept up and persevered in with variety of questions, may be very useful. Still how much depends upon the teachers! He once went into an infant school when the master was talking to the children about Naomi the leper! The benefit of the tuition in an infant school is, that it exercises the faculties of the children, trains the perception, and facilitates their improvement when they are removed to the national schools, which ought not to be deferred in any instance after the seventh year of a child's age.

4. A considerable benefit may be anticipated from the religious part of the system. Religion, in persons of all ages, is more a matter of the affections than of the intellect: or, as it was said by Pascal, one of the purest and most exalted of human beings, the truths of religion descend not through the intellect into the heart, but ascend from the heart into the understanding. Still the affections must be regulated by knowledge, and knowledge must be instilled into the mind; yet where it is done as in an infant school, not by catechising, or by statements and proofs, but in the most categorical way imaginable, the ideas being simply suggested to the imagination, the affections, it is hoped, will be excited in minds that have not yet learned to doubt or to demur. The following is the mode usually adopted. "Who took children to his arms? The children unitedly exclaim, Jesus. Q. Where is Jesus now? A. In heaven. Q. Can Jesus see little children? A. Yes. Q. Will he hear them if they pray to him? Will he pardon their sins if they daily request it? Does God see you by night and by day? Does God hear every word I speak? Does God know my thoughts? What does God do when he hears us say a bad word or think a bad thought? A. He writes them in his book."

These, and a variety of similar questions, respecting prayer, the duties whereby the sabbath-day is to be observed, &c. are calculated to impress the mind with those principles of religion, the presence of God, and the duties by which he is honoured and served (that is to say, the principles of religion from whence good conduct flows), at a time when the mind is most susceptible. The benefits of the system in this respect are inestimable.

Another benefit is, that the mechanical part of the system is calculated to keep the children attentive. The changes of posture are frequent. Now they stamp their feet—they point—they bow—stoop—speak low or loud—clap their hands—and mimic every idea by gestures. Their lessons are games, and games they like to play at. They combine exercise of body with exercise of mind. They have relaxation at proper intervals. Public examinations delight them; and, what is of importance, they delight their parents. Hence the children are generally happy: their countenances exchange that complaining expression so obvious in the children of the poor, for one of cheerfulness. The system also brings the poor and the wealthy more into contact than they would otherwise be. The poor see that their richer neighbours care for them: the wealthy learn that the poor are grateful. The clergyman has an opportunity of calling the parents together to address them after every public examination: the parents gladly attend. Hence an additional tie is instituted between the pastor and the poor. When the children are removed to the parochial schools, they are better adapted to enter upon the instructions they receive there; and above all, their minds are imbued with the early knowledge and fear of God. In a word, the benefit of the system is rather to be sought for in the cultivation of the heart and of good habits, than in the communication of knowledge to the understanding. Yet, again I remark, how much depends upon the master and the mistress!

PASTOR.

The writer of the preceding observations would also point out one lamentable defect attendant upon the infant school system, in the books out of which the teachers select the various lessons for the children. These books are generally written by some infant school master! and, strange to say, he has never known an infant schoolmaster who did not contrive to gratify his propensity for writing, and even for poetry! by composing lessons himself; and in most infant schools he believes the master teaches lessons of "his own composing." Would that some one qualified would take upon him to write or to revise the books alluded to! Let them be examined, and they will be found very often to contain things grossly ridiculous or unintelligible, bad rhymes, or that universal evil of rhyming, the use of a word in an unusual sense in consequence of the necessity of finding some word that jingles in sound with the preceding. The books for infant schools ought to be written by the profoundest philosophers and scholars of the age, for they alone are able to write lessons adapted to the understanding of the infant mind. Nothing above their power to comprehend, nothing that misrepresents the real nature of things, nothing that discourages by its harshness of sentiment or of sound, ought to be presented to the memory or understanding of infants. Throughout each succeeding period of life similar rules ought to be observed. The lessons also ought to be connected, and as a whole calculated to furnish a complete initiatory view of the subjects to which they relate.

As a proof of the state of things in infant schools, the writer will relate two facts.

1. As a member of a committee of an infant school, he witnessed a person offering himself as a master. He had been a mechanic. Every third word he spoke, or nearly so, manifested his ignorance of the vernacular language. Yet, in enumerating his qualifications, he himself stated that he could write poetry. He was accepted, and his poetical productions soon appeared in the school in the shape of lessons!

2. In an infant school he one day visited, a skylight was left open, and a shower coming on, the rain fell upon the heads of some of the children. "There," said the master, "you are such naughty boys for making a noise, that the rain is coming on you through the windows." He who could be guilty of such an error in his mode of teaching, proclaimed himself capable of repeating the error whenever occasion occurred.

It was, however, the too usual error in the education of young children, in giving them false representations of causes and effects, and facts in general, whereby their inquisitive minds, which would learn truth if not perverted, are discouraged, since they find that their own perceptions are thus contradicted; and it is feared by the writer that such instances conduce to the habit of falsehood!

[We cannot fully coincide in all the sentiments of our esteemed Clerical correspondent, in his paper on Infant Schools; but we insert it, in the hope it may be the means of advancing them to perfection.—Ed.]

ON THE EXISTENCE OF MISERY AND EVIL.

The existence of evil and its natural consequent misery in the world, has ever been and continues to be the grand question in theological and sceptical controversy. But on such a subject we may say with Dr. Young, "Those things which our hands can grasp, our understanding cannot comprehend; why then deny to the Deity himself the privilege of being one amidst that multitude of mysteries he has made. Without these trials, we might indeed have been what the world terms happy, the passive subjects of a series of agreeable sensations; but we could not have had the delights of conscience; we could not have felt what it is to be magnanimous, to have the toil, the combat, and the victory; to exult that we have something within us which is superior, not to danger only, but which can vanquish even pleasure itself."

AFFLICTION THE TEST OF VIRTUE.

In those eventful instances of life, when our energies mental as well as corporeal are put to trial, when it is requisite that every manly feeling should be called into action, and each quality of the mind displayed in its true light, nothing is more calculated to inspire us with becoming resolution than a well-grounded principle of virtue, sufficiently strong to spurn the allurements of vice, and able to detect the tinsel of their temptations. "Virtue shines brightest in affliction's night;" and as the sun-rays beam forth with heightened splendor from the passing cloud, and shine in livelier lustre when the tempest has subsided; so is the man exalted in the view of us his colleagues in this turbulent world, who weathers the storms of adversity with honour, and fronts the malicious fickleness of fortune heroically and intrepidly.

MY MOTHER.

BY MRS. J. H. ELMES.

And is she gone, and is she bless'd,
And has she enter'd on her rest,
By her dear Saviour now caress'd—
My Mother?

Doth she now bow before the throne,
Ascribing praise to him alone
Who did for all her sins atone—
My Mother?

Is she now tasting heavenly joys,
Feeding on bliss which ne'er alloys,
Superior far to earthly toys—
My Mother?

Is she now cloth'd in raiment white,
And is her faith now turn'd to sight,
And has the Lord become her light—
My Mother?

From all distress and sorrow free,
Doth she admire the mystery
And worship the great One in Three—
My Mother?

Doth she now live on angels' food,
Where nothing evil can obtrude,
Or cause a moment's interlude—
My Mother?

Doth she now range the heavenly plain,
Where love and peace shall ever reign,
And has our loss become her gain—
My Mother?

Shall we then weep and mourn, repine,
Because above she drinks new wine
Where her Immanuel's glories shine—
My Mother?

And has she pass'd that conquer'd foe,
That tyrant which alarms us so;
The way all mortal flesh must go—
My Mother?

Then can we wish her back? Oh no!
She's now secure from care or woe,
With Abr'am and with Isaac too!
My Mother.

Esteem'd by all who knew her worth
While her lov'd presence blest this earth,
Reflecting forth a second birth—
My Mother.

Her's was the silent humble walk,
Which far exceeds all noisy talk,
Looking and hast'ning to the mark—
My Mother.

Sincere in friendship, gentle and refin'd,
A parent tender, loving, mild, and kind,
Possessing all that could delight the mind—
My Mother.

In many a heart thy mem'ry yet shall live,
And many a tributary tear receive;
All that affection now has power to give,
My Mother.

Yes, thou wert dear:—fain would I linger long,
Recount thy virtues in my feeble song:
Those joyous scenes are past, and thou art gone,
My Mother!

"As the brazen serpent was only like a serpent, without its venom; so Christ was in the likeness of sinfulness, without sin."

NEW YEAR'S COUNSEL TO THE YOUNG.

"Wisdom is the principal thing: therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting, get understanding." Prov. vi, 7. "Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister; and call understanding thy kinswoman." Chap. vii, 4. "If thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding: if thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures; then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God: for the Lord giveth wisdom: out of his mouth cometh understanding." Chap. ii, 3—6.

NEW YEAR'S COUNSEL IMPROVED.

O wisdom! thou treasure divine!
The brightness of Cherubs[*] on high,
Thy riches! how shall they be mine?
Descend from thy source in the sky!

Wise sages and prophets of old,
Enrich'd with the beams of thy light,
Proclaim it more precious than gold,
And Youth to obtain it invite.

It flows from the Father of lights;
It comes through the Saviour, my Lord:
To seek it, my days and my nights
I'll give to the searching his Word.

Hail! Spirit of wisdom and love,
Illumine and quicken my mind;
Replenish my soul from above,
And give me thy knowledge to find.

Prepare me to publish thy praise;
O make my example to shine:
Thy service shall have all my days;
I'll then live eternally thine.

Shine forth, O thou Spirit of grace;
With wisdom enrich all the earth:
Show Jesus to man's guilty race,
And grant them a heavenly birth.

THE CHRISTIAN PILGRIM.

"For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. There remaineth therefore a rest for the people of God."—Heb. xiii, 14; iv, 9.

Earth hath not an abiding spot!
How can there be a happy lot,
Where change or sorrow reigns?
Then, Christian, this our motto be,
The rest which God prepares for me
In Heaven alone remains."

Through this dark world our passage lies,
Our Father's home is in the skies,
This Earth is not our rest;
The end, oh! may we keep in view,
And glad our Father's pleasure do,
If with His presence blest.

Yet peace, and even joy shall shine,
A peace most pure, a joy divine,
Which Earth can never give,
Shall gently cheer us on our way;
For we shall hear our Father say,
"Seek ye my face, and live."

May we more deeply live to Thee!
Nor rest until thy face we see,
Above Earth's changeful round;
When in thy presence we adore,
For ever! and for evermore!
Then, perfect rest is found.

THE CHRISTIAN'S ANNUAL DIRECTORY THROUGH THE WHOLE BIBLE,

With Tables for the Reading of Every Day; by which the whole of the Holy Scriptures may be read in a year. Designed to induce Young Persons to adopt the practice of Reading through the Bible annually, and to pursue it through life. By T. Timpson. Seventh Edition.

This little Tract contains much information in its several Tables: the first of which embraces the order of every day's reading throughout the year. Table II, contains a list of the Historical Books, with the names of their authors, the place where written, the period which each includes, its commencement and close, and the date of the year before the advent of Christ when each history terminates. Table III. The Doctrinal Books of the Bible. Table IV. The Prophetical Books. Table V. The Devotional Books. Table VI. The Moral Books of the Bible, all on the same plan. The Tables are preceded by a useful Essay on the importance of reading the whole Bible. We think we are doing a service to our readers to recommend this cheap little Manual, as a Key to the Bible, adapted to lie within its cover for daily reference. This would form a cheap but valuable present to the young and the poor for the New Year.

EPITAPH AT WELWYN, HERTFORDSHIRE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NIGHT THOUGHTS.

If fond of what is rare, attend!
Here lies an honest man,
Of perfect piety,
Of lamb-like patience,
My friend, James Barker,
To whom I pay this mean
Memorial for what deserves the greatest.
An example
Which shone through all
The clouds of fortune;
Illustrious in low estate;
The lesson and reproach of those above him.
To lay this little stone
Is my ambition,
While others rear
The polish'd marbles of the great.
Vain Pomp!
A turf o'er virtue charms us more.

E. Y. 1749.

"Think ye, sinners that hear me!" said one, "if God poured out His wrath on Christ, because iniquity was imputed to him, what will he say to you?"

"As when the eye is fixed on the sun it loses sight of the stars; so when the sinfulness of sin, as committed against God, is seen, all minor considerations are lost sight of."

REGENT'S TOWN, SIERRA LEONE.

NOTICES OF SIERRA LEONE.

SIERRA LEONE is the principal settlement in Western Africa belonging to any civilized power. Free Town, Sierra Leone, is memorable, as the place where Sir John Hawkins, in 1562, dishonoured the British name and character, by commencing that most criminal of all atrocities, the NEGRO SLAVE TRADE!

We shall give some notices of the British colony at Sierra Leone; and then present our readers with a sketch of the history of that crying and abominable traffic, which commenced its bloody enormities in that place.

Sierra Leone was colonized in 1787, by the British Government sending over from London about four hundred free negroes, with sixty whites, mostly women of bad character. Captain Thomson, of the navy, who took them over, obtained for their use a grant of land, about twenty miles square, from King Tom, the neighbouring chief; and which was confirmed afterwards by Naimbanna, the king of the country. This first attempt failed: and his Majesty granted the land to the "Sierra Leone Company," who, October 19, 1791, held their first meeting. As this "Company" contemplated the diffusion of Christianity, and by this means the civilization of Africa, we will record here the names of the committee of directors, who were then chosen. "Henry Thornton, Esq. M. P. chairman; Philip Sansom, Esq. deputy chairman; Sir Charles Middleton, Bart.; Sir George Young, Knt.; William Wilberforce, Esq. M. P.; Rev. Thomas Clarkson, A. M.; Joseph Hardcastle, Esq.; Granville Sharp, Esq.; John Kingston, Esq: Samuel Parker, Esq.; William Sandford, Esq.; Vickeris Taylor, Esq.; George Wolfe, Esq."[*]

Every thing having been settled on equitable and benevolent principles, the ships sailed with the British colonists, to whom, in March 1792, were added 1131 blacks from Nova Scotia. The building of Free Town was commenced, consisting of about 400 houses, in nine streets, besides a church, and several public buildings. Before the end of two years, order, industry, and prosperity, appeared in such a degree, that the fame of this colony spread all along the whole western coast of Africa, and embassies of the most friendly character were received from kings and princes several hundred miles distant. Several of the native chiefs began to cherish and manifest such confidence in the British, as to send their children to the colony, to be instructed in reading, writing, and accounts, and also to be brought up in the Christian religion.

All these delightful prospects, however, were nearly destroyed by the hostile fleet of the French Convention, in September 1794. The French burnt all the public buildings, and the houses of the Europeans, after having plundered them of every thing valuable. Measures were taken by the directors to restore the colony, and to prevent all such calamities in future.

The Church Missionary Society commenced a Mission in 1804, by sending two German Missionaries to the Soosoo country and the Bullom shore, in the vicinity of Sierra Leone; and in 1806 they sent two more of these devoted men. Progressive advancement was made at Sierra Leone; and the Rev. Melville Horne, having returned from this colony, where he had been chaplain, preached for the Church Missionary Society the annual sermon in 1811; when, by his eloquent and faithful appeal, the directors were led to relinquish their former stations, and to determine on establishing a Mission at Sierra Leone.

Regent's Town, a part of which is represented in our engraving, is a principal station of the Society: it was commenced in 1813, when the negroes were in a most deplorable condition. In 1816, the assistant secretary of the Society, then on a visit to the Mission in Western Africa, found about 1100 liberated negroes collected at this spot. Many of them had only just been landed from slave ships, and were in a state of the most extreme wretchedness: but those who had been there for some time were improving, and the Governor had them employed in building a church, hoping soon to be favoured with a resident missionary. This desire of the governor was met in the appointment of Mr. W. Johnson, who had lately arrived for that field of labour.

The report of the Society states, "On looking narrowly into the actual condition of the people entrusted to his care, Mr. Johnson felt great discouragement. Natives of twenty-two different nations were here collected together, and were in a state of continual hostility. When clothing was given to them, they would sell it or throw it away. All the blessings of the marriage state and of female purity appeared to be quite unknown. In some huts, ten of them were crowded together; and in others, even fifteen and twenty: many of them were ghastly as skeletons; six or eight sometimes died in one day; and only six infants were born during the year. Superstition, in various forms, tyrannized over their minds; many devil's houses sprung up; and all placed their security in wearing greegrees (or charms). Some would live in the woods; and others subsisted by thieving and plunder."

Mr. Johnson says, "Though I had heard much of the misery of the Heathen, I never could have imagined that they were so cruelly treated by slave dealers, as I found the poor creatures liberated from slave vessels had been." This devoted man gave himself to his arduous work, and soon saw the fruit of his toil. In 1820, the Report says, "A church had been building, which, when finished, contained 500. It was filled as soon as opened. It was then enlarged for 700; and was again filled as soon as opened. One Sunday the Governor, seeing no room in the church, said, 'We must take one end of the church down, and make it as large again.' This was done, and it now contains 1300 people; and, for two years, it has been crowded every Sunday three times a day."

Mr. Johnson, with Messrs. Flood and Palmer, was removed from his earthly scene of operations by a fatal disease, which visited the colony; at which period the population amounted to about 17,000; and which was still increasing by the addition of negroes liberated from the slave ships. Three towns alone contained 5643 inhabitants, exclusive of the military. Schools have been established in the colony; in which were about 3000 scholars, including all ages, and both sexes.

The Report of the Church Missionary Society for 1831, says of the West Africa Mission, "There were at the various settlements, according to the last Returns, 674 communicants; a number somewhat less than that of the preceding year." It adds concerning this difficult field of labour—"Taking all things into consideration—the ignorant state of the people when they arrive—the habits to which they were for many years addicted—the frequent removals of those to whom they were accustomed as their spiritual pastors, either by death or by other providential circumstances—MUCH, VERY MUCH, has already been done in the colony, by the instrumentality of those frail men that have been employed in the work."

The Schools at this period contained 1351 boys, 778 girls, 231 youths and adults: total, 2360.

Besides this colony of Great Britain, it ought also to be remembered, that the American Colonization Society has founded the colony of Siberia, on the same coast; and that at several places along the western coast to the Cape of Good Hope, there are stations belonging to the Moravian, Wesleyan, Scottish, and London Missionary Societies; all of which are more or less the means of benefiting that deeply injured country with the increasing blessings of civilization and pure Christianity.

In our next Number we shall lay before our Readers some "Historical Notices of Negro Slavery," to which we claim their serious attention. It is high time for all who "profess and call themselves Christians" to bestir themselves on a question which involves the dearest interests of millions of the human race; and to lend their aid in removing from our beloved country a load of guilt, which must eventually bring down the vengeance of Him whose ears are ever open to the cry of the destitute and oppressed.

IMMORALITY OF THE WEST INDIAN SLAVE-HOLDERS.

NEGRO SLAVERY, we rejoice to perceive, is engaging the virtuous part of the British community to utter loudly an expression of abhorrence of its enormous criminality. We cannot stain our pages with a detail of the existing abominations which defile the West Indian islands; nor even hint at them, except so far as is necessary to illustrate the divinely beneficial labours of the injured Christian missionaries.

Dr. Williamson, a medical gentleman, who resided some years in Jamaica, says, "The manner in which the Sabbath is spent will appear extraordinary, and very contradictory to the duties inculcated on that day. A great market is kept by the negroes, which is in truth also a market for the whites. The merchants attend at their stores and counting-houses. On that day prayers are read; and it would be gratifying to add, that the subject was attended to. With deep regret it has often fallen to my lot to see the service of the church of England carelessly run through by the reverend members of its own community, and as indifferently attended to. It were perhaps well, in a comparative point of view, if that were all; for not only is the crime of inattention prevalent, but contempt for religion is openly avowed by a great proportion of the white population; and it is only shaken, in some instances, by irreligious conduct on the part of the whites. Those negroes who have conformed to Christianity by getting baptized, are in general exemplary, and much improved in the principles of morality. The propriety of matrimony is seldom impressed upon their minds by the clergy, or any white person. Indeed, the latter themselves show the example of a libidinous course of life which can scarcely be justified among savages."

Dr. Williamson's testimony is abundantly confirmed by the most respectable and unimpeachable witnesses: but for the information of our poorer readers, we particularly recommend the Anti-Slavery Reporter for 1831 and 1832. These cheap Tracts, drawn up with the greatest care and ability, by the most intelligent persons, detail atrocities, cruelties, and impurities, characterizing the white inhabitants of the West Indies, sufficient to rouse the indignation of every virtuous mind, against a system so utterly repugnant to every principle of Christianity, of righteousness, and of national policy.

Seduction is considered no crime in Jamaica by the people generally! We cannot refrain from giving one illustration of this: "An authentic statement of the baptism of illegitimate and legitimate free children in the different parishes in the island, in 1830, as taken from the registry in the bishop's office in Spanish Town (see p. 24). The account is confined to the free, there being no slave children that can be called legitimate! Legitimate, 380; Illegitimate, 958; Total, 1,338." Anti-Slavery Reporter, Feb. 1832.

In such a state of society, can any one be surprised at the treatment the Missionaries have recently received in Jamaica? This system of West Indian Slavery must necessarily be a curse to our country; and its final extinction ought to be effected immediately, and the most enlarged opportunities possible afforded to Christian Missionaries, to make known to the injured and oppressed the unsearchable riches of Christ for their salvation, as the means of averting the just displeasure of Almighty God!

A CHRISTIAN SURVEY OF THE WORLD AS INFLUENCED BY GREAT BRITAIN.

Let us look at the actual possessions of Great Britain. In territorial extent, the British empire, inferior only to that of Russia, is almost three times as vast as that of imperial Rome. The area of the Roman empire is estimated by Gibbon at 1,600,000 square miles. That of the British is supposed to be 4,457,000 miles. Russia covers a thinly-peopled surface of nearly 6,000,000. Next, let us compare the population of the ancient and modern empires. That of ancient Rome is probably under-rated at 120,000,000, it may have amounted to 150,000,000, or 170,000,000. Among the existing empires, China, with its (supposed) 175,000,000, takes the lead. And which is second? Great Britain. In less than a hundred years, the population included in the British islands and its dependencies, has, by the great expansion of our Indian empire, risen from 13,000,000, to upwards of 150,000,000, or more than a sixth portion of the human race. If to this we add the empire of the American republic, which has grown up within the last half century from the British colonies, and by which the English language, laws, and religion, are being diffused over the Western world, we shall have an area of 6,500,000 square miles, under the dominant influence of one nation—a nation originally confined to a small island in the German Ocean—with an aggregate population of not less than 165,000,000 of souls! So mighty and rapid a change has no parallel in history!

A hundred years ago, the inhabitants of all the countries subject to Christian governments throughout the world, probably did not exceed 200,000,000; and of these, the far greater part were subject to the powers acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope. The Mohammedan powers of Turkey, Persia, and India, still ranked among the most potent arbiters of the destinies of the human race. India, and, with the insignificant exception of a few maritime settlements, all Asia, were under Mohammedan or Pagan sway. All the religious missions in existence (the Danish mission in Southern India excepted) were in connection with the Romish church, and supported by Popish states. The Inquisition had its colonial tribunals at Goa, and Mexico, and Bogota. The only religion that was not disseminating itself, was the Protestant faith. Mark the revolution which the last thirty years has effected: how striking the contrast!

Slow depopulation and internal decay, or foreign conquest and the dismemberment of empire, have been reducing the strength, and contracting the dominion, of almost every Mohammedan and every Romish power throughout the world. The only states that have materially extended their limits, and added to their strength, are, Great Britain, the American Republic, and Russia. These three powers, one of which had no political existence, and the other two could number between them only about 28,000,000 of subjects, have now under their political sway not less than 228,000,000! If the subjects of Russia are for the most part sunk in barbarism and superstition, they are at least withdrawn from the hopeless bondage of the Romish yoke. But, besides this, the other Protestant powers of Europe, instead of about 20,000,000, have now upwards of 42,000,000 of subjects; so that, added to those which acknowledge the sceptre of Great Britain, they greatly outnumber those of all the Roman Catholic states. The latter comprised a population of about 135,000,000, including France; but France is no longer to be numbered with the kingdoms of the Popedom. Throwing it into the opposite scale, the comparison will stand thus:—

Roman Catholic States of Europe	78,500,000
Ditto of America	23,500,000
	102,000,000
Protestant States of Europe and America,	207,000,000
France	33,000,000
Russia	62,000,000
	302,000,000

Although this table will give no correct idea of the comparative prevalence of true or false religion, it speaks volumes as to the decline of the Papal supremacy, the most formidable obstacle to the spread of the Gospel. Of the 80,000,000 under the European Romish states, more than one half are under the dominion of Austria, emphatically characterised as the last crutch of the Papacy, the grand barrier of human improvement, the enemy of the best hopes of mankind.

The total number of those who profess the Romish faith, we have no correct means of estimating. The late M. Malte Brun, the French geographer, supposed them to amount to not more than 116,000,000, which seems much too low; since, although there are many Protestants, Greek Christians, and Jews, within the dominions of the Romish powers, the number of Roman Catholics in the British, Prussian, and other non-Romish states, is very considerable. The Greek Christians he estimates at 70,000,000; the Protestants, at 42,000,000; the Jews at 5,000,000, the Moslems, at 110,000,000; the Heathen at 310,000,000. These numbers are but a very rough approximation to the fact; and the total falls very short of the actual population of the globe. The lowest calculation (that of Balbi) estimates the aggregate population at nearly 750,000,000. Of these, about 390,000,000 are now subject to Christian government; about 80,000,000 to Mohammedan rulers; and about 280,000,000 to the Pagan powers. The Christian governments, to whom have been consigned almost the whole of what the Mohammedan and Pagan powers have lost, are either Protestant or Greek.

Nor is this all. Although the Romish religion maintains for the present the ascendancy in the new states of South America, they are for ever alienated from the Papal power. Their separation from Spain and Portugal has not only shorn those monarchies of all their glory, but has deprived them of the means of recovering their former rank among the states of Europe. Owing, too, to this impoverishment, and the fall of Popery in France, all the Romish missions in India, Persia, Syria, Egypt, and Africa, are upon the point of extinction, or at least in a state of utter inefficiency and decay. Everywhere an open field has been prepared for the exertions of British Christians!

The sudden reappearance of the primitive zeal for evangelizing the world, tends to fill the mind with the brightest expectations. "The languages of the East have been mastered; and those which had never before been the medium of a ray of religious truth, have been forced to speak in the words of God. Two independent versions of the Scriptures in Chinese, by Protestant missionaries, have excited the astonishment and admiration of the literati of Europe. In the instances of the Berber, the Amharic, and the Peruvian, the means by which versions of the New Testament in these languages have been obtained, are almost as extraordinary as the facts themselves. Now, unless we were to look for a second bestowment of the miraculous gift of speaking foreign tongues, it might seem but fitting, and even necessary, that the preparation of this philological apparatus, the translation of the Scriptures into these various dialects, which is but a removal of national obstacles in the way of spiritual triumphs, should precede the rich effusion of the Pentecostal spirit."

PIOUS INGENUITY TO SECURE THE POSSESSION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

A few years ago an Irishman, who had been brought by the Spirit and grace of God to see the value of the Holy Scriptures, actually copied with his own hand, in the hall of a nobleman, the whole New Testament, for his own use; which being done, the devoted servant of Christ was presented with a splendid Bible, in exchange for his own manuscript, which, we believe, is possessed by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

During the persecution of the Nonconformists, in the reign of James II, one of those zealous confessors copied out the whole Bible in short-hand, for his own use, fearing the re-establishment of Popery and the suppression of the Holy Scriptures!

Mr. Harris, a London tradesman, whose sight decayed, procured the whole New Testament, except the Book of Revelations, and also the Book of Psalms, to be written with white ink on black paper, in letters an inch long, that he might enjoy the consolations of the gospel of Christ.—See our first volume, page 219.

NOTIONS OF THE NEW ZEALANDERS,

RESPECTING DEATH AND A SEPARATE STATE.

They say, that, at the death of a chief, his soul goes to the Treaingha at the North Cape; and sometimes comes to speak to the relations left behind, in their dreams. They ask the spirit if he has seen all their departed friends, and how it fares with them: he says—"I have seen them, and they are all well." The spirits dispute and fight, plant kumeras (sweet potatoes), have abundance of provisions, &c. in the other world. When a chief dies, he becomes an atua: his relations lament over the corpse, and pray that he will make clear and straight the road, and provide a place for them. The atua comes up the ladder to the top of the Treaingha, at times; and sits, and looks toward the place where he died, to know if his relations have performed the customary ceremonies: if these have been neglected, the atua is angry. Six or seven months after the death of a chief, the body is taken up by his friends, and dressed in clean mats, his hair combed, and his head anointed with oil, and dressed up with white feathers, when they lament over it: the body is moved several times, from one place to another: at last it is put into a cave, never more to be moved; and then all their crying and ceremonies are over.

"That a man who lives in sin should be wretched is no wonder; from the same principle as God is the centre of happiness, so it is no marvel that a man who is travelling from God should find the opposite of happiness."

ON PRAYER.

Prayer is the soul's sincere desire,
  Utter'd or unexpress'd;
The motion of a hidden fire
  That trembles in the breast.

Prayer is the burthen of a sigh,
  The falling of a tear,
The upward glancing of an eye
  When none but God is near.

Prayer is the simplest form of speech
  That infant lips can try;
Prayer, the sublimest strains that reach
  The Majesty on high.

Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,
  The Christian's native air,
His watchword in the hour of death,
  He enters Heaven with prayer.

Prayer is the contrite sinner's voice
  Returning from his ways;
While angels in their song rejoice,
  And say—"Behold, he prays."

In prayer on earth the saints are one,
  In word, in deed, in mind,
When with the Father and the Son
  Sweet fellowship they find.

Nor prayer is made on earth alone:
  The Holy Spirit pleads;
And Jesus, on th' eternal throne,
  For sinners intercedes.

O, Thou, by whom we come to God,
  The Life, the Truth, the Way,
The path of prayer thyself hast trod;
  Lord, teach us how to pray!

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XII.

On Industry.

Dear Madam,

The importance to a child of industrious habits no person can doubt. Industry is the source of eminence in any pursuit; of personal and domestic comfort, and is closely connected with the principles of morality. The idle are rarely virtuous in any one particular: the habitually industrious seldom grossly immoral. The importance of attention to this subject in reference to your child is augmented by the fact, that although something like a natural turn to industry now and then meets us among mankind, yet that in the vast majority of the human race there is a native inherent and powerful disinclination to labour, whether with the body or with the mind. "Idleness," says Dr. Johnson, "is the bane of human nature" It is also plain, that by far the greatest proportion of mankind have been so imperfectly imbued with habits of industry, that they seldom do more in their several pursuits than they are obliged to do, and that, in consequence, they fail of that degree of excellence and of usefulness which might reasonably be expected from them. How many persons there are who exert themselves sufficiently to keep want from the door, and having reluctantly performed this proportion of labour, at once seek the more attractive pursuits of dissipation, or the relief of perfect indolence! In reference to the subject of religion, the effects of indolence are still more evident and pernicious. Of all the varied characters of mankind, this is one of the most hopeless. What can be expected, where the mental effort even to learn the truths of religion is detested, and the diligence in duties which it demands is still more intolerable. There are of course different degrees of indolence in different characters; but in whatever proportion it may exist, it is attended with these and a variety of other evil results. It is important therefore to the temporal and everlasting welfare of your child, that he should be a sincerely industrious man. But he is chiefly dependent upon you for the acquisition of this quality. Like every other good habit, the foundation of it must be laid very early.

The habit of early rising, to which I adverted in a former Letter, has an intimate connection with it. As soon as possible, it seems to me advisable that an infant should have also daily assigned to him little employments, suited both in duration and in difficulty to his immature powers, which he should be expected punctually to fulfil. As soon as he discovers taste, or a sense of distinction between different employments, so as to prefer one to another, let his employments correspond to his inclinations as much as possible, provided they be useful and proper. Yet whatever may be the object of his attention, let it be your invariable rule to expect him to persevere till it is performed. If you uniformly adopt this rule, if you never from the first allow him to taste the fatal pleasure of leaving one pursuit unfinished and sauntering to another, he will never even desire it. In inculcating habits of perseverance, or any other good habits, let your rule be unalterable. Let it be your law, and calmly and perseveringly expect it to be obeyed as a matter of course. Accordingly, avoid all kinds of inducements and persuasions with him to do his duty. Nothing can be more pernicious than the habit of inducing a child to do what promotes his welfare by entreaties, expostulations, promises, and rewards. There is something in our nature which is peculiarly averse to compliance under such circumstances. An intelligent child hates to be coaxed or wheedled into his duty: he would infinitely prefer to be driven to it. Both the one and the other mode may be avoided by adherence to the preceding directions. In a word, never pay a child by any means whatever for doing what is right. Be exceedingly sparing even of praise. A thirst for applause is thereby created, and this leads to vanity and all its evils and miseries. Let his reward be the quietude and the domestic peace consequent upon order, duty, and regularity. Let him grow up in the exhibition of every duty as silently as the flower expands in your garden. As he advances, let the employments you assign to him be suited to his understanding. Always let them be intelligent. Allow no kind of toys. Increase and cultivate his acquaintance with the qualities of the external world, and with the names of things. As soon as may be, give him tools. Let him have a piece of ground to cultivate. Should he exhibit a taste for drawing, let it be gratified to the utmost, and especially in drawing from nature.

With regard to literature, although I hope to offer you some observations upon it in future Letters, it is now needful to say, that no child ought ever, if possible, even to see a letter till he is seven years old. When his seventh birth-day is turned, then teach him the alphabet at one lesson, which you will readily do by keeping his attention to it for three or four hours. This was the method of the mother of the celebrated Wesleys. This was the time she chose for commencing the literary part of education. Her sentiments on this subject were precisely those of the celebrated tutor of Alexander the Great. In the life of that hero, lately published in the Family Library, you will find it stated, that Aristotle forbade attention to letters till after the first seven years, considering that those years were best employed in the establishment of perfect health and strength of body and mind, and the knowledge of the objects of the senses. To me the rule appears invaluable. Be content then that other children should be able to say their catechism and repeat hymns at three years old, which they cannot understand. Do not be moved from your rule by the popularity of some little prodigy, who is brought into the room to recite, or who can tell you all the names of the kings of England. All this is like hot-house fruit, out of season, and never palatable or useful. Be you content to wait for the slow growth of real excellence. The unhappy children to whom I allude are peculiarly liable to early death, or ill health all their lives. Not unfrequently do they turn out incurably stupid. The undiscerning lament over them, and make the sagacious observation, that those children were too clever to live in this world, or wisely moralize upon the illusory nature of earthly things. But to these results the parents themselves have unconsciously conduced. Moral habits and health, and amusements connected with them, are the only appropriate objects of attention during the first seven years of a child's life.

I am, dear Madam, &c.

Clericus.

Wise Counsel for Self-Government.—Banish all malignant and revengeful thoughts: a spirit of revenge is the very spirit of the devil; than which, nothing makes a man more like him, and nothing can be more opposite to the temper which Christianity was designed to promote. If your revenge be not satisfied, it will give you torment now; if it be, it will give you greater hereafter. None is a greater self-tormentor than a malicious and revengeful man, who turns the poison of his own temper in upon himself.—Mason on Self-Knowledge.

Human Accountability.—Every individual should bear in mind, that he is sent into this world to act a part in it: and although one may have a more splendid, and another a more obscure part assigned him, yet the actor of each is equally, is awfully accountable.—Mrs. H. More.

CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF ROMANS IX, 3.

"For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ, for my brethren," &c.

Scarcely any passage of the Holy Scriptures has been more strangely mistaken than this. Distressing in a high degree, have been the exercises of mind experienced by Christians, in the hour of temptation, in reading this verse: as if it required, on the part of believers, a willingness to endure eternal misery in a state of separation from Christ, for the sake of others.

No one surely will now suppose that it is presumptuous to make an objection to the English translation: for in reality, the improper rendering of the Greek has been the occasion of its painful misapprehension. Though not marked as such, the sentence is evidently parenthetical; which is a peculiarity in the style of the apostle Paul, and of which we have many instances in this epistle to the Romans. See chap. i, 2—13; ii, 13—15; iii, 5—8; v, 13—17; vii, 1; ix, 11. The words, "For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ," are not by any means essential to the apostle's argument in that very interesting connection; but were added, in a parenthesis, to encourage the Jews in seeking mercy after his example. (See 1 Tim. i, 12—16.) Laying aside for a moment the difficult clause, the argument of Paul will be seen in all its beauty and simplicity; while the dignity and sublimity of the sentiments, which the passage contains, perfectly accord with the most enlarged measure of Christian knowledge and charity.

Omitting that fearful clause, the section will stand thus:—"I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh; who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen." Rom. ix, 1—5. Here we behold unity, beauty, and a connected train of ideas, altogether worthy of an apostle of Christ.

That which appears to be the genuine sense of this passage, we have never seen exhibited in so striking a point of view as it is given by the judicious Dr. Dwight. In his admirable discourse on resignation, he introduces this text, as alleged by some, to prove that willingness to suffer perdition is a part of Christian resignation.—Having considered and answered the objection arising from Exod. xxxii, 31, 32, the Doctor says, "The other passage is Rom. ix, 1—3; 'I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh." Here it is supposed, that St. Paul declares himself desirous—or, at least, capable of being desirous—to suffer final perdition for the sake of rescuing his brethren, the Israelites, from their ruinous condition. But I apprehend the apostle says no such thing;—for,

"In the first place, the declaration in the Greek is not I could wish, but I wished: not ηυχοιμην, the optative mood; but ηυχομην, in the indicative. The apostle, therefore declares a fact which had taken place, not the state of his mind at the time present, nor a fact which might take place at that or any future time. I do not deny that the indicative is sometimes used for the optative, or, as it ought to be here understood, in the potential sense, to denote what could have been done, instead of what has been done. But no case of the kind is to be presumed, nor is such a meaning to be admitted, unless the general construction of a passage renders the admission necessary.

"Secondly, the admission of it here ruins the meaning of the passage altogether. It is introduced in this manner. 'I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost.' Now what is the assertion, to gain credit to which these three declarations, two of them attended with all the solemnity of an oath, were made? It is found in the following verse; 'I have great heaviness, and continual sorrow of heart.' Can it be imagined that St. Paul would think it necessary or proper to preface this assertion in so solemn a manner? Was it a matter even of surprise, that a person afflicted and persecuted as he was, should be the subject of such sorrow? Could the apostle need the aid of a triple declaration and a double oath, to make this assertion believed? And if these were not necessary, can he be supposed to have used them for such a purpose, or for any purpose whatever?

"As this cannot have been the Apostle's meaning of this passage; so, happily, that meaning is sufficiently obvious. St. Paul, it is well known, was considered by the Jews as their bitter enemy; hating their temple, worship, and nation; and as conspiring with the Gentiles to subvert all those which they esteemed their best interests. This prejudice of theirs against him was an immense evil: for it not only obstructed powerfully, and often fatally, the success of his evangelical labours among the Gentiles; but in almost all instances prevented the Jews from receiving the gospel. This evil the Apostle felt in all its force; as he teaches us on many occasions, by endeavouring earnestly to clear himself from the imputation. The present is one of those instances: and the meaning of the passage is rendered perfectly clear and highly important, when it is considered in this manner, and the propriety of the solemn preface with which it commences is fully evinced. The words rendered, 'for I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ,' ought to be included, as they plainly were intended to be, in a parenthesis. The passage truly translated in this manner, will run thus:—'I say the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost; that I have great heaviness, and continual sorrow in my heart (for I also wished myself separated from Christ), for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh.' That the Apostle had really this sorrow and heaviness for his nation, he knew would be doubted by some, and disbelieved by others. He, therefore, naturally and properly appeals to God for the reality of his love to them, and for the truth of the declaration in which it is asserted. To show his sympathy with them in their ruined state, he reminds them that he was once the subject of the same violent unbelief and alienation from Christ; and that then he earnestly chose to be what he here calls anathema, justly rendered in the margin, separated from Christ, just as they now chose it. A person once in this condition, would naturally be believed to feel deeply the concerns of such as were now in the same condition; and would therefore allege this consideration with the utmost force and propriety."—Dwight's Theology, vol. iii.

The Rev. Mr. Toplady's criticism is in accordance with Dr. Dwight; and being short, we present it to our readers. "This seemingly difficult text is rendered perfectly easy and clear,—first, by inclosing part of it in a parenthesis;—and, secondly, by attending to the tense of the verb ηυχομην, mistakenly translated, I could wish.

"'I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart (for I myself, ηυχομην, did wish to be in a state of separation from Christ), on account of my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh.' That is to say, I am deeply concerned for my unbelieving countrymen: and I the more pity and lament their enmity against Jesus, because I myself was once exactly in their situation; and I know by my own past experience, the bitterness and danger of their infidel state. Something like the speech of Dido in Virgil:—

> 'Haud ignara mali miseris succurrere disco.'"

Being not unacquainted with calamity, I have learned to succour the miserable.

KING DAVID'S CROWN OF GOLD.

We have great pleasure in endeavouring to satisfy a "Constant Reader of the Christian's Penny Magazine," by "a proper explanation," of 2 Samuel xii, 29, 30. "And David gathered all the people together, and went to Rabbah, and fought against it, and took it. And he took their king's crown from off his head (the weight whereof was a talent of gold with the precious stones), and it was set on David's head."

The weight of this crown of Hanun appears certainly to have been great: but neither the king of Ammon nor the king of Israel "needed the neck of an elephant" to wear that ornament of royalty.

"A talent of gold" is said to have been the weight of this captured jewel: probably of the same weight as the golden candlestick in the Tabernacle, Exod. xxv, 39; the value of which, according to the celebrated professor Brerewood, was 4,500*l.*; but according to bishop Cumberland, 5,076*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.* Some suppose the value of the crown is intended, and not its weight, which, according to Dr. Arbuthnot, was a little more than 113*lbs.* 10*oz.* troy, equal to about 100*lbs.* avoirdupois. Bishop Cumberland computes it at rather less, making it about 93*lbs.* Some suppose it to have been the Syriac talent, which was but the fourth part of that used by the Hebrews. Still that would make the crown weigh about 25*lbs.* Whiston, in his Notes on Josephus, who says that David wore the crown ever after, declares this talent weighed only 7*lbs.*; and if so, David or Hanun might easily carry it upon his head. But it is not necessary to suppose the talent less than the ordinary computation; we may grant that it weighed full a hundred pounds, with its precious sardonyx mentioned by Josephus.

Eastern monarchs, it is well known, were accustomed to have crowns made to set forth their splendor and magnificence, besides those which they commonly wore as their distinguishing ornament. These were immensely large, and hung up supported over their thrones of state, where they sat at their coronation, and on solemn occasions. Athenæus mentions one made of 10,000 pieces of gold, placed on the throne of Ptolemy, king of Egypt: he describes one of gold that was 24 feet in circumference: and mentions others that were 2, some 4, and others 5 feet deep.

We must not omit to remark, that the Hebrew does not require us to understand that the crown was literally taken from off the head of Hanun, and set upon the head of David: but that the royal insignia of that base monarch (see 2 Sam. x, 4) were captured by David, and afterwards used as his own jewels.

THE CHARGE.

— A DESCRIPTION OF ONE OF THE CARTOONS. —

Behold that group on yonder shore!
  Never since time its course began,
And we may add, that never more
  Such group on earth will meet again;
'Twas He who died, who burst the grave,
And whom He chose, and died to save.

They know Him, and they love Him more,
  But may not now familiar be;
He seems the same as heretofore,
  'Tis wonder all, and mystery;
He stands in majesty and grace,
But there are traits upon that face

Of recent agony and care,
  And marks upon His hands and feet,
To show the nails had pierced there,
  And prove his mortal suff'rings great:
Yet all is meek composure now:
Their hearts in adoration bow!

With hands outstretch'd, and earnest eye,
  See the belov'd Apostle press;
He seems as he could forward fly;
  All that he feels, his looks express:
Nor less attentive, close behind,
In eager gaze his friends we find.

One rather doubtful, but intent,
  Wishing, yet fearing to believe,
On him a piercing eye is bent,
  It seems to say, what, not receive
Such proofs to sight and to the mind!
Our Lord before us all must find.

But interest deepens!—Kneeling there,
  With weeping eye and anguish'd heart,
With looks almost of sad despair,
  That seem to say, "We must not part!
I will no more a traitor be,
Lord, I will bleed, and die for Thee!"

The Saviour speaks!—The voice they know,
  'Tis the same tones they oft had heard;
'Tis music, clear, and deep, and low,
  Which oft their fainting hearts had cheer'd:
Simon! it is address'd to thee,
"Say, son of Jonas, lov'st thou Me?"

What wisdom and compassion here,
  No harsh rebuke, contemptuous frown;
To him alone the words are clear,
  To none around can it be known,
If they had not before been told,
That Peter's love had been so cold.

And mark the answer? Now no more
  Self-confidence and pride are found;
Prostrate he kneels upon the shore,
  But forward still his heart can bound:
"Lord, thou my soul canst plainly see,
Thou know'st the love it bears to Thee!"

"Then feed my sheep!"—the Saviour said,
  And the same question ask'd again:
The same reply his servant made,
  What could this new inquiry mean?
It seems that Master must be sure
That Servant would backslide no more.

Poor Peter had denied Him thrice,
  And thrice the same request was ask'd;
But the third question now gave rise
  To feelings deep, on all the past;
"Lord, Thou alone dost all things know,— Thou know'st my love, and all my woe."

Then "Feed my Lambs," the Lord replied:
  This precious Charge with joy he heard,
Went forth and every foe defied,
  Nor danger, pain, nor death he fear'd,
With tenfold zeal, and tenfold love,
Until his latest hour he strove.

MONUMENTS OF ROMAN GRANDEUR.

Soon after passing Monterosi, we came to

> "Where Campagna's plain forsaken lies,
> A weary waste expanding to the skies."

It has a wild and desolate appearance, as if neither man nor beast had passed over it for years; yet the very solitude seems sublime, and more suited to the present widowed state of Rome, where she sits "the Niobe of Nations," than palaces and triumphal arches. There is but one Rome in the world, and the peculiarity of its approach strikes the eye more forcibly than the ordinary suburbs of a city; one or two ruined towers are alone to be seen, in which "the fox looks out of the window, and the thistle shakes its lonely head," yet the soil teems with luxuriance, and the very weeds have a singular fertility and grandeur of appearance, as if characteristic of the land which has been formerly the scene of so many noble and illustrious transactions. Like the awful stillness that precedes a storm, so does the solitariness around prepare the mind for Rome. After passing a few lonely posthouses, a turn in the road brought us upon the "Eternal City." Her columns, obelisks, swelling domes, and palaces, burst upon us; every spot was classic ground, and we passed the celebrated Tiber by the bridge where Constantine beheld his famous vision of the Cross, and subsequently defeated his enemy, which event produced the conversion of the Emperor, and caused Christianity to become the religion of the Roman Empire and of the civilized world.

The feelings of that man are not to be envied, who could without a beating heart first mount the Capitol or view the Forum. There the genius of Ancient Rome still seems to preside, and every spot in the vicinity abounds with interesting reminiscences.

The majestic Coliseum, which

> "In its public days unpeopled Rome,
> And held, uncrowded, nations in its womb," still stands, though in ruins, a noble specimen of the magnificent ideas of the Romans.

Of the Golden House of Nero, which in its days of grandeur found its limits too confined on the Palatine Mount, the early boundary of the Roman Empire, nought now remains of its gorgeous splendor, but fragments of columns, choked-up vaults, and subterranean frescos; and at this hour "the spider spreads her net in the palace of the Cæsars, and the owl stands sentinel" on the Imperial Mount.

In its neighbourhood are the Triumphal Arches of Titus*, Constantine, and Severus, with many elegant columns, the graceful vestiges of fallen fanes and forsaken temples.

In the Museums, besides an assemblage of most exquisite and beautiful statues, is a collection of pictures and an interesting assemblage of the busts of the illustrious dead.

The Church of St. Peter, for its immensity, its sublimity, and beauty, so far transcends all other edifices, that no description could convey an adequate idea of its magnificence†. The walls that glow with the richest marbles, the noble statues, the fine pictures, the richly ornamented altars, positively overwhelm the senses; whilst the lamps always burning, the swells of music occasionally falling on the ear, the fragrant incense wafted around, give the impression of enchantment, that as you wander about, you half imagine it a dream.

Besides its classical attractions, Rome is consecrated to the Christian traveller, it having been the scene of the labours and sufferings of several of the holy apostles. St. Peter was crucified on the spot where the sacristry bearing his name now stands; St. John was cast into a cauldron of boiling oil near the Lateran; and St. Paul dwelt here two whole years, and was afterwards beheaded.

Many of the first Christians sought refuge during the bloody persecutions of the Roman emperors in the gloomy recesses of the catacombs; and nothing even in the most heroic period of the Roman annals can compete with the wonderful magnanimity, the fortitude, and pious resignation with which these holy men endured tortures worse than death, and resigned the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, with all that makes life dear, for the sake of their religion.

THE SUBSTANCE OF A COURSE OF LECTURES ON BRITISH COLONIAL SLAVERY,

Delivered at Bradford, York, and Scarborough, by the Rev. Benjamin Godwin, Classical Tutor of Horton College, Bradford, Yorkshire. 8vo. pp. 170. London, Hatchard.

In whatever point of view we contemplate Negro Slavery, it appears an evil of enormous magnitude. It is the most flagrant violation of the righteous law of God;—it is the most atrocious injury to the dearest rights of man;—and it is the most effectual means of demoralizing all classes of society in which it prevails. Should any one be disposed to question the latter position, we would refer him to the various works which refer to the West Indies, or to the following statement respecting the number of illegitimate children of free persons in Jamaica, which is taken from the registry of the Bishop's office, for 1830. Legitimate, 380, illegitimate 958: total 1338!!

What must be the general state of morals among a people, who would record in a religious ordinance that nearly three-fourths of their children were illegitimate, any one may conceive!

Mr. Godwin is entitled to the thanks of the community for his valuable Lectures. They will be found a very interesting commentary on the whole system of Negro Slavery, and worthy of the perusal of every Christian—especially of every British Christian.

Annual Expenditure for Gin in England.—Ardent spirits are most pernicious to the health, especially of those who are badly fed. Yet the poorer classes are those who expend most in this deleterious and destructive stimulant. We are assured, that "the retail value of the gin annually consumed in this country amounts to nearly 20,000,000*l.*! Including the smuggled spirits, it is probably more. Here, then, are the people of this country, and principally those of the lower orders, taxing themselves to the extent of nearly half the whole revenue of the kingdom, and that in the consumption of an article, which, in return for a momentary gratification, entails upon thousands misery of every kind, including disease and premature death!"

The first volume of the Christian's Penny Magazine, from June to December 1832, is now complete, and may be had, neatly bound in canvass, price 3*s.* 6*d.* through any Bookseller or Newsman; and also any of the preceding Parts or Numbers.

CARACTACUS BEFORE THE EMPEROR CLAUDIUS.

HISTORICAL NOTICES OF CARACTACUS.

Caractacus is celebrated in the annals of our country, as one of the most distinguished of the ancient British princes. Brief notices of this renowned chief cannot fail to be interesting to our readers on two accounts—First, because of his greatness of mind, displayed in his conduct towards the Romans, in their conquest of Britain; and especially, as his being carried captive to Rome was the means of introducing Christianity among our Druid ancestors.

Britain had been partially conquered by Julius Cæsar, in two expeditions; the last of which, a year after the former, was in the year 54 before the Christian era. Cæsar is believed to have advanced as far as St. Alban's, whose Latin name is Verulamium, the capital of Cassivelaunus. This city the Romans burnt and destroyed; hostages were delivered to Cæsar, as a security for the tribute he had imposed upon the Britons, and he withdrew with his army to Gaul.

For a period of ninety-seven years afterwards, the Britons were but little molested by foreign enemies: they did not pay the tribute imposed by their conquerors; and, though they repeatedly threatened, none of the Roman emperors, during that period, would invade the country, Augustus and Tiberius considering the expedition too expensive.

Claudius was induced to engage in the enterprize, by the representations of Bericus, or Adminius, son of Cunobelinus. This prince dying, left his dominions between his other sons Togodumnus and Caractacus, who either conjointly or separately governed the Silures in Wales, and a great part of the south-west of Britain. Their step-mother, Cartismandua, queen of the Brigantes, inhabiting Yorkshire, &c., enjoying her own dominions.

Aulus Plautius, of consular rank, was commissioned for the undertaking, A. D. 43. His army consisted of four complete legions, with their auxiliaries and cavalry, making in all about 50,000 men. Vespasian, and his son Titus, who afterwards destroyed Jerusalem, and became emperors of Rome, were commanders under him. Caractacus led the British against the dreadful legions, the conquerors of the world, and was defeated. Claudius himself was induced to hasten to Britain to reap the glory of the conquest, and Caractacus was again defeated in Essex, and Camelodunum (now Maldon) a city of some note was taken, and established as a military fortification by the Romans. Some suppose that Caractacus was taken prisoner, and brought before the emperor Claudius at York, but released; but as he stayed but fifteen days in the island it does not appear probable; however, the Senate decreed the Emperor the title of Britannicus as a surname, in memory of his conquest of Britain.

Plautius and Vespasian continued their efforts to subjugate the Britains. They were succeeded by Ostorius Scapula, A. D. 50. An alliance was formed by the Iceni, the Brigantes, and the Silures, three of the most powerful British tribes, who unanimously chose Caractacus for their chief general. He exhorted the soldiers on the morning of the fatal battle, telling them, "This is the day that will give liberty or perpetual slavery;" and bid them call to mind the glory of their ancestors, who drove Cæsar out of Britain, and formerly freed their country from the dominion of the Romans."

Discipline and skill in the Roman veterans, overcame the rude courage of the Britons, who were completely routed. Besides the dreadful effusion of blood, Caractacus lost his wife, daughters, and brothers: and that chieftain himself taking refuge in the dominions of his step-mother, Cartismandua, was betrayed by her into the hands of Ostorius. Information of this victory was immediately forwarded to Rome; on which, Claudius ordered the royal captives to be sent to his capital, that he might behold in chains a prince who had been able to withstand the Roman legions for nine years.

On an appointed day, the imperial court being summoned, and the Emperor seated on his throne, the procession was made to pass before the master of the world. The servants and retinue of the British prince, with the rich spoils which had been taken by the Romans, were first led forth; then his wife, daughters, and brothers; and lastly Caractacus himself, walking erect, with a settled countenance, as if elevated above his misfortune. When beholding the astonishing splendour and magnificence of Rome, Caractacus exclaimed, "Is it possible, that a people so wealthy and luxurious, should envy me a humble cottage in Britain?"

Tacitus informs us, that when Caractacus came near the Emperor, he addressed him with dignity, as follows: "If my moderation had been as great as my birth or fortune, Rome had seen me this day her ally, and not her captive, and perhaps she would not have disdained to rank in the number of her friends, a prince royally descended, and who commanded many nations. My present condition is as dishonourable to me, as it is glorious to you. I had arms, horses, riches, and grandeur. Is it strange I should part with them unwillingly? Does it follow, because you have a mind to rule over all, that therefore every one must tamely submit? Had I sooner been betrayed to you, neither your glory nor my misfortunes had been rendered so famous, and my punishment would have been buried in eternal oblivion. But now, if you preserve my life, I shall be a standing monument of your clemency to future ages."

Claudius is said to have been so moved by these words, that he pronounced their pardon instantly, and ordered the chains to be knocked off the captives in his presence. Having received their liberty, they immediately presented themselves before the empress, giving expressions to their gratitude to her, who appears to have been their intercessor.

BRITISH ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

No. II. Introduction of Christianity into Britain.

Druidism, the religion of our pagan ancestors in Britain, we introduced to our readers in Number 13 of the Christian's Penny Magazine. They will reasonably desire some information concerning the more interesting parts of our Ecclesiastical History: this we intend to give in a series of papers.

Christianity was introduced among the Britons in the Apostolic age. Of this there seems indubitable evidence, both from facts and testimonies; though there exists no small measure of difference and of monkish extravagance in some of the traditions.

Gildas, the most ancient of our historians, who flourished in the sixth century, declares that he "could find no British records of either the civil or ecclesiastical affairs of Britain, while it was subject to the Romans; and that if such records ever did exist, they had either been destroyed by their enemies, or carried into foreign countries by the exiled Britons." Yet this writer intimates the prevailing tradition, that Christianity had been published in our country before the great revolt, and the defeat of Queen Boadicea, which happened A. D. 61;—for, referring to those calamitous events, he remarks, "In the mean time, Christ, the true sun, afforded his rays, that is the knowledge of his precepts, to this island, benumbed with extreme cold, having been at a great distance from the sun; I do not mean the sun in the firmament, but the Eternal Sun in heaven."

Caractacus, that martial but unfortunate prince, is believed to have been the means of furthering the diffusion of Christian knowledge among the Britons, if not of its introduction: and this will appear probable from several considerations. That bold chief, as we have seen, was carried captive to Rome, A. D. 52, when he was liberated by the Emperor Claudius: but Caractacus was detained in the imperial city for seven years, without a passport for his return home, which happened A. D. 59. At this period, the conquerors had established the southern division of this island as a Roman province, Camelodunum (Maldon in Essex) had been fortified as a Roman colony and military station, and Verulam (St. Alban's) and London had become municipia, or free cities, flourishing, and crowded with Roman citizens; of whom it is computed there could not be less than 100,000; as no less than 70,000 or 80,000 were massacred in the revolt under Boadicea, some of whom, it is thought, might be believers on the Lord Jesus Christ, for the following reasons:—

The Christians at Rome were very numerous, and their "faith was spoken of throughout the whole world," Rom. i, 8. The Epistle of Paul to the Romans is believed to have been written A. D. 58, and the flourishing state of their church may be tolerably estimated by consulting that Epistle, in chap. i, 1—15, and xv, 23, and xvi.

From the indispensable daily intercourse between Rome and Britain, Christianity must have been heard of by our countrymen; especially when we consider, that, besides those who had been carried prisoners to Rome, many would go to negotiate their affairs at the imperial court; and some who came to occupy civil or military posts in the island, or to transact mercantile business, would surely know and feel some interest in the Christian religion. Still more probable does this appear, as Claudius, the emperor, had published a decree, commanding "all Jews" "to depart from Rome," Acts xviii, 2. This happened A. D. 53, the year before the death of Claudius, and the Christian Jews were consequently dispersed among the Gentiles, as we see in the case of Aquila and Priscilla at Corinth, and some would probably carry the Gospel to Britain.

Aulus Plautius, it will be remembered, was the first Roman governor in Britain; and he had married Pomponia Græcina, who is believed to have been a decided Christian. Tacitus, a Roman historian of that age, says, "Pomponia Græcina, an illustrious lady, married to Plautius, who was honoured with an ovation or lesser triumph for his victories in Britain, was accused of having a strange and foreign superstition; and her trial was committed to her husband. He, according to ancient custom, convened her whole family and relations; and having in their presence tried her for her life and fame, pronounced her innocent of any thing immoral. Pomponia lived many years after this trial, but always led a gloomy, melancholy kind of life."

The exemplary innocence of Pomponia, and her abandoning the licentiousness and idolatries of the imperial court, are characterized just as we might expect from a proud and philosophic pagan historian. But if this illustrious lady were a Christian, and accompanied her husband during his residence in Britain, from A.D. 43—47, she might be one of the first who brought the Gospel into our country, and prepared the means for some faithful preachers of Christ.

Several of the family of Caractacus are said to have embraced the Gospel at Rome; among whom, according to the Welch Triads, was Bran, erroneously called his father, who also had been carried with him into captivity. On this account, Bran was celebrated as "one of the three blessed sovereigns;" and his family as "one of the three blessed lineages of Britain."

Caractacus was accompanied on his return to Britain, by several Christian preachers, of whom, Ilid is supposed to have been a Jewish believer; and two others are believed to have been Gentiles, whose names were Cyndav and Arwystli. Great success is said to have attended their evangelical ministry; and many, as the fruit of their labours, in the southern parts of Britain, especially in Wales, became the disciples of Jesus Christ.

Claudia, a Christian lady enrolled in the inspired records, by the apostle Paul, 2 Tim. iv, 21, is thought to have been a daughter of Caractacus, left behind him at Rome, she having been married by Pudens, a person of senatorial dignity. Martial, a Roman poet of that age, celebrates her as an accomplished British lady, married to Pudens, who is believed to be the same person whom the apostle mentions in the same passage with Claudia.

Many are exceedingly anxious to prove that Britain was honoured with the presence and labours of some of the Apostles of Christ. Traditions, the most extraordinary and absurd, have been handed down to our times respecting the apostles James, Simon Zelotes, Peter, Andrew, and Joseph of Arimathea, having preached the Gospel in Britain. These are unworthy of our recording.

Britain is, however, with good reason believed to have been honoured with a missionary visit from the great "Apostle of the Gentiles." Ancient and respectable tradition exists, declaring that our island was visited by Paul: and when we consider that he was liberated from his confinement at Rome, in the spring of A. D. 63, between which, and the period of his death, A. D. 65, or according to some A. D. 67, he might take his long purposed "journey into Spain," as he mentions in his Epistle to the Romans, chap. iv, 24—28; while in the west, as there is much reason to believe he made that journey, he could easily pass over the channel into Britain.

Dr. Henry observes, in which we fully concur, "In a word, though it would be rash and unwarrantable in a modern writer, to affirm positively that the apostle Paul preached the Gospel in Britain, yet it is certainly no presumption to affirm, that if any of the apostles preached in this island, it was most probably the apostle Paul."

"The entrance of Christ into a city, whether in person or by the preaching of the Gospel, always makes a stir. Some are moved by the novelty. Some, alas! by hatred and envy: and some, blessed be God, are moved with joy and gratitude to God for sending His blessed Gospel among them."

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

His Religious Principles.

Baptized and brought up, as his friends considered, a member of the Church of England, William was taught the Catechism; and was able to repeat the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments. But until after he arrived at manhood, he was unacquainted with any one who was consistently religious; or with any individual who was accustomed to observe the daily worship of God in his family.

From the little he had seen of the Methodists, during the few weeks he was in their Sunday school, he was persuaded that some of them were truly religious; and all the silly opprobrium, which for years he had heard heaped upon them, was not sufficient to destroy the respect for them which had been created by that short opportunity of observing them.

He was led to think highly of the Rev. E. Burn, minister of St. Mary's chapel, whose son had been a school-fellow with William; partly from the fact of his being accounted methodistical in his principles and preaching, and partly from some circumstances connected with that gentleman publishing a funeral sermon on the decease of the pious Countess of Burfort; through which, William had a short interview with Mr. Burn.

Though an ingenious mechanic, the master of William had in reality no religious principles; in relation to which, he was ignorant in the extreme. This will readily be inferred from the fact of his not possessing a single religious volume, except a Prayer Book, nor a copy of the Holy Scriptures in his family, for several years after William was bound; and then his commissioning a Jew, with whom he had frequent dealings, to purchase a good Bible, and to examine which, William, the apprentice, was called in for his opinion, whether it were a proper and a good one! William derived, therefore, no advantage in a religious point of view, from any qualification of his master.

Inquisitiveness was a peculiar feature in the mind of William: and his circumstances were in some respects calculated to provoke its exercise; for having felt the indispensable necessity of personal religion, he was exceedingly solicitous to ascertain what was the certain truth, according to the word of God, and what party, among the several denominations of professing Christians, held its sacred realities in their scriptural purity.

William wished to be a churchman; and he ardently desired to find that the church of England was altogether right, and that the Roman Catholics, the Methodists, and the Dissenters were in the wrong. To assist him in his investigation, he procured a copy of the Manchester "Young Man's Companion," which as he had seen contained a mass of various and valuable instruction, a branch of which, not the least valuable, was a sketch of the various religions embraced by different nations, and notices of the principal divisions of Christians, under their several denominations. This was of considerable use to William, as most of the information was entirely new, and it served to sharpen his disposition for inquiry, that he might obtain full satisfaction.

Observing his seriousness, and knowing that he was fond of reading, one of his shopmates, an elderly man, but greatly addicted to excessive drinking, brought William a book, which appeared to have been a trouble to him, as its possession carried condemnation to habits of intemperance: it was an old copy of the Rev. Mr. Hervey's Eleven Letters to Mr. Wesley, in reply to the Observations of that gentleman on Hervey's

Theron and Aspasio. This volume of that pious and interesting writer was read with eagerness and delight, as it brought before the mind of William, so clearly and fully, those doctrines of the gospel, which were suitable to relieve his mind, the complete justification of a sinner by faith in Christ, and the several momentous doctrines inseparably connected with the imputation of the righteousness of Jesus, our glorious Surety.

The Hebrew quotations apart, it was of incalculable advantage to the mind of the young solitary inquirer. This volume was the means of opening a new field of the purest pleasure in the writings of the apostle Paul; especially serving as a preparative to the study of the epistles to the Romans and the Hebrews; and William adopted the collect for the Conversion of St. Paul, to use on a Lord's day as part of his prayers. And many a time, when any new difficulty on religious matters arose in the mind of William, did he wish that Mr. Hervey were still living, and that he was his uncle, or some relation, that he might enjoy the delightful privilege of corresponding with him, for the purpose of gaining divine instruction. He resolved, however, to procure the volumes of Theron and Aspasio, and to give them a serious and attentive reading; from which he anticipated a full measure of satisfaction, and great enlargement of mind. He did procure them, and derived from their perusal the lasting benefit which he expected.

Two passages of the epistles of Paul, at that time appeared to William as most peculiarly significant and comprehensive; and upon his knees he learnt them by prayer, beseeching God at once to imprint them on his memory, and impress them upon his heart. The first of those passages is, "God, who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began; but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." 2 Tim. i, 9, 10. The other passage is, "For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another. But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared; not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that, being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life." Titus iii, 3—7.

These two scripture texts were regarded by William as containing a most rich and summary exhibition of the gospel of Christ, and in seasons of dejection they were happily the means of his consolation. To Mr. Hervey's writings he considered himself chiefly indebted, as instrumental in leading him to perceive their glorious design, in promoting our spiritual peace.

William was painfully convinced, that the pure gospel of Christ was not generally preached in his parish church, and the sermons from the several officiating clergymen were lamentably deficient in their exhibitions of the saving truths of the gospel; and this occasioned him considerable uneasiness, yet he knew not what to consider as its cause. But he was still further led to try every sermon and opinion by the word of God, from the perusal of a short memoir of the life and martyrdom of Archbishop Cranmer. By this he was yet further stimulated to pursue his religious inquiries, determining especially to examine the principles of those who had been martyrs for the cause of Christianity.

These inquiries he pursued with avidity and refined delight, rising early in the morning, and sitting up late at night, for the purpose of reading on these subjects, so as to arrive at the certain knowledge of the truth of God.

From what he had read, he was brought to this conclusion, especially as Mr. Hervey mentions the names of many Puritans and Dissenters, as well as pious bishops and doctors of the church, who fully agreed with him in all the principal points of evangelical doctrine;—that truly religious men, whether churchmen or dissenters, were unanimous in their reception of the vital articles of Christianity.

The views of the gospel maintained by Mr. Hervey, William found were contained in the doctrinal part of the thirty-nine articles of the church of England: but the discourses which he heard in his parish church, bore little resemblance to the writings of his favourite author. With him, regeneration by the Holy Spirit,—justification by faith in the revelation of the atonement of Christ and the imputation of his righteousness,—sanctification by the truth, through the Spirit,—and divine adoption by the sovereign grace of God, appeared to constitute the essence of Christianity; but these glorious doctrines, involving all that is rich in the gospel, were scarcely ever heard from the pulpit to whose instructions William intently listened. Therefore, on being released from servitude, he did not many times attend his parish church; but with an elderly fellow-workman before mentioned, he usually worshipped at the chapel in the connection of the late Countess of Huntingdon.

The doctrines inculcated in that place of worship, were those which Mr. Hervey advocated; and William, finding them edifying and comforting to his mind, he was resolved on making that place his religious home. Among the people, he found many truly devoted to God, and not a few young men, at whose prayer meetings William attended, much to his happiness. He was soon introduced to the Rev. V. Bennet, then the worthy and zealous minister of the chapel; he engaged as teacher in the Sunday school, and became a candidate for communion with the Christian church formed in that place, and was in due time admitted a member of their fellowship.

William several times attended at St. Mary's chapel, to form an estimate how far the doctrines he heard from his pastor, the Rev. T. Bennet, corresponded with the ministrations of the Rev. Mr. Burn, and he was satisfied and delighted to find an essential agreement between their evangelical sentiments; though their style of preaching was not exactly the same. Perhaps also a notice of two sermons that William heard on those occasions, may be worthy of record: the first was from the venerable Mr. John Riland, the first minister of that chapel, on a visit, after he had obtained the living of Sutton-Coldfield. His text was, "The labour of the foolish wearieth every one of them, because he knoweth not how to go to the city." Eccles. x, 15. The text appeared singular; but his discourse on the difficulty of worldly professors finding the city of God, was delivered in his usually impressive manner, and it seemed to be attended with the Divine benediction.

The other sermon was from the venerable Mr. Thomas Scott, the commentator, the last time, it is believed, that he occupied the pulpit of St. Mary's Birmingham; and he preached as a "dying man to dying men," on 2 Pet. i, 13—15. "I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance; knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle," &c. The sermon was altogether of a piece with his commentary; and was an interesting testimony of an aged man of God to the gospel of Jesus Christ, a subject in which William could heartily rejoice. William was thus satisfied, that, after much prayerful investigation of the word of God, the religious principles which he had embraced were those which the Apostles had preached,—for which Martyrs had died,—and in which Cranmer, Hervey, Watts, and Scott, were of one opinion.

ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY.

THIRD CENTURY.

30. Pantænus, Catechist of Alexandria, is believed to have been a native of Sicily: or born of Sicilian parents in that celebrated Egyptian city. He was educated in the principles of the Stoics, and always retained the title of "The Stoic Philosopher." By what means Pantænus became acquainted with the gospel of Christ we have no particular information: but we have reason to believe that Christians were numerous in Alexandria.

Mark, the Evangelist, is said to have planted the gospel in that famous metropolis of Egypt; in the population of which, the principal sects of philosophy flourished, especially those of the Platonic and Stoic schools. The founder of the Christian church in Alexandria, is reported to have established a school for the diffusion of the doctrines of Christ in that city, and that it continued until the time of Pantænus: but he is the first master of it of whom we have any account. For ten years he laboriously discharged the duties of his catechetical office; and though it is believed that Pantænus debased the sacred truths of the gospel, by the combination of Stoicism with Christianity, it is hoped that he was sincere, and the means of leading many to salvation by faith in the Lord Jesus.

Demetrius, of whom we know but little, was bishop of the Christians in Alexandria, at that period; when ambassadors arriving from India, got acquainted with that zealous pastor, and entreated him to send them a faithful preacher to instruct their countrymen in the doctrines of the gospel. Pantænus was regarded as the most proper person for that mission, which he promptly undertook, giving by that decision an evidence of his sincerity in the faith of Christ. Of his labours and successes in India, we have no particular detail: but it is said, that he found in that country the Gospel of Matthew, which had been carried thither by the Apostle Bartholomew, by whom the doctrine of Christ had been introduced into India. He also found some who retained the knowledge of Christ, the effects of the holy ministry of that apostle.

Pantænus, having travelled through Arabia, Persia, India, and Ethiopia, returned to Alexandria, bringing the Gospel of Matthew with him, and resumed his labours in the catechetical school. Some commentaries on the Scriptures are attributed to Pantænus, but they are lost. "Candour," says Milner, "I think, requires us to look on him as a sincere Christian, whose fruitfulness was yet much checked by that very philosophy for which Eusebius commends him.—A blasting wind it surely was; but it did not entirely destroy Christian vegetation in all whom it infected."

Pantænus died about A. D. 216, at Alexandria.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XIII.

On Frugality.

Dear Madam,

This is another habit essentially connected with the welfare of your child, and, like all the rest, requires early and habitual inculcation.

The habit of squandering is learnt in the nursery. As soon as a child can hold any thing in its hand, people give it a toy, a little horse or a little cart; and no sooner can it walk, than these toys are rapidly increased. The visit of an aunt or an uncle, or of a godmother, is the occasion of giving a new toy. Whenever the father or mother go on a journey, whenever the fair-day or the child's own birth-day comes round, it is the signal for an accession to the multitude of such trash already contained in the nursery. The consequence is, that a craving desire of novelty is created and encouraged, a taste for splendid varieties, which ever demands something better, or more curious, or more expensive than the last. He is also taught to love his relative because he has given him such a nice toy, which cost so much money. Hence he insensibly learns to undervalue every thing which does not cost something. Who can tell how much of that extravagance, which this taste for change and for expensive objects creates in every class of society, may be owing to a habit of this kind communicated in the nursery? Such people were pampered infants. They only changed their objects as their years changed; and thus the adage of the poet became verified—"Men are but children of a larger growth." I utterly disapprove all toys, &c. for this reason. A well-educated child would never think of them. As he grows up he may indeed have some one toy of a useful kind, which may employ his mind and his body, and which may become the source of new employment. I highly approve of the child's printing press. Let him also be taught to be careful of every thing; not to destroy any thing because it is impaired, but to mend it, or make the best of it. If he learns to draw, or to colour, let him be careful and economical in paper and paint and pencils. Never let him burn a piece of paper because it is blotted upon one side. It seems also highly desirable that he should be taught as early as possible to make for himself as many of the sources of his amusement as possible: he will value them for the sake of his own labour. If he makes a paper kite, or helps to make it, he will be more careful of it than if he has nothing to do but to go and get sixpence and go to the shop to get another. Let attention to this habit pervade every thing.

It is important too that a child should never by any means be habituated to ideas beyond the station of life filled by his parents, and which in all sober calculation he is likely to fill hereafter.

Every religious and sensible parent lives decidedly below his income, whatever it may be, and does not have any thing till he has paid for it: he is therefore careful to have no needless expenditure, to prefer comfort to finery, and to be able to view the luxury of other persons in higher stations without a sigh. These habits in the parent, of contentment and frugality, will be transferred to their children. To your son you thereby give a habit which is sure to conduce to his own comfort and respectability, and which to your daughter is the most valuable dowry.

It is also important for the establishment of this habit, that poverty should never be spoken of as a miserable or degraded situation. Show to your children very soon, that happiness consists in health, employment, peace of conscience, and the exercise of the social affections; and that consequently the means of happiness are nearly equally distributed among mankind. Demonstrate to him how very little riches really contribute to permanent tranquillity. You will never speak of or to a person in a different manner from what you would to a prince, merely because he is poor; and then your child will never imbibe that deceptious opinion, that honest poverty is disgraceful. You will on the contrary make him prize people for their intellectual, but chiefly for their moral qualities. You will show him that every creditor who is not paid is defrauded; that he who by extravagance puts it out of his power to do good, is a despicable and selfish man. I do not object to the use of satire itself upon the habits of those who purchase finery, or luxuries, or any thing else for the sake of show, who wear fine clothes to be thought rich, who would sooner be in debt than not make a figure, or tell a lie than appear poor; or who make themselves miserable two hundred and thirteen days in the year, that they may walk about in fine raiment and go to church very fine on the remaining fifty-two. This wretched vanity you will expose in all its consequences. You will labour to render him liable to none but the wants of nature, and even those corrected by the dictates of good sense. You will thus render him frugal, honest, industrious, contented, successful, respected, and, so far as it depends upon such qualities, happy also.

I am, my dear Madam, yours,

Clericus.

HISTORICAL NOTICES OF NEGRO SLAVERY.

"HE THAT STEALETH A MAN AND SELLETH HIM, OR IF HE BE FOUND IN HIS HAND, HE SHALL SURELY BE PUT TO DEATH." Exod. xxi, 16.

Our "Historical Notices of Negro Slavery," are designed as an appeal to believers in the word of God, against that iniquitous and aggravated violation of the dearest rights of man. Intelligent persons do, in many instances, employ their ingenuity to discover some plausible reasons to justify, or at least to excuse that shocking system: but certainly it can never be possible for any believer in Divine Revelation to approve that which is so manifestly criminal, unless he be under a delusion from the tempter, "the god of this world, who blinds the minds of them who believe not." 2 Cor. iv, 14.

Divine Truth will unquestionably avenge those crying wrongs, which we behold in that "murderous system of West Indian Slavery!" Who will presume to doubt this, when he remembers that God Almighty, before whose righteous tribunal every soul must appear, has signified his abhorrence of that enormity, by the comprehensive law which we have quoted? How far His holiness must have been provoked, will partly appear by our brief details.

Negro Slavery is believed to have commenced in the fifteenth century; for, as Edwards, in his "History of the West Indies," remarks, "In the year 1442, while the Portuguese, under the encouragement of their celebrated Prince Henry, were exploring the coast of Africa, Anthony Gonsalvo, who two years before had seized some Moors near Cape Badajoz, was by that prince ordered to carry his prisoners back to Africa: he landed them at Rio del Oro, and received from the Moors, in exchange, ten blacks, and a quantity of gold dust, with which he returned to Lisbon."

Avarice, in the Portuguese, prompted many to embark in this horrid traffic, which they perceived likely to become a profitable speculation. The Spaniards became purchasers of the wretched men "stolen from Africa," or procured by barter from its barbarous chiefs: for in their inordinate thirst for gold, they had destroyed multitudes of the natives in Hispaniola, compelling them to work in the mines, in search of the tempting metal. Ferdinand V of Spain, in 1511, permitted large importations of those unhappy men, to supply the place of the natives, whose numbers were daily diminishing, and threatened the speedy extinction of their race, through the cruelties of their oppressors.

Cardinal Ximenes, who was regent during the minority of Charles V, to his honour, refused permission for a regular commerce in African Negroes. But on the ascension of Charles to the throne in 1517, that great monarch granted a patent for the exclusive supply of 4,000 Negroes annually to Hispaniola, Cuba, Jamaica, and Porto Rico. Afterwards this patent was assigned to several merchants of Genoa: and by this means a regular supply of these degraded human beings was transported to labours and miseries in the Spanish colonies. Probably this great prince was not aware of the dreadful evils attending this horrible traffic in human blood, nor of the criminality of permitting its existence: for when he made a code of laws in 1542, for his Indian subjects, he liberated all the Negroes, and with a word put an end to Slavery. But after Charles had resigned his crown to his son Philip, and the minister of his royal mercy, Pedro de la Gasca, had returned to Spain, the imperious tyrants of the West Indies resumed their authority; and according to their former practices, fastened the yoke of Slavery on the suffering and impotent Negroes.

England next became stained with the blood of the Negroes: Captain, afterwards Sir John Hawkins, was the first Englishman, who dishonoured himself and his country by engaging in this shocking commerce. Conceiving that it promised to be a lucrative speculation, he obtained the assistance of several wealthy individuals in London; and having fitted out three ships in 1562, he sailed to the coast of Africa, landed where Free Town Sierra Leone now stands, and fell upon the defenceless Negroes. With sword in hand, he burned and plundered their towns; and having seized 300 persons, he sailed with them to Hispaniola; sold them; and with various articles of merchandise, the price of blood, he arrived in England!

Hawkins was afterwards appointed to one of the Queen's ships, to proceed on the same adventure. But there is reason to believe that Elizabeth was deceived; as she is said to have "expressed her concern lest any of the Africans should be carried off without their free consent;" in which case she declared that "it would be detestable, and call down the vengeance of Heaven upon the undertakers." What then would Elizabeth have said, had she known the depredations of this fiend in human shape? A companion of Hawkins in this expedition, speaking of their arrival at Sambula, says, "In this island we stayed certain days, going every day on shore, to take the inhabitants, with burning and spoiling their towns." Mr. Edwards, though averse to the abolition of the Slave trade, says, "In regard to Hawkins himself, he was, I admit, a murderer and a robber. His avowed purpose in sailing to Guinea, was to take, by stratagem or force, and carry away, the unsuspecting natives, in the view of selling them as slaves to the people of Hispaniola. In this pursuit his object was present profit; and his employment and pastime, devastation and murder." Such are the shocking means of obtaining slaves in Africa, to which all dealers or their agents have resorted.

Louis XIII was induced to sanction the practice of slavery in the French colonies, by the hypocritical Romish missionaries representing it as for the glory of God, and for the good of the souls of the Negroes; this being the only way of converting them to Christianity!

British settlements being formed in the West India islands, during the reigns of Charles I and Charles II, the colonists commenced plantations and stocked them with slaves. The Buccaneers enriched these settlements with their spoils; and, accustomed as they were to deeds of blood, to cruelty and rapine, the enslaving of their fellow-creatures would shock no feeling of their minds. How many of these wretched creatures were imported during those two reigns we cannot tell: but Mr. Edwards says, that from 1700 to 1786 the number imported into Jamaica was 610,000! "I say this on sufficient evidence," he observes, "having in my possession lists of all the entries.—The total import into all the British colonies from 1680 to 1786, may be put at 2,130,000." In 1771, which he considers the most flourishing period of the trade, there sailed from England to the coast of Africa, one hundred and ninety-two ships provided for the importation of 47,146 Negroes. And now, he observes (1793), the whole number annually exported from Africa by all the European powers is 74,000, of which 38,000 are imported by the British! In this abominable traffic in human beings, Britain did not indeed take the lead; but having once embarked in it, she threw into it her accustomed energy, and soon surpassed all the rest to supply her more numerous colonies.

Mammon was the deity at whose shrine the original natives of the West India islands were sacrificed, and at whose infernal inspiration Negro slavery was commenced and established. Fraud and hypocrisy were the means of deluding sovereigns to consent that their subjects should pursue the system, while treachery and violence were the agents in its support. Unprincipled adventurers, for the love of gain, embarked in this unholy enterprise; governments, imposed upon, first tolerated, and then encouraged the system, till long custom gave it a kind of sanction. Like the dreadful Upas, blighting and withering all that came within its pestilential influence, this horrid system struck deep its roots in our colonies: there it still flourishes, the black man's plague, and the white man's curse; and thus will it continue its pernicious influence upon all, until it is uprooted by human benevolence, or perishes smitten with the vengeance of offended Heaven!

Much has been done by the friends of humanity, towards the extinction of this tremendous evil; first to lift up the veil which concealed the horrors and enormities which characterized the slave colonies;—secondly, to obtain the decision of our courts, that a Negro could not be a Slave after having set his foot on the shores of England;—thirdly, to secure the abolition of the Slave Trade; and finally, what remains yet to be effected, the total extinction of Slavery throughout the British dominions.

Slavery, in its destructive horrors, was but little known, yet as far as it was understood it was reprobated by the wise and humane. Ximenes, we have seen, abhorred it: Charles V repented of having sanctioned it, and liberated the slaves in the colonies of Spain: Elizabeth, our nation's boast, protested against violence or compulsion towards them; and Louis XIII tolerated it, only on the supposition of its being the means of their conversion to Christianity.

Godwyn, a clergyman in the latter part of the seventeenth century, was the first man in England, by whom the system of Negro Slavery was condemned, in a book dedicated to the Archbishop of Canterbury; and about the same time, Richard Baxter, the Nonconformist, reprobated it in his "Christian Directory." In the eighteenth century, Dr. Hayter, bishop of Norwich, and Dr. Warburton, bishop of Gloucester, and Dr. Samuel Johnson, protested against the iniquitous system. At length "the morning star of Negro Freedom" arose in the person of Granville Sharp. His persevering labours were at length rewarded, by the Judges in Westminster Hall pronouncing the memorable decision, after the case of one Somerset had been argued three sessions, in January, February, and May 1772, that AS SOON AS A SLAVE SETS HIS FOOT ON THE ENGLISH SOIL HE BECOMES FREE!

This decision excited a more lively interest in favour of the injured and oppressed Africans; and in 1776, Mr. David Hartley, M. P. for Hull, denounced the Slave Trade in the House of Commons; and, having laid on the table some of the chains that were used in that murderous traffic, moved, that "the Slave Trade was contrary to the laws of God, and the rights of men." His motion was seconded by Sir George Saville, M. P. for Yorkshire.

Soon after a deep impression was produced upon the public mind by an action being brought against the underwriters, for a loss caused by the Captain of a slave ship, having thrown overboard one hundred and thirty two Negroes alive!! This barbarous wretch was not tried for the murder of these 132 human beings in cold blood; and were it not that his owners attempted to recover their value from the underwriters, who resisted the demand, this horrid transaction would have sunk into oblivion, together with thousands of such murders.

Dr. Peckard, Vice Chancellor of the University at Cambridge, was a warm friend to the Negro, and gave in 1785, as a prize essay, the subject, "Is it right to make slaves of others against their will?" Mr. Thomas Clarkson devoted his whole powers to secure the prize, and to serve the Negroes; and through him Mr. Wilberforce pledged himself to bring the subject before the parliament. On May 22, 1787, a society was formed for the abolition of the Slave Trade. In 1789, Mr. Wilberforce made his first motion on the Slave Trade, which met with great opposition. The nation was excited: for the parties interested in this trade in blood were numerous, and the West India and African merchants, the slave captains and others, saw their craft was in danger. The struggle was continued for twenty years; till in 1807, a bill was brought into the House of Lords for the abolition of the slave trade by Lord Grenville, then at the head of the government; which having passed, it was introduced into the Commons by Lord Howick, now Lord Grey: on March 25, 1807, it received the royal signature. By this it was enacted, that no slave should be imported into our colonies after March 1, 1808. Thus a second triumph was gained for humanity and justice!

EFFECTS OF SEEING THE WORD "ETERNITY."

A lady having spent the afternoon and evening at cards and in gay company, when she came home, found her servant-maid reading a religious book. She looked over the servant's shoulder, and said, "Poor melancholy soul! What pleasure can you find in poring so long over that book?"—That night the lady could not sleep; but lay sighing and weeping very much. Her servant several times inquired what was the matter. At length she burst into tears, and said, "Oh! it was one word I saw in your book that troubles me: there I saw the word Eternity! O how happy should I be, if I were prepared for eternity!" The consequence of this impression was, that she laid aside the cards, forsook her gay company, and set herself seriously to prepare for another world.

LINES ON THE EMBARKATION OF A MISSIONARY FAMILY FOR THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS.

Wake, isles of the south! your redemption is near,
No longer repose in the borders of gloom!
The Strength of his chosen in love will appear,
And light shall arise on the verge of the tomb!

The billows that girt ye, the wild waves that roar,
The zephyrs that play where the ocean-storms cease,
Shall bear the rich freight to your desolate shore,
Shall waft the glad tidings of pardon and peace.

On the islands that sit in the regions of night,
The lands of despair, to oblivion a prey,
The morning will open with healing and light,
The young Star of Bethlehem will ripen to day!

The altar and idol in dust overthrown,
The incense forbade that was hallowed with blood,
The Priest of Melchisedec these shall atone,
And the shrines of Atooi be sacred to God!

The heathen will hasten to welcome the time,
The day-spring the prophet in vision once saw,
When the beams of Messiah illumine each clime,
And the isles of the ocean shall wait for his law.

MY FATHER GOD!

My father God!—to feeble dust
What wondrous condescension 'tis,
That He—the Holy and the Just—
Should stoop to own and call us His.

My father God!—how sweet the sound
To a repentant sinner's heart!
What love, what joys in it abound;
What hope and strength it doth impart.

My father God!—and is it true
That Thou hast nam'd me for thy son?
Shall I thy matchless glory view,
When I my race on earth have run?

My father God!—how Thou hast led Me thro' each dark perplexing way;
And in the wilderness hast fed
And cheer'd me in my lonely way.

My father God!—what holy joy
Oft hast Thou to my spirit given:
Thy love shall all my powers employ,
When I shall live with Thee in heaven.

My father God!—guard me from ill,
And all my thoughts and heart renew:
A contrite spirit, humble will,
Grant me, that I Thy work may do.

My father God!—I long to be Within Thy mansion in the skies.
O how Thy face I pant to see!
Fain would I to Thy dwelling rise.

My father God!—in my last hour,
When I on Jordan's brink shall stand,
Around me cast thine arm of power,
And bear me to the promis'd land.

TO A DEPARTED FRIEND.

Thou art gone to the grave, but we will not deplore thee,
Since God was thy refuge, thy ransom, thy guide;
He gave thee—He took thee,—and He can restore thee;
And death has no sting since the Saviour has died.

THE REVELATION OF JESUS CHRIST,

Newly Translated from the Original Greek; with a Plain Reading, divesting it of its Metaphors, and Notes describing the persons and circumstances to which the Symbols refer. By George Pilkington. London, Effingham Wilson.

Mr. Pilkington is known to many by means of his Pamphlet, entitled, "The Unknown Tongues discovered to be English, Spanish, and Latin; and the Rev. Edward Irving proved to be erroneous in attributing their Utterance to the Holy Spirit," &c. &c.

After reading that discovery of the "Unknown Tongues," we were desirous of examining the attempt of that gentleman to furnish a key to the right interpretation of the wonderful prophecies in that mysterious, divine book. We admire the ingenuity displayed in his illustrations of the sacred text: but we regard them as extremely fanciful, and many of them as excessively absurd. Mr. Pilkington has manifested, in our opinion, excessive precipitancy, in venturing to become a translator and expositor of the most difficult book in the sacred volume, having been only a few months a convert to Christianity!

He says, "It is but a short time since I professed no religion save that which I fancied to be Deism, or rather such a belief of God as would presume to scan the measures of his eternal wisdom by finite reason; and thus, in denying what I had not the spirit to comprehend, was I heedlessly neglecting the 'one thing needful,' which God imperatively demands that all his creatures should seek. For many years I rioted in those principles which unrestrained reason naturally suggests. At length, without the intervention of misfortune, without having been afflicted by sickness or pecuniary distress, but with a sound body and a perfect mind, I, as one of those who composed the staff of a governor in one of our colonies, was obliged to attend church in my official capacity, and on that occasion, in the space of an hour, became a convert to Christianity. With an exceeding degree of sorrow for my past offences of unbelief, and with a zeal for the cause of Christ which daily increased, I arrived in England about eighteen months ago." Disappointed in his expectations from Christian brethren, he says, "I threw myself on my Saviour, and praying for the Holy Spirit, mercifully promised to 'teach us all things,' determined, by the grace of God, to study the Scriptures, and judge for myself. I accordingly devoted much of my time to this pursuit after truth, and, having continued with great satisfaction until I reached the book of Revelation, I thought of recommencing, without reading it. I was however constrained as it were to go on, and, opening at the eleventh chapter, my attention was arrested by its contents, and in about three hours, I understood it nearly as explained in the present publication."

We have no doubt of Mr. Pilkington's sincerity, and most sacredly do we hold the doctrine of the Holy Spirit's influence. But still we think Mr. Pilkington mistaken in some of his conclusions, respecting the communication of special divine illumination. We would remind him of his former mistakes in relation to Mr. Irving, and would recommend him carefully to review his "Translation of the Revelation."

VIEW ON THE GRAND CANAL, VENICE.

VENICE.

NICE was built in the fifth century; and from the allest beginnings, it rose to such eminence as to be- ne one of the most important states in Europe. For eral centuries, until the discovery of a passage to lia by the Cape of Good Hope, it became immensely ilent by engrossing most of the trade to the East.

/enice is one of the most remarkable cities on the itinent; being built upon sixty, or as some reckon enty-two lagunes, or small islands: so that a canal rs in every street, which are united by five hundred lges, the most famous of which is the Rialto, ninety ; in the span. The number of inhabitants is sup- ed to be about 150,000. The Piazza, or square of Mark, has not its equal in any place, for the magni- nce of the buildings, which are most of them ;ely palaces, faced with beautiful marble, and rned with pillars of several orders. The palace of Doge, the chief magistrate of Venice, is the most ;ndid. Besides these magnificent buildings, there one hundred and fifteen towers of surprising height l costly structure, sixty-four marble statues, and :nty-five of bronze, which are all master-pieces of workmanship. The arsenal is said to be the finest and best furnished in Europe, being three miles in circumference, and contains 100,000 stand of arms.

Venice has seventy churches, thirty-nine monasteries, twenty-eight nunneries, and seventeen hospitals: but the religion of the people is that of the Romish church. Scriptural knowledge therefore is exceedingly low, corresponding with the prevailing ignorance and superstition of that communion throughout the rest of Italy.

St. Mark's patriarchal church is the cathedral of Venice: it is situated in the grand Piazza, and is accounted one of the richest and most magnificent in the world. The Venetians pretend that they possess the body of the Evangelist Mark; and in the treasury of relics, they believe they have the original copy of the Gospel written by that inspired Evangelist's own hand; and, above all precious treasures, some of our Saviour's blood! Learned connoisseurs have examined the sacred manuscript: but the writing is, by length of time, so greatly defaced, that it cannot be determined whether it is Greek or Latin!

The architecture of the church of St. Mark is of a mixed kind, mostly of the Gothic order, yet many of the pillars are Grecian. The outside is incrusted with marble; the inside ceiling and floor are all of the most beautiful marble, as are the numerous pillars, and the whole is crowned with five domes. But all this expense and labour has been directed by a very moderate share of taste. The steeple of the cathedral stands insulated from the church, built of brick, square, and twenty-five feet broad on each side, and three hundred and fifty feet high, including the figure of an angel, made of copper, eighteen feet in height, with expanded wings, pointing with his hand to the quarter whence the wind blows.

The front of the cathedral, which looks to the palace, has five brazen gates, with historical basso-relievos; over the principal gates are placed the four famous bronze horses, gilt with brass, and of incomparable workmanship, said to have been executed by the famous Lysippus. They were given to Nero the Roman emperor, by Tesides, king of Armenia, to be put to the chariot of the sun, for adorning his triumphal arch, after he had conquered the warlike Parthians. The fiery spirit indicated by their countenances, and their animated attitudes, are perfectly agreeable to their original and fanciful destination. Nero placed them on the triumphal arch consecrated to him. They were removed by Constantine the Great to the Hippodrome at Constantinople, and remained there till the capture of that city by the French and Venetians, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, when they were conveyed to Venice.

We have little to record of the progress of evangelical truth in this splendid old city, except the circulation of a few Bibles, by the British consul, Mr. Money. Still we trust, that the time is not far distant, in which the pure doctrines of salvation by Jesus Christ, shall be proclaimed to attentive and believing congregations in the churches of Venice, instead of the mere performance of senseless and superstitious ceremonies, which degrade and abuse the sacred name of divine Christianity.

LEGAL DOCUMENTS ON NEGRO SLAVERY.

We have been favoured by a correspondent, with a statement from a legal document relating to a plantation in the West Indies, which puts Slavery, in all its debasing horrors, before us, in a striking way.

After describing the plantation in technical language, the "legal" transfer thus conveys with the land—

"The use and occupation of all and singular the slaves, horses, mules, horned cattle, and other live stock, with the issues and increase of the females!! and of all copper stills, vats, and other utensils and implements upon and belonging to the said plantation and premises, and particularized or mentioned in the schedule or inventory thereof thereunder written. And all ways, water-courses, privileges, commodities, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said plantation, lands, and premises belonging or appertaining."

And after the usual forms conveying "these our brethren," as so much goods and chattels, amongst many other curious covenants by the tenant, is included the following:—

"That the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall and will from time to time during the term granted keep up a gang of able and sufficient slaves in the said plantation, of not less than eighty in number; and when any of them shall die, run away, or otherwise be removed, shall and will place others in their stead as often as it shall so happen that the said slaves shall be reduced to less than eighty in number, under the penalty or forfeiture for every slave, which shall not be so replaced within twelve months after such death or removal as aforesaid, of the sum of fifty pounds a damages adjusted. And also shall and will keep up suc and the same number of coppers, stills, pots, and othe utensils and implements of every denomination."

Another clause is thus:

"And also shall and will at the expiration or othe determination of the said term hereby demised, we and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the landlords, thei heirs and assigns, for such and so many of the slave mentioned in the schedule as shall happen to be then dea or missing, so much lawful money as such deceased sla or slaves respectively are VALUED AT in the said schedule without any deduction or abatement whatsoever. An also that the tenant, his executors, administrators, an assigns, shall not, nor will send off the island, or sell an dispose of any of the demised slaves, or the issue of an of the females, under the penalty of forfeiting to th landlords, their heirs and assigns, double the value of suc slave or slaves, so sold, disposed of, or sent off the island, according to their respective values mentioned in sai schedule, without leave in writing from the landlords."

An extract from the long and doleful inventory of the "gang of slaves, stock, &c." shall now be given. Englishmen, read it and blush!

ľ TO "PASTOR'S" OBSERVATIONS ON INFANT SCHOOLS.

' Observations on the Infant School System" (No. 31), ten by a very estimable Clergyman, to which we gave in-the hope of promoting those valuable institutions. We lly agree with those "Observations;" but though we low an extended controversy on this subject, we deem st to insert the following intelligent reply.—ED.]

e Editor of the Christian's Penny Magazine.

Having been a constant reader of your little work from its first appearance on the periodicals, with the view to obtain rather part information, I ought probably to apolothis intrusion.

king a few remarks on Pastor's "Observations nfant School System"—it is my most earnest avoid that feeling of acrimony which appears possessed him whilst penning his "Observa-

I certainly agree with Pastor, that the sucending these institutions must depend in a easure on the teachers; and that the greatest l circumspection should be used in selecting ut not to reject them, as Pastor would suggest, ecause they have not received a superior edu-
In my humble opinion, the grand and chief ascertain are—whether they have the humble, eek, and lowly spirit of Jesus. Will they draw the children by the cords of love? Will they carefully watch over the development of that carnal mind which is "enmity against God," and apply the remedy held forth in the Gospel to every evil in its rise? Will they earnestly strive to remove ignorance by sound scriptural knowledge? (not merely classical or philosophical.) Will they endeavour to mortify every evil and corrupt imagination and inclination, and encourage a progress in all godliness and purity of living?

"All knowledge and intellectual development," observes a most excellent minister of the establishment in a letter to me a few days since, "that is not made subservient to this, only tends to pride and ungodliness."—Now, Sir, I would ask Pastor, where could a sufficient number of such persons be found among the learned and wise, who not only possess these important qualifications, but who could descend to that childlike simplicity, so necessary in a teacher of babes? If they cannot, literally speaking, become as little children themselves, and do not possess that tact of coming down to a level with the understanding of their little charge; neither the "highest scholastic attainments or profoundest philosophy," will ever assist them to acquire it; on this account I am led to conclude, such persons would make as inefficient writers for infants as they would teachers of them.

That there are persons not qualified in other respects, who come forward as candidates for this work, I allow; and that some have also been employed:—but is it just, is it consistent with the character of a Christian Minister (for such I am led to believe Pastor to be from his signature) to condemn a whole body generally, for that which may be reasonably termed the misfortune of a few? Again, his remark tends to reflect on such patrons or committees of schools who may have elected such individuals; as the teachers of other infant schools surely cannot be justly condemned for that over which they have no control.

2dly. Pastor then remarks, that "with all the native conceit of ignorance, the teachers of infant schools are generally impatient of any suggestion from others." Here again I must be allowed to differ. From a personal knowledge of, and frequent conversation with, the majority of such teachers in and around London, I dare affirm, that, generally, they are seeking for information, and would be most thankful for hints, or any kind of assistance that might be afforded them: and I appeal to the committees and visitors of these schools whether such be not the case.

3dly. Pastor again affirms, that "the system does not provide for the learning to read of the children, &c."—This was an oversight, or perhaps I should more properly say, an error in the opinion of the first promoters of infant schools, who, I am informed, considered it quite time to commence learning to read at the age of six or seven years: but in the present day, I believe there to be but few infant schools where this necessary appendage is not prominently attended to, and moreover the "old system" forgotten or unknown.

4thly. I am sorry, Sir, so frequently, and now so pointedly, to question the veracity of Pastor; but I, as well as himself, must state things "as they are." I have visited almost every infant school in London, and am in the habit frequently of conversing with, and questioning the little children on the lessons which they have been taught, and do not remember, in one instance, discovering the lamentable defect specified in his remarks on the tables. I for one dare thus publicly challenge Pastor to a mutual questioning on the part of my little ones, on any or all of the tables commonly taught. Surely the many public examinations which have taken place, where individuals, strangers, have questioned the children, must prove to the contrary, not only on this, but on every part of their little acquirements.

5thly. The circumstance of the teacher miscalling Naaman Naomi, appears to me to indicate that Pastor has not profited much by his visits to "several infant schools, for several years," or he must have perceived these seeming mistakes to be intentional, in order to keep up the attention of the children, who delight to jog Teacher's memory—and, in all probability, had he awaited the result he might have been rather gratified than otherwise.

In conclusion, Sir, after having several times read over these "Observations," and maturely considered them, my firm belief is,—that whatever the outward profession of Pastor may be, he is NOT in heart a FRIEND to infant schools.

Your insertion of these remarks will be esteemed a favour by, Sir, yours respectfully,

R. B. RIDGWAY.

"I CANNOT DIE!"

"IN August last," says a pious writer in the early part of 1811, "four men, named Marshall, Sawer, Wakelin, and Atkinson, were executed near Lincoln. They severally addressed the surrounding multitude, hoping that their unhappy situation would serve as an awful warning. Wakelin had been a great comfort to his fellow-prisoners; and in the hours when the clergyman was not with them, read to them continually. Atkinson had given one of the best proofs of repentance of his crime, by having given to the governor of the gaol, bills to the amount of 35*l.* to be sent to Messrs. G. and C. of Boston, whose property he declared it to be, lamenting that that was all the return he could then make to them. Just before the moment of the scaffold falling, Atkinson turned to shake hands with Wakelin, and in so doing shifted the knot of the halter from his ear to under his chin. Marshal, Sawer, and Wakelin, seemed to be dead in two minutes after suspension; but at that time, to the inconceivable horror of all around, Atkinson cried out, 'O God! O God! I cannot die, I cannot die! Lift me up!' The emotion excited by such a scene can be but faintly imagined. A soldier had the presence of mind to run to him, lifted him up a little, and then, by hanging at the body, mercifully put a speedy end to the misery of the poor creature by accelerating the death which the sufferer had sought, but had so feelingly expressed that he could not obtain."—Multitudes of lost souls will eternally cry, in guilt and torment, "I cannot die!"

"IT IS FINISHED."

"Jesus said, It is finished."—John xix, 30.

"Tis finished"—our Redeemer cried;
And bow'd his blessed head;
"Tis finished"—heaven and hell replied;
And earth has claim'd its dead.

"Tis finished"—the dark tomb has veil'd
The Saviour's form from view:
Again, "'tis finished," He is hail'd
A Conqueror, bursting through.

Now, Lord of glory! see him rise,
To claim an endless reign,
Bless him all earth, and shout, ye skies,
The Lamb for sinners slain!

He died, creation's crown to raise,
Then boundless be his sway!
And wide as nature be the praise
Which heaven and earth shall pay. S. F. W.

CHEAP COTTONS!

MR. Editor,—I rejoice to find you raising your voice against the great abomination of modern times—the accursed system of Negro Slavery; and shall be glad to see in your excellent publication a complete exposure of its enormities. It is a duty imposed upon every one who has a share in leading the public mind at the present important period, to take arms against the monster that has so long devoured the unhappy sons of Africa.

But as an Englishman, Mr. Editor, I feel impelled to call your immediate attention to our own country. Turn your eyes to the North of England, and say in what other part of the world the cruelties there perpetrated are to be paralleled. Read the Evidence taken before the Parliamentary Committee. Children too young to work at all, driven to labour day and night, by the terror of straps and sticks, which are unsparingly used upon their tender bodies to force their attention when over-wearied nature demands the refreshment of sleep! Fathers exercising these cruelties upon their own children! The most debasing and disgusting exhibitions of vice and immorality; joined with a degree of poverty and wretchedness that barely enables the victims of this atrocious factory system to drag on a miserable existence that hardly deserves the name of life! And as the necessary consequence of all this, a total absence of any thing like religion or morality!

Can it be that all this is occurring in Christian Britain? Is this the reason we can buy "cheap cottons?" Oh! the monstrous evils that are generated by the cursed love of money! And in the face of all this horrid cruelty and depravity, the men at the head of these earthly hells have the disgusting hypocrisy to call themselves Christians! Reasoning with them, Mr. Editor, would be in vain; but I hope you will not fail to arouse the feelings of your Readers on this harrowing subject; and let them know, that buyers of "cheap cottons" are in a measure partakers in this enormous guilt, if they forbear to use their utmost efforts for the overthrow of such an abomination as the present factory system.

I hope you will treat the subject fully and fearlessly at the very earliest opportunity; and in the mean time allow me to apprise your Readers, that for their "cheap cottons" they not only pay the little money that is charged for them; but, by consulting the "Evidence" alluded to, they will find that they ought to reckon the following items as forming part of the price:—to wit,

I. The most hard-hearted cruelty.
II. The most disgusting indecency.
III. A total depravity of manners.
IV. A consequent absence of even the semblance of religion.
V. The premature destruction of the body.
VI. The everlasting perdition of the immortal soul!

These, Readers of the Christian's Penny Magazine! these are part of the price you pay for "cheap cottons;" and now wrap yourselves round, and rejoice in their cheapness—if you can!

I am a father, Mr. Editor, and this I hope will be my sufficient excuse for the warmth of this Letter. I trust you will take up the subject with energy. Suffer not yourself to be blinded by the interested cant of the danger of interfering with the freedom of trade; which in this case means just the freedom to oppress those who are unable to resist:—trade had better perish altogether than be carried on as it is at present in the manufacture of cotton. Do your duty fearlessly; and may the Lord add his effectual blessing to your labours.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XIV.

On Amusements.

Dear Madam,

The word amusements signifies those pursuits to which we turn from laborious avocations. Such pursuits seem required by the very nature of man, whose universal and therefore native tendency is, to seek relief from severe exertion, whether of body or of mind, by applying to other employments which he can perform with ease, and which relieve the fatigue of steadfast attention.

This appears to be the proper idea of amusements, and this their proper use. When, on the other hand, the pursuits coming under this denomination occupy more of a person's attention than they ought, or the whole of the attention, then we may justly say of him, that he spends his time in dissipation. It is however evident, that the amusements of different individuals may be widely different. I have read of a celebrated natural philosopher, whose amusement consisted simply in varying the object of his pursuit. Thus, if he had been reading pure mathematics all the morning, he found it a sufficient amusement to enter his laboratory, and make experiments in natural philosophy. This however is the case of one man in many millions. The generality of mankind feel an irresistible need of amusements of a different kind. The question then is, of what sort they ought to be for persons in general. Nor will the question seem of secondary importance, when you consider that our amusements, like all our other pursuits, have a reflex action upon our mental and moral character. In order to improve the taste, or to maintain and confirm it when good, it is often needful to regulate the amusements. At the same time, the taste when good requires to be directed in its choice. In the preceding Letters I have several times expressed my sentiments relating to this topic. They are unfavourable to toys, properly so called, of all kinds; but they advocate those recreations which are connected with health and mental improvement. Bodily exercise, associated with the contemplation of scenes of nature, or even of public buildings, &c. &c., gardening, robust games, drawing from nature, the care of birds and animals, and similar pursuits, tend to afford the recreation which is required, while they assist the cultivation of health, of the understanding, and the affections. To these incidental remarks I shall now attempt to add a more systematic consideration of the subject.

In the first place then, let music, by all means, be early cultivated, with a view to its becoming a source of amusement afterwards. Let music be cultivated very early; and then, like most things learnt at the beginning of life, the fatigue which disheartens the late learner will be unfelt, and a proficiency secured which he can seldom attain.

The instrument selected must depend much upon the taste of the learner. The more portable and the least expensive are the best, because then the recreation to be derived from it is more independent of circumstances. And next to these qualities, those instruments should be preferred which do not require the breath, in order that singing, which is of equal importance, may be associated with the performance by the performer himself. You will not need that any argument should be used to recommend the cultivation of music and singing. It formed, with good reason, a principal branch of education among the ancients. They justly deemed that it was intimately connected with the sensibility of heart which is so valuable to the usefulness and even happiness of its possessor. The choice, however, of the music to be studied is of great importance. Happily there is no scarcity of that species of it which is required. In the works of Handel, Mozart, Haydn, and the writers of church music in our own country and on the continent generally, the best materials may be found for the cultivation of this science. Nor do many later productions offer any thing objectionable. The "Sacred Melodies," so well known, both in words and music, are unobjectionable. The songs by the same author, or indeed any other songs which merely exhibit the emotions of war, or the complaints of love, or the moanings of the sorrow of this world, are not to be chosen. We have all of us a sufficient tendency to become earthly-minded, even when the attractions of the world are presented in their own unassisted fascinations. Most of the songs of the present day tend to cultivate a sickly sentimentality, equally inimical to a vigorous state of the understanding, or rectitude and genuine sensibility of heart. Agreeably with these sentiments, there seems to be no objection to attending those public musical entertainments which have none of the objectionable qualities now named. A valuable impression may be derived from the full tide of music to be heard in public performances, which can be heard nowhere else. How happy is that family, however, which includes within itself the requisites for a concert! I have heard a mother and her children sing in a manner which reminded me of that line in Burns' "Cotter's Saturday Night,"

> "Compar'd with this, Italian trills are tame."

With regard to the theatre, as conducted in its present state, no Christian parent will hesitate for a moment as to the propriety of permitting his children to attend even for a single occasion. The fascination of theatrical amusements cannot be denied, nor that they frequently afford the highest exhibition of the powers of the human mind: at the same time, these attractions are attended by the most dangerous circumstances. The audience of most large theatres contains an admixture of evidently abandoned characters: what parent could feel happy at the idea that his son or his daughter should be taken to a place where these are beheld surrounded with every glittering and fallacious quality? The plays themselves are generally replete with the most worldly, and not unfrequently with immoral sentiments. What play is there, as it came from the pen of the author, and as it is frequently acted on the stage, that a Christian brother could read to his sisters, or a Christian parent to her child? How often would the reader be required to pass over whole scenes, and to leave out many profane and blasphemous expressions, even in those scenes which he could venture to read? But I feel that to you as a Christian parent these remarks are unnecessary. The theatre is one of those amusements which the feelings and sympathies of the Christian's mind lead him sincerely and voluntarily to renounce; and if a person's mind be destitute of such feelings, then the theatre is one of those subjects upon which, with him, all argumentation is commonly thrown away. In the words of a celebrated writer, "If any person were to ask the question as to the lawfulness of the theatre as an amusement, I would waive any reply, being convinced, that if he in his own mind felt inclined to go thither, nothing that I could say would prevent him. I would rather strive to fill his mind with better feelings and principles, and then he would relinquish the theatre of his own accord."

I remain, dear Madam, &c.

Clericus.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. II.—THE POWER OF GOD.

To speak of God as merciful and just, is indeed to say much: but these attributes would be comparatively useless, did he not possess the power on all occasions to exert them. By the power of God I mean, his ability to do whatsoever pleaseth him; not merely in the creation of the world, but in his moral government of it; not in the world of matter only, but also in that of mind. And truly I cannot but think, that as much of this attribute is needed in turning the sinner into the paths of righteousness, as in commanding a world to arise out of the darkness of chaos.

In examining my subject I intend, as on former occasions, to refer back to some instances in which God has manifested this attribute.

1. We who are inhabitants of this lower world are careless and indifferent beings. We can live surrounded by all the splendid devices of Infinite Wisdom, and the mighty operations of Infinite Power, without one emotion of gratitude, reverence, or fear, towards Him at whose word all the beauties of creation burst into existence, and "for whose pleasure they are and were created." Let me however direct your attention back to that momentous period in the history of our earth, when from the right hand of the Majesty on high, the Eternal Son proceeded with an innumerable host of angels to that part of infinite space, which was destined to contain the world in which we live. As he looked on the ocean of immensity thus placed before his eyes, he called the world of matter into existence: but saw that the earth was formless, that it was void, and that darkness covered the face of the deep abyss of boundless space. Such a scene of chaotic confusion as this, was not fitted for the display of his power, nor for the habitation of the creatures whom he was about to form; and therefore with a voice, which none but "Very God of Very God" could have sent forth, he cried, Let there be light! No embassy of angels was needed to carry his wishes into execution. No skill of the mechanic, no counsel of the learned. Chaos yielded to the voice of its Maker—and there was light. But even when this point was gained, much remained to be done, for formless the earth still continued: and therefore were performed those various displays of power, love, mercy, and wisdom, which the first chapter of Genesis contains. It is needless for me to say more on this point. Every man must learn for himself, for the wonders of creation are open to the inspection of all. And when we view the formation of our own body, the mightiness of its mechanism, the intricacy of its contrivances, and the beauty of its shape—when we behold the world of animals, and that of insects, and of fishes, and mark how well each one answers the end of its creation—and when we cast our eyes upward, and view the innumerable worlds which roll over our heads,—we must indeed be wanting in feeling and sensibility, if we refuse to confess that Infinite Power was needed to produce them all. I pass on from this subject (as I shall have occasion to refer to it hereafter) to observe,

2. That the power of God is displayed in overcoming those difficulties under which human nature sinks, from the conviction that all is lost. To illustrate this I would say, that the Deliverance from Egypt presents us with a striking example of its truth. Ground down to the earth by hard and relentless task-masters, and urged to immoderate labour by the rude blow of the scourge; the children of Israel in the time of their bondage presented an appearance, and filled a situation, differing widely from that in which the kindness and munificence of Joseph had placed them. Slavery, we know, whatever may be the covering under which it is disguised, is still a bitter draught, and deeply were the oppressed Israelites obliged to drink of it. With rigour and severity all their labours were exacted of them, and the misery of being bondmen was fully appreciated by them. This was truly a deplorable situation, but this was not all. Tight as the cord had been strained around them, there was still room for increased severity; they had yet some steps higher to go, before they reached the summit of their misery. In consequence of a communication from Moses to the king of Egypt, his anger was inflamed, and he commanded that no straw should be given to the people (who were engaged in making bricks), and yet that their daily tasks should be performed. This was of course impossible. As it was, they were worked to the last extremity, they were compelled to do as much as they could: and now—deprived of means, sent to wander over the Egyptian fields to gather stubble instead of straw—was it likely they could perform their daily tasks, as when that material was plentifully furnished? Picture then to yourselves this unhappy people: oppressed by tyrants from whom they could expect no mercy; ruled by the dreadful power of chastisement; without any to stand up for, or defend them; was it possible they could hope for deliverance or expect it by any human means? Must not their heart have been sick, and their spirit faint? I need not enter into a detail of the miracles wrought by the hand of Moses during the course of their deliverance from this wretched state, observing only two things. 1. That the Egyptians had no excuse for refusing to let the Israelites go, after the convincing proofs which were afforded them of His power, who professed to be their governor. 2. That the Israelites had every reason to place implicit confidence in this Almighty Being. For we find, that the prospect soon begins to wear another aspect; that the rising sun has dispersed all the dark clouds of despondency; and that, loaded with the spoil of the Egyptians, their hearts overflowing with joyfulness, the fields and the valleys of the promised land smiling (in imagination) with plenteous harvests, and every prospect looking as bright as it possibly could,—they were "brought out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage."

Let us however follow them for a little while, and we shall find, that they had scarcely escaped out of the Egyptian territories, before another and more appalling calamity impeded their progress and shook their faith. Pharaoh had no sooner suffered them to leave his land, than he repented of having done so; and hastily calling together his mighty forces, he marched forward in the determination of bringing them back again to their task-masters and slavery. And he had doubtless great probabilities of being successful For what was the condition of the Israelites? Before them lay the Red Sea, a passage through which could by no human artifice be forced: beside them mighty and precipitous rocks reared their heads to the sky, and precluded all possibility of escape: and (what was still worse) behind them was a cruel and malicious enemy; one who had without provocation overwhelmed them with barbarities, and from whom therefore they could now expect no mercy, since they were looked upon as rebels and deserters. Their case was hopeless. They were not prepared to give battle to a regular army of Egyptian warriors, and therefore could reasonably look for nothing less than cruel murder, or no less cruel slavery. Of this they were convinced; and therefore (notwithstanding all the wonders which had contributed to bring about their deliverance) they despaired, and accused Moses of bringing them out into the wilderness for the purpose of destroying them. God permitted their condition to come to such a pitch that they could not fail to feel their own weakness, and the insufficiency of an arm of flesh to effect their safety and escape; and then the hand of Moses was stretched out: at his voice the waters of the sea rolled back: wave after wave flowed over each other, until two mighty walls of water enclosed a passage for the Israelites to go through; and thus did the ransomed of the Lord go on their way rejoicing! I add nothing to this simple declaration of a true occurrence, but leave it to produce its legitimate effect on every heart.

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

"O Death, where is thy Sting."

No. I.

REV. RICHARD CONYERS, LL.D.

Rector of St. Paul's Deptford. Died on Sunday, April 23, 1786. Aged 62.

There are some circumstances attending his death so remarkable, that we are ready to conclude he must have had some premonition of the event. As he was walking in his garden on the Monday before he died, as well as usual, he observed his servant making the walks very neat; and said to him, "It will not be long that we shall be here. You may give over I say, I shall not be long here." On the Tuesday, as he was walking again in the garden, he said to the same person, "Come and sit by me, I shall not be long here. If I die, let me be laid, when I am dead, in the parlour;" and then he conversed most sweetly and familiarly of the things of God, with a cheerful voice. To a particular friend he said: "I shall not be long, this will be the last time I shall see you; we must be in Christ Jesus, or nothing at all." He was now as well as he had been for a long time. On the Thursday, expecting to see some near relations who lived in the neighbourhood, he felt no small disappointment at their not coming, and said, "It would have been the last time, if they had come." During all this week he would repeatedly say, "I find my Jesus so precious to my soul, that I cannot express it. I am so happy in the things of God, I am so wrapt up in Jesus, that I am confident I shall not stay here long."

On the Saturday, he took his servant with him into the churchyard, and said, "I want to look out a spot for my grave: show me Mr. Baker's grave:" (a person who had been converted under his ministry, and died happy.) When he had fixed on the place, he drove a stick into it, and said, "If I should live till Monday, I will get the sexton to come and try whether there is sufficient depth of earth; but I do not think I shall hold out till Monday." On the next day, which was the Sabbath, he went to church as usual, and in the course of the service, the twentieth chapter of the Acts happened to be the second lesson for the morning. As he read it, he made several pathetic remarks on that part of it in which the Apostles call upon the Ephesian Elders to record, that he had not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God, and intimates that they should see his face no more. This proved, in the issue, but too applicable to his own case. In his comment, he called upon their consciences solemnly to witness, that he was clear of their blood. In his discourse, which he preached from Matthew xxviii, 18, "All power is given to me in heaven and in earth," he largely and sweetly dwelt on the Godhead and Satisfaction of Jesus Christ, adoring the grace that had enabled him to preach Him, and directing the people to remember that Christ lived, and that all their happiness for time and eternity was treasured up in Him.

In pronouncing the blessing, his speech seemed to falter, which only those who were near him could perceive; and finding himself seized with the stroke of death, he called to his man who stood near him, and said, "I cannot get from my knees." His servant raised him up, being perfectly helpless, but sensible. His crowded audience were instantly thrown into shrieks and tears. Several of his friends assisted in bringing him from the pulpit; and as they carried him along the aisle, with tears on his cheeks and a smile on his countenance, he waved his hand to the people, bidding them a final farewell. Being taken to his house, he said, "I have no pain: God's will be done, I hope I shall soon be with Jesus." Nor was he disappointed; for at four o'clock in the afternoon, his soul took its triumphant flight to everlasting glory.

Funeral Sermon, preached by the Rev. John Newton, Rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, London, from 1 Thess. ii, 8.

OUR LONG NEGLECTED BRITISH TARS!

Many attempts have been made to benefit poor sailors, but very, very little has yet been done for them. There are two asylums where a few get shelter for a day or two; one conducted by Capt. Gambier, &c., the other by Mr. Knight. The gospel is sent to the ends of the earth, by means of sailors, at a great expense! They return, are robbed of their hard-earned wages: others are shipwrecked, and their few remaining clothes sold for bread; they die for want of care, being far away from their parish, and no one is concerned for the souls of poor sailors! What are all our evangelical clergymen waiting for? To bring about a plan that shall be permanent to evangelize our seamen, and by the blessing of Jehovah to encourage them to be missionaries. Look at the skeleton of the Sailors' Home!—the wreck in Wellclose Square! The Merchant Seaman's Hospital at Lloyd's, and the Port of London Society, &c.

May the Lord incline the hearts of his faithful servants to implore Him to provide a Refuge for them, who supply our tables with the produce of foreign climes, at the hazard of their own lives!

A King's Letter for a general collection at every place of worship throughout the empire would be the means of providing them with a good harbour, where they might ride in safety all the rest of their lives, and have hope in death.—A True Friend to Sailors.

Insincere Profession of Christianity.—Aygoland, a Moorish king, having waged war with Charlemagne, was induced, as was customary with conquered princes in those dark ages, to profess the Christian faith, in order to obtain peace on more advantageous terms. For this purpose he repaired to the French court with prodigious pomp; and observing there a great number of poor men, who were fed and clothed by the Emperor's bounty, inquired who they were. The reply was, "They are the servants of God." "What!" said the heathen prince, "are the servants of God so poor and wretched, while the servants of the Emperor are so rich and fine? I did intend to be baptized and become a Christian; but now I am resolved never to serve that God who keeps his servants no better!"

Caryl, an old commentator, who relates this anecdote, observes with much point, "What this ignorant prince spoke out freely, many speak secretly in their hearts: they will not serve Christ upon self-denying and suffering terms."

REMARKS ON ANCIENT LITERATURE.

A taste for reading is the allowed characteristic of every nation that has pretensions to civilization. The inhabitants of every newly-discovered island, after a few years' experience has remodelled their manners and customs, display this feature very strikingly. A thirst for knowledge is inherent in the human mind; and though this inclination may run riot if unrestrained and uncurbed, still the principle remains the same, and the abuse of it cannot bear down our consciousness of its high importance.

On the destruction of the old Roman Empire, the barbarous spirit of the conquerors condemned to the flames the noble libraries which the munificence of the Constantine dynasty had founded. Their zeal in this destruction being apparently actuated by the opinion, that a people deprived of the enthusiastic orations of a Demosthenes, or the heart-stirring history of their warlike forefathers, would soon become benighted in ignorance, and debased beyond the possibility of their ever recovering the high estate from which they had fallen.

This ruthless antipathy to every vestige of virtue and of heroism, effectually answered the desired purpose, and none of the ancient classic works were preserved, except in small and scattered libraries, which Providence seemed especially to protect for the enlightening of future ages.

The middle ages of the Christian era were consequently enveloped in almost impervious darkness, the people were immersed in grossness, and ignorance overspread the land. But the active principle of the mind of man was still the same, it slumbered and it slept, but it was not destroyed; there was occasionally that faint glimmering in the mental horizon, which served not only to render the darkness more awfully visible, but as a beacon to guide the wandering steps of some benighted pilgrim.

As a stream confined within narrow banks rushes on with greater impetuosity, or as the rays of the sun concentrated into one focus burn with more intense heat, so this desire for knowledge, acting on more condensed or limited materials, produced the most surprising and incredible effects.

We accordingly find it stated, that when a single book was bequeathed to a friend or relation, it was seldom done without many stipulations and conditions. If given to a monastery, it was thought that so valuable a present merited eternal salvation; and the donor with great ceremony offered it upon the altar, and the most formidable anathemas were denounced against those who should dare to alienate it.

The Prior and Convent of Rochester declared, that they would pronounce the irrevocable sentence of damnation on him who should purloin a Latin translation of a work of Aristotle, or even obliterate the title.

The inconvenience and impediments to study were so numerous from the scarcity of books, that in the reign of Henry VI, by one of the statutes of St. Mary's College, Oxford, it is ordered, "that no scholar shall occupy a book in the library above an hour at most, so that others may not be hindered from the use of the same."

In 1471, when Louis XI of France wanted to borrow the works of an Arabian physician from the Faculty at Paris, he was compelled not only to deposit by way of pledge for its return a quantity of valuable plate, but was also obliged to procure a nobleman to join with him as security in a deed, by which, under very considerable forfeiture, he bound himself to return it.

THE CANON OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT SCRIPTURES ASCERTAINED;

Or the Bible Complete without the Apocrypha and Unwritten Tradition. By Archibald Alexander, D.D. Professor of Theology in Prince Town College, New Jersey. Author of a "Brief Outline of the Evidences of the Christian Religion." A New Edition, with Introductory Remarks by John Morrison, D.D. 12mo. cloth, 5*s*. pp. 418. London.

We know not in what terms, sufficiently strong, to give a worthy recommendation of this volume, with that brevity which is required in the Christian's Penny Magazine. In early life this was a subject which engaged our most anxious inquiry; and we have no doubt of the same solicitude influencing the minds of many of our inquisitive readers. The Canonical Authority, and the consequent satisfaction with the Holy Scriptures, is one of the most interesting, as it will be found one of the most edifying considerations of our young friends; and we beseech them, especially those who are connected with a circle of reading friends, to procure this unusually valuable work: in real importance, it is worth a thousand volumes of such as invite the attention under the denomination of Popular New Works.

Dr. Alexander states the question thus: "The Bible includes a large number of separate books, published in different ages, during a space of more than fifteen hundred years. Each of these books, when first published, formed a volume; or, at least, the writings of each author were, in the beginning, distinct; and if they had continued in that separate form, and had been transmitted to us in many volumes, instead of one, their authority would not, on this account, have been less, nor their usefulness diminished. Their collection into one volume, is merely a matter of convenience."

Referring to the addition of the Apocryphal Books by the Roman Catholics, the author says, "The inquiry, therefore, is not optional, but forces itself upon every conscientious man: for, as no one is at liberty to reject from the sacred volume one sentence, much less a whole book of the revelation of God; so, no one has a right to add any thing to the word of God; and, of consequence, no one may receive as divine, what others have without authority added to the Holy Scriptures. Every man, therefore, according to his opportunity and capacity, is under a moral obligation to use his best endeavours to ascertain what books do, really and of right, belong to the Bible. An error here, on either side, is dangerous: for on the one hand, if we reject a part of divine revelation, we dishonour God, and deprive ourselves of the benefit which might be derived from that portion of divine truth; and on the other hand, we are guilty of an equal offence, and may suffer an equal injury, by adding spurious productions to the Holy Scriptures; for thus we adulterate and poison the fountain of life, and subject our consciences to the authority of mere men."

"The two great questions most deserving the attention of all men, are—First, Whether the Bible, and all that it contains, is from God?—Secondly, What are those truths which the Bible was intended to teach us? These two grand inquiries are sufficient to give occupation and vigorous exercise to intellectual faculties of the highest order; and they are not removed entirely out of the reach of plain, uneducated Christians."

THE SENATE HOUSE AND GREAT ST. MARY'S CHURCH, CAMBRIDGE.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.

BRIDGE UNIVERSITY is the second celebrated seat earning in the British empire. Our readers, there-, cannot fail to be interested in a sketch of its ry; especially as we gave some historic and de-tive notices of OXFORD UNIVERSITY, in the Twenty-Number of the Christian's Penny Magazine.

ambridge, or, as it is frequently called in history, ntbridge, is eligibly situated on the river CAM, from h it takes its name, distant fifty-two miles nearly h from London. Besides the parish churches, its cipal public buildings are, the SENATE HOUSE, PUBLIC SCHOOLS, the UNIVERSITY LIBRARY, the
WILLIAM MUSEUM, the ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVA-
Y, thirteen COLLEGES, and four HALLS which ess equal privileges, together with the CHAPELS hed to the Colleges. Of these latter, that belong-to King's College is truly magnificent. Of this ndid building we purpose giving a more particular unt in some future number of the Christian's Penny azine.

ambridge is "divided into fourteen parishes, each which, with one exception, is provided with a ch." Cambridge is believed to have been a fortistation of the Romans, and to have been called by CAMBORITUM. Some suppose it to have been an ancient British settlement; and they pretend to carry up the date of its literary glory to a period of nearly four centuries anterior to the Christian era!

When the University of Cambridge was founded, is, however, quite uncertain. Many conceive it was established as a public seminary for youth, soon after the introduction of Christianity among the Saxons, especially as it was found excessively expensive and dangerous to send the British youth to Rome. Sigebert, king of the East Angles, about A. D. 630, is believed to have patronized this infant academy.

Much uncertainty attaches to this statement; and if it be true, the Saxon divisions and the ferocity of the Danes, by turns, laid waste this nursery of learning. In 1010, Cambridge was plundered, and totally destroyed with fire, by the Danish soldiers, in their predatory warfare.

William, the Norman Conqueror, having established himself in England, built a castle at Cambridge, and, as some say, patronized leaning so as to entrust the education of his younger son, Henry I, to the governors of this University. But in A. D. 1110, the tenth year of that monarch, no university existed at Cambridge, according to Peter of Blois; when Joffrid, abbot of Croyland, originated or revived this seminary. Mr. Milner, in his Church History, speaking of the revival of learning at Oxford and Cambridge, gives the following account:—"It revived, however, in some degree about the year 1109, when Gislebert, with three other monks, was sent by the abbot of Croyland to his manor of Cottenham, near Cambridge. These monks went every day to Cambridge, where they hired a barn as a convenient place for public lectures. One read grammar in the morning, a second read logic at one o'clock, and a third, at three in the afternoon, gave lectures on rhetoric, from Tully and Quinctilian. Gislebert himself preached on Sundays and other holidays. The barn was soon found insufficient to contain the auditors; and therefore accommodations were provided for the labours of these men, in different parts of the town. Such is the account which Peter of Blois gives of the infant state of learning in the University of Cambridge."

Prosperity continuing to attend the labours of the lecturers at Cambridge, many pious persons and lovers of learning made provision for the subsistence of regular professors, and for the convenience of students; colleges, therefore, were begun to be built and endowed in the reigns of Edward I and II.

The following is a list of the Colleges, with the dates of their foundation, and the names of their founders.

Cambridge University is governed by a CHANCELLOR, who at present is his Royal Highness the Duke of Gloucester; a HIGH-STEWARD, who is also a person of high rank; a VICE-CHANCELLOR; two PROCTORS; a PUBLIC ORATOR; two LIBRARIANS; a REGISTRARY; and three ESQUIRE BEDELLS.

In how great a degree Cambridge University has contributed by its scholars and divines to advance the cause of pure religion and scriptural Christianity, we will not attempt to compute: but our intelligent readers will not fail to recognize the services of Bilney, Fryth, Rogers, Ridley, Bradford, Saunders, Glover, Latimer, Cranmer, who were educated at Cambridge, and became martyrs for the doctrines of Christ: Grindal, Walton, Bedell, Davenant, Hall, Jeremy Taylor, Beveridge, Lightfoot, Strype, Pearson, Poole, Patrick, Tillotson, Parkhurst, Paley, Milton, Bryant, and Sir Isaac Newton, are names which are held in the highest estimation by the friends of scriptural religion; and these were scholars of Cambridge.

It would be unjust not to mention the venerable Mr. Simeon, Senior Fellow of King's College, whose countenance afforded to pious young men in that University has been an incalculable blessing to the nation; and besides his zealous co-operation with most of the institutions established to promote the enlargement of the Redeemer's kingdom, his "Outlines of Sermons upon the whole Scriptures" have been the most valuable helps to the clergy in their preparations for the pulpit.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE SABBATH, CONSIDERED MEDICALLY.

WHO can tell the importance to man, of the Divine institution of the Sabbath! Considered morally, politically, or medically, it is worthy of the wisdom and goodness of its blessed Author. The following testimony of Dr. Farre, will, we are sure, interest all our readers. It was given before the Committee of the House of Commons.

"July 16, 1832. J. R. Farre, M. D., called in, and examined.

Q. You have practised as a physician many years?—A. Yes, between thirty and forty years.

Q. Have you had occasion to observe the effect of the observance and non-observance of the seventh day of rest during that time?—A. I have. I have been in the habit, during a great many years, of considering the uses of the Sabbath, and of observing its abuses. The abuses are chiefly manifested in labour and dissipation. The use, medically speaking, is that of a day of rest: in a Theological sense it is a holy rest, providing for the introduction of new and sublimer ideas into the mind of man, preparing him for his future state. As a day of rest, I view it as a day of compensation for the inadequate restorative power of the body under continued labour and excitement. A physician always has respect to the preservation of the restorative power, because, if once this be lost, his healing office is at an end. If I show you from the physiological view of the question, that there are provisions in the laws of nature which correspond with the Divine commandments, you will see from the analogy that the "Sabbath was made for man" as a necessary appointment. A physician is anxious to preserve the balance of circulation, as necessary to the restorative power of the body. The ordinary exertions of man run down the circulation every day of his life; and the first general law of nature, by which God (who is not only the giver, but also the preserver and sustainer of life) prevents man from destroying himself, is the alternating of day with night, that repose may succeed action. But although the night apparently equalizes the circulation well, yet it does not sufficiently restore its balance for the attainment of a long life. Hence, one day in seven, by the bounty of Providence, is thrown in as a day of compensation, to perfect by its repose the animal system. You may easily determine this question as a matter of fact by trying it on beasts of burthen. Take that fine animal the horse, and work him to the full extent of his powers every day in the week, or give him rest one day in seven; and you will soon perceive, by the superior vigour with which he performs his functions on the other six days, that this rest is necessary to his well-being. Man, possessing a superior nature, is borne along by the very vigour of his mind; so that the injury of continued diurnal exertion and excitement on his animal system is not so immediately apparent as it is in the brute; but in the long run he breaks down more suddenly: it abridges the length of his life, and that vigour of his old age, which (as to mere animal power) ought to be object of his preservation. I consider therefore, that in the bountiful provision of Providence for the preservation of human life, the Sabbatical appointment is not, as it has been sometimes Theologically viewed, simply a precept partaking of the nature of a political institution, but that it is to be numbered amongst the natural duties; if the preservation of life be admitted to be a duty, and the premature destruction of it a suicidal act. This is said simply as a physician, and without reference at all to the Theological question. But if you consider further the proper effect of real Christianity, namely, peace of mind, confiding trust in God, and good-will to man, you will perceive this source of renewed vigour to the mind, and through the mind to the body, an additional spring of life, imparted from the higher use of the Sabbath as a holy rest. Were I to pursue this part of the question, I should be touching on the duties committed to the clergy; but this I will say, that researches in physiology, by the analogy of the workings of Providence in nature, will establish the truth of Revelation, and consequently show, that the Divine commandment is not to be considered as an arbitrary enactment, but as an appointment necessary to man. This is the position in which I would place it, as contradistinguished from precept and legislation. I would point out the Sabbatical rest as necessary to man; and that the great enemies of the Sabbath, and consequently the enemies of man, are, all laborious exercise of the body or mind, and dissipation, which force the circulation on that day in which it should repose; whilst relaxation from the ordinary cares of life, the enjoyment of this repose in the bosom of one's family, with the religious studies and duties which the day enjoins, not one of which, if rightly exercised, tend to abridge life, constitute the beneficial and appropriate service of the day. The student of nature, in becoming the student of CHRIST, will find in the principles of his doctrine and law, and in the practical application of them, the only and perfect science which prolongs the present, and perfects the future life."

CHRISTIAN CONFIDENCE.

"They that know thy name will put their trust in thee," Psalm ix, 10.

Thou art, O God! the joy and pride
  Of those, who make thy name their stay;
And love shall bless, and light shall guide,
  Each trusting wanderer on his way!
Where'er we are, whate'er we do,
Thy mercies meet us fresh and new!

Could we but with unclouded eyes
  Through all thy dispensations view,
How fair then would the scene arise,
  Of mercy's beams still shining through;
E'en sorrow's darkest cloud would wear
Some light, to show that love was there.

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

He sets up in Business, and settles with a Family.

WILLIAM completed his seven years apprenticeship the day on which he attained the twentieth year of his age. His master found that it would be a serious loss to spare his services, and therefore made him an offer of wages, which was considered liberal: but he would continue no longer in the employment of one, who had treated him in many respects unworthily, and even cruelly.

From the debasing habit of frequent and excessive drinking, his master had seriously neglected his business, for the last two years especially: sometimes remaining from home, in company not to be named, for two or three days and nights together: intemperance brutalized his manners; and acts of petty tyranny, and even barbarity, the most shameful in its character, were the natural consequences. Timid as William was naturally, prepared by the fear of God in a great degree to suffer evil, and without any influential friend in the town, he was necessitated to lay some of the long grievances of himself and fellow-apprentices before a magistrate; who threatened the master with the cancelling of the indentures, unless the unusual complaints were immediately remedied. They could not be denied: and every thing required was readily promised, his master acknowledging that he had no fault to find with William, and admitting that he had never neglected his business for an hour, during about five years of his servitude, which had already transpired.

One subsequent act of unkindness, may, on several accounts, with propriety be here mentioned:—When the father of William died, about fourteen months before the termination of his apprenticeship, he was sent for to attend the funeral: but his master observed, that as he could do no good to his father, his going was unnecessary, and that he would not suffer him to undertake the journey, and that he wanted certain work completed. William offered to finish all the work that was required, and then, travelling all night, to attend the last sad offices for his parent: but inhumanity, superinduced by irreligion and intemperance, pronounced a coarse and frowning refusal. This was felt as a most grievous affliction to William; and every one of his shopmates was indignant at the unfeelingness thus displayed, and united in recommending him to go without leave, daring his master to punish him, or notice the disobedience. But the fear of God prevailed, and William submitted, "casting all his care upon the Lord," believing that "He cared for him;" and he was enabled by the Divine grace, not only to be patient, and resigned to his holy will, but even to pray for his unfeeling master, according to the precept and example of his blessed Lord and Saviour; at the same time confident, that all his difficulties would conduce to his advantage.

Released from the obligations of an apprentice, William had to make a beginning in the world; and without property, the indispensable means of embarking in business for himself. But he possessed two things of inestimable value; things for which he had for a long time earnestly prayed to his heavenly Father, and for which he had carefully and perseveringly laboured, under many unrighteous impositions. He had a good character; against which, malice itself could not establish an objection: and he was acknowledged to possess the ability of a good workman, his reputation for which had been blazed abroad, even by his master, on all occasions, especially when in his cups, challenging any one to produce his equal.

Trade at that time was in a particularly flourishing state, and the character of William having been testified by his master himself, and his work being known to the principal in a large wholesale house, on his application, every requisite was supplied on the third day after he had left his servitude, to enable him to enter on business; and though the most dishonourable attempts were made to injure him, by various insinuations as to his secret intentions relating to the property with which it was supposed he had been entrusted, and that without any security, they were candidly mentioned to William, but not credited. William declared some of his intentions, which had indeed been secret, but they related to supporting his widowed mother: thus respect for him was created; and by the gracious help of God, he never dishonoured the high confidence thus reposed in him.

William reflected upon the case of his mother being left a widow, and in necessitous circumstances, with four children; and regarding it as a call of Providence to assist them, he promptly determined on acting the part of a father to the family. Arrangements were made, and in six weeks after his apprenticeship terminated, his mother removed from the country to keep his house: his two brothers he took apprentices to his own business; and his two sisters, who were the youngest, he put to school. Providence, kind and gracious, evidently smiled upon his industrious diligence, prospering the work of his hands, giving him favour in the sight of those with whom he transacted business, blessing him, and making him a blessing to others.

Feeling alive to the inestimable importance of personal religion, William did not fail to lead his mother and family to the house of God, and to direct their attention to the things that belong to their everlasting peace. But his religious profession and connections required more than attendance at the house of God; they brought him into contact with many of those who were accustomed to worship God as families: the practice commended itself to his judgment, as rational and proper and necessary; and he found that it was agreeable to the custom of the people of God, as recorded in the Holy Scriptures. This was sufficient to determine the mind of William; and having found a discourse on "Family Religion," among Whitfield's Sermons, written upon the remarkable words of Joshua, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord," Josh. xxiv, he at once decided on introducing the subject, and on following so worthy an exaple. He had the approbation of his friends whom he consulted on the occasion, and he was encouraged by their cordial recommendation.

William made known his wishes to his mother; showed her the sermon on the subject; read it in the evening in the presence of the family, who all appeared willing to comply with his desire, not making the slightest objection; and from that day forward, the God of nature, of providence, and of salvation, was acknowledged and worshipped daily, by the reading of the Holy Scriptures, and prayer.

With admiring gratitude did William often look back upon those eventful and delightful days of his early history, wondering at the goodness of God, in preserving him while inexperienced in worldly transactions and young in years, and opening ways in his merciful providence so favourable to his wishes, and so far beyond his expectations. He saw with the most heartfelt satisfaction, his mother, as he believed, embrace the gospel of Christ, brought to the knowledge of "the truth as it is in Jesus" by her son's manifest devotedness to God, and in answer to his prayers. The same distinguished happiness, he had grounds to believe, became the blessed portion of one of each, if not of both his brothers and sisters. Of the whole of them he had reason to hope "things that accompany salvation."

Remarkably favoured in business, and blessed with a kind and careful mother to manage his domestic affairs, William, diligent in his habits, and devoting a full measure of his hours daily to the claims of his trade and the manufactory, by early rising, allowing himself but six hours bed, redeemed a considerable portion of his time for mental improvement. He felt his ignorance on divine things especially, and determined upon rather an extensive course of reading for a tradesman, embracing particularly the Evidences of Christianity and Church History; and by regularity and perseverance for a few years upon this plan, he made considerable progress. Instead of it interfering with the claims of his ordinary business, it afforded him daily relief and the most solid pleasure.

Most happily for him, anticipating his wishes, about this period, a few intelligent, pious, and liberal-minded gentlemen, members of the Independent and Baptist congregations of the Rev. Messrs. Birt, Edwards, and Bennett, and of those attending the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Burn, projected a select Theological Library in Birmingham. The plan was adopted, contributions were liberal, and it soon included several hundred volumes of the choicest standard works of sound Divinity, a great part of which William read with considerable attention and profit, making extracts of various of the most striking passages.

William was not satisfied with direct reading: he began to reflect upon his Latin exercises at the Grammar school; perceiving the value of that language from the numerous passages he met with in the several Theological works. He had neglected that study during almost all his apprenticeship; but he determined now, if possible, on recovering what he had lost, and on making some further progress in that ancient language; not without some secret hope, though perhaps at a distant day, of being able to examine the records of the Gospel of salvation in the consecrated language of Greece. In these hopes he was not a little encouraged by the concluding paragraph of the Latin Grammar, about that time published by Dr. Smith of Homerton College. He obtained assistance, and his success, ultimately, almost equalled his expectations, if it did not satisfy his wishes.

To excite and stimulate a class of persons such as William, that learned Tutor remarks—"If to the prosecution of this course of study, the leisure hours were devoted which most young men can command on the six days of the week, I can scarcely doubt, that an useful and gratifying measure of attainment would be made in three or four years; and then it may be hoped that warmer zeal, aided by satisfactory experience, will prompt the lover of these fair regions of literature, to urge a similar career in the Greek language. Dr. Valpy's excellent Grammar, with the concomitant aid of the Westminster, will open the path; and the late Professor Dalzel's Analecta, and his Collectanea, will make it delightfully pleasant. In that path the lover of knowledge and virtue will not only be charmed by the attractions of Ionic sweetness and Attic elegance; but he will hear the dictates of Eternal Wisdom, in humble simplicity of words, yet with celestial majesty of sentiment, from teachers whom the Son of God commissioned, and the Spirit of Truth inspired."

"That man is quite unable to do any thing for himself spiritually, is one of the most mortifying truths in the word of God: it is a stream which runs in direct opposition to man's pride."

HINTS FOR PROMOTING THE NATIONAL REFORM.

It was an apothegm of one of our most distinguished senators, "that our passions forge our fetters;" in which language is obviously implied, that much of that inquietude and discord so generally prevalent amongst us is the offspring of our own corrupt propensities. Admitting this to be the fact, as unquestionably it is, it must readily be conceded, that self-reformation will be the most effectual step towards promoting that integrity, truth, and justice, on which the best interests of mankind, individually and collectively, so mainly depend. The page of history informs us, that the wisest and the most prudent of legislative measures are ineffectual to the accomplishment of their purposes, where there exists in the people a spirit of covetousness and insubordination. They may for a period serve to stem the torrent of corruption, which, were it not for these wholesome flood-gates of restraint, would soon burst the barriers; and possibly present a scene of uncontrollable anarchy, not very dissimilar to that lately instanced in a neighbouring country.

It is a truth as certain as it is little remembered, that "righteousness exalteth a nation, but that sin is a reproach to any people." This plain maxim, which coming as it does from the wisest of men, and from Revelation, we may justly be entitled to assume as our postulatum, and in conformity to which it is proposed to offer a few hints, which it is hoped may not be considered presumptuous or unreasonable at the present crisis.

First, it cannot be denied, that in this our land there exist the means by which every individual may be adequately and comfortably supported. England is not a barren soil: her peasantry should be her pride: we do not affirm that the reverse is literally the case, but we maintain, that generally they have not their proper balance in the national scale. Let then the great Christian law of love extend itself more widely. Let not all seek their own, but every man another's wealth. Let not the public mind be so absorbed on subjects of doubtful policy. Let not the commonalty of our realm imagine, that a panacea for every physical and moral evil, is contained in the word Reform. Let our rulers show, that while they are the terror of evil doers, they are also to the praise of them that do well. And let all classes remember, that it is their duty, as opportunity may be afforded or ability may be given, to labour to advance the present and future welfare of mankind. If this law of love operated more strongly through the different ranks of society, we should not have reason to complain of the burthen under which we now groan; gladness would brighten the face of nature, the wilderness would become a fruitful field, the desert would blossom as the rose. England, with a proud pre-eminence, has in the excellency of her institutions and appointments afforded an example to the other nations of the world; but her horizon appears now to be partially obscured. She has not, however, irrecoverably fallen: her walls may even yet be built again in troublous times. Let each then proceed in the work of his own reformation; for the moral improvement of the nation must depend upon individual exertion. The united efforts of all in their respective stations, towards the benefit of their fellow-men, towards whatever may advance the honour and interests of their country, will not be unavailing. May this be the case, that righteousness and peace dwelling in our land, God may give us his blessing; for He it is who ruleth over the kingdom of men, and however much they may arrogate to themselves, He that sitteth on high is mightier.

May not our sinful passions, nor our private interests, disappoint any endeavours for the public good; may the Sovereign so possess the hearts of his people, that they may never be wanting in honour to his person, and dutiful submission to his authority; may his reign be prosperous; and may "truth and justice, religion and piety, be established amongst us for all generations."

Philanthropos.

THE CHARACTER OF CALEB.

Notice the difference between the character of Caleb and the generality of the Israelites. "He had another spirit with him;" theirs was a disobedient spirit, though they promised so fairly at Sinai, Deut. v, 27, but his was an obedient spirit. He approved cordially of the Divine government and the holy law of God: so must we, if we would follow the Lord. John xiv, 21. Theirs was a rebellious spirit, Isa. lxiii, 10; but Caleb's was a spirit of submission, ready to suffer as well as to perform the Divine will. Theirs was a distrustful, cowardly spirit: his was a courageous, resolute spirit, Num. xiii, 30; xiv, 9. Theirs was an unbelieving spirit, Num. xiv, 11, "So we see they could not enter in because of unbelief:" but Caleb had a spirit of faith, depending on the Divine all-sufficiency and veracity. Theirs was a selfish spirit, they cared only for their own ease, safety, and temporal enjoyment: but Caleb had a disinterested, self-denying spirit; he entered into God's views, he cared for God's glory, as Moses also did, Num. xiv, 12—19: and thus our Lord has taught us, "If any one will follow me, he must deny himself." Theirs was at best an indolent, discontented spirit. Diligence is of importance in the things of this life, and so it certainly is in religion. Our Lord hates lukewarmness. He requires his people to be zealous, and He well deserves our utmost exertion. Consider then how needful a like spirit is, that we may follow the Lord fully. "He hath followed me fully," saith the Lord of Caleb, and the same phrase is used repeatedly in Joshua. We are called to an heavenly inheritance; but we must travel through a wilderness, and encounter hosts of foes, conquer the world, the flesh, and the devil, fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold on eternal life. But to this end it is necessary that we should follow the Lord fully, and to this purpose we must unite with Him in our ends. He chose us, that we might be holy. He predestinated us to be conformed to the image of his Son. Christ gave himself for us, to redeem us from all iniquity, to bring us to God, to save us from this present evil world. He meant to purify unto himself "a peculiar people, called unto holiness, formed to show forth his praise." A right spirit will unite with God in these ends, and will consequently fall in with answerable means. If we have a right spirit, we shall resign ourselves to the Divine guidance,—shall be willing to subject ourselves to the Divine government, and resign ourselves to the disposal of God's providence. We shall be willing that God should choose for us. We must rely entirely on the Divine promises, and God's all-sufficiency and fidelity to execute them. "God has spoken, in his holiness I will rejoice." We must seek the destruction of God's enemies, and long for every thing to be destroyed that is hostile to him. We must be universal in our obedience. We must keep our eye on One perfect example; and ask ourselves how Christ would have acted in similar circumstances. We must never be contented till we obtain full possession of the promised rest, the presence and enjoyment of God.

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

No. II.—THE POWER OF GOD.

3. Hitherto I have dwelt only on those mighty works which were wrought by God in behalf of his chosen people; and did space permit, and were it necessary, I could add much more to the little that has been brought forward. Let me, however, leave the affairs of nations for the more interesting topic of personal experience. And sure I am, that in this the power of God is as much displayed as in the other. I might set before you all the miseries attendant on a life of licentiousness, and prove how God has made a man's own iniquities bring about his punishment. I might tell you of mighty warriors, whose ambition soared far beyond human calculation, who were nevertheless cut off in the prime of their life, and robbed of their brilliant expectations; and I might fill volumes in demonstrating how wonderfully God has in every instance made the wrath of man to praise him, and restrained the remainder of wrath. But I would rather leave that part of the subject untouched, while I mention something respecting that powerful assistance of the Almighty, which subdues every enormity of human depravity, which suits itself to every emergency of human suffering, and eases every weight of human woe.

Let me first of all bid you look at the man whose mind is engrossed either by the delusions of false gaiety, the cares of this life, or the deceitfulness of riches. Nothing affords him any gratification which does not tend in some way or other to promote the interest of his darling idol, and he clearly lives without any serious consideration on the shortness of life, or the certainty of another world. That this is the case with a vast number of the present generation, the experience of every one must bear witness; for where is the man of the world who is not surrounded by many companions whose sentiments and conduct resemble his own? and where is the Christian, who does not secretly lament over the thoughtlessness and spiritual indifference of many of those with whom he is connected? When however it comes to pass, that one of these careless ones is brought over to the cause of religion, and being convinced of the vanity of earthly enjoyments, resolves to seek first of all the kingdom of God and his righteousness, I should like to know by what means he is thus converted. Some may say, that the powerful preaching of the Gospel has brought about the change: but let me ask, how comes it then, that so many are still indifferent under the very same minister? If there were any power in eloquence or pathos effectually to change the heart, we should not have cause to complain that our ministers stretch out their hands to a regardless people. Though therefore I am willing to own, that as an instrument, none can be more powerful than the preaching of the Gospel, yet I cannot ascribe to it in any case the honour of saving a soul from death. Others may inquire, Is it not then the man's own common sense which has suggested to him convincing reasons why he should change his course of life? Alas! no. Can a rushing torrent of waters arrest its course at any given spot? Can the madman regain his senses whenever he thinks fit? Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? No! must be the answer returned to each of these inquiries: and equally impossible is it for those who are deluded by Satan, and carried captive by a thousand evil inclinations, to regain the path of virtue, and change themselves into servants of the Living God? There is but one Power able to accomplish this: human arguments, and human eloquence, are counted but a vain thing to save a man; and all the energy of true devotedness, and all the earnestness of Christian charity, will be of no avail until the Spirit of the Lord touches the sinner's heart, and commands it to be softened. Every Christian, therefore, is a trophy of the Power of God; every converted sinner proclaims to the world, that there is a Spirit ever busy in this earth of ours, which possesses the power of arresting the course of the prodigal, and conducting him back again to his Father's house: and the express declaration of God himself is, "Not by might, nor by power (that is, human power), but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."

But it is not only in converting the sinner, that the power of God is manifested. Many other cases equally bear on them the impression of supernatural agency. When the heart begins to fail, and the spirit to faint, and when the chill cold hand of poverty seems ready to grasp us, is it not Divine Power which renders assistance, and never fails to relieve all such as faithfully seek its interference? When the sorrows and distresses of life press sorely upon us, how comes it that the Christian can smile, and be contented? What is it that affords him a consolation, which the man of the world clearly knows nothing about? Surely we must own it is the Power of God alone, which is able to make sorrow and sighing flee away. To enter into any detail on these points is unnecessary. Every man has his own sufferings, and every man has his own consolations. Nevertheless, they are all brought about by the powerful and mighty agency of that Spirit, who divideth to every man severally as he will.

But there is one scene through which we must all pass: there is yet an event to happen to the many millions who now inhabit this earth, in which each one will need the Power of God. There is the Valley of the Shadow of Death, lying straight before us, and cross it we must. Oh! this is a dreadful consideration; it is one calculated to bring the loftiest of us into the dust before his Maker, and wring from the proudest of us a humble supplication for mercy. Die we must! and when the last gasp of expiring nature is all of mortality that remains, when the last groan is quivering on our lips, and when one moment more will bring before us all the awful realities of the unseen world; where shall we find one who will be willing to rely on his own strength, and enter the presence of his Maker in his own righteousness? To talk of death, and to die, are two very different things; and he who has most loudly protested his fearlessness of its consequences, will be the very first to quake and to tremble when the awful reality flashes across his mind, that "this night his soul may be required of him."

Every professedly rational system of religion has this object in view; but, alas! it is not every system which accomplishes its object. BUT ONE specific has been found; BUT ONE staff strong enough to support the weight of a dying mortal, and that is CHRISTIANITY. Let me then for one moment dwell on the triumphant scene which the death-bed of a Christian presents. We behold stretched, possibly on a hard and comfortless bed, the emaciated form of one, who once was a constant attendant at the house of the Lord: pain and weariness are upon him, and his eyes are closed: when however they open, we behold in them an expression of joy and conquest, which can be understood, and which can be felt, but cannot be written. The lips of the sufferer betoken that he is about to speak. And what does he say? No complaining expression escapes him—no murmur—but the voice of thanksgiving for what he has suffered, and is about to enjoy. As the hour of dissolution approaches, the faith of the dying Christian increases. The grim tyrant Death enters, and sternly demands his victim; but instead of beholding a trembling wretch, striving to avoid his blow, resignation and readiness are manifested in his countenance; and as the last enemy strikes his dart through the body of his victim, the soul escaping, as it soars upwards to the bosom of its God, triumphantly exclaims, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?" This, my friends, is the most splendid display of the Power of God which I can set before you; and may God make you personally and eternally convinced of its truth.

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

No. II.

REV. JOSEPH COLLET,

Pastor of the Baptist Church at Coat in Oxfordshire. Died Aug. 21st, 1741, in the 57th year of his age.

His abundant labours were thought to be too hard for his constitution, though not naturally weak; so that when his friends well hoped that he might be continued much longer a blessing among them, he fell into a lingering illness, which he endured with great patience and serenity of mind. And though he was willing, if it had been the pleasure of God, to have continued in his warfare longer, for the benefit of the church, and the advantage of his family; yet he often said, his "will was swallowed up in the will of God:" and under the apprehensions of his decaying nature he would frequently observe, "How dreadful his case would have been, if the great work had been then to do." When his weakness took him off from public service, his time was chiefly employed, either in faithful and Christian counsels and exhortation, to such as came to visit him, or to those of his own family; and when a friend expressed her fears, that his excessive labours had impaired his constitution, he answered with great vehemence, that, "If he had ten thousand lives, he would freely spend them all for the interest of his dear Lord: and if he thought the abatement of his public work would not be attended with his recovery for more service, he would go forth and preach the Gospel, to the last moment he was able to stand."

When he apprehended his end drew near, he met the sentence of death with great resignation: and though in a sense of his own unworthiness he cried out with the Publican, "Lord, be merciful to me a sinner!" yet he said also with Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth; and though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God;" and "Though he slay me, and my family too, yet will I trust in him." He declared he died in the faith of those doctrines which he had preached to others: that he believed the Lord Jesus Christ to be a perfect Saviour: and as "he is able (said he) to save to the uttermost, so I venture my all, both body and soul, on him, for he has engaged to take care of both." He rejoiced in this, that, "though he must die, he should die but once, and after that, this last enemy should be banished for ever;" adding that "his triumph was in a living Redeemer," and taking up the language of the apostle Paul, "I have fought (said he) the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but to all them also that love his appearing." Under the increasing pains of his disease, he would often in the midst of his uncommon patience cry out, "O that I had wings like a dove, then would I fly away and be at rest, at everlasting rest!" O how would that word EVERLASTING dwell upon his lips! And with what inexpressible pleasure would he repeat it again and again.

The last time the supper of our Lord was administered in this place, he was very desirous to have been brought hither, to take his dying leave of his dear flock at that table, as his Lord did before him, and to have enjoyed there a foretaste of that blessedness which he was going fully to possess. But when he was dissuaded by his friends, "Well (said he) though they will not let me go to the table of the Lord, I will go to the Lord of the table.

He continued in the perfect enjoyment of his rational faculties to the very last; and when the signs of his approaching dissolution came upon him, a dear friend asked him, how it was with him? To which he answered, "ALL JOY, I am going to my Father! O that I were in my Redeemer's bosom!" And then looking round his bed at his weeping family, "You weep (said he), but others (meaning his friends above) will soon rejoice; and if you could but behold me one hour after I am got home, you would not wish me back again." The same friend telling him that there was a guard of angels ready to conduct him thither; "Oh! (said he) that I were among them:" and then with a most pleasant and heavenly air upon his countenance, he bid his family and friends FAREWELL! and took his immediate flight to the mansions prepared for him in the land of rest and blessedness.

Funeral Sermon, preached by the Rev. Joseph Stennett, from John xiv, 2, "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you: I go to prepare a place for you."

ITALIAN EPIGRAM,

On our Lord's being bound to a pillar in Pilate's Judgment Hall.

——" ET TU MARMOREUM QUOQUE!"

Marble, the pillar against which he stood:
Marble, the men that thirsted for his blood;
And more than marble was the Son of God!

From nature's quarry was the former hewn;
But hate infernal turn'd the next to stone;
While patience made the Rock of Ages one!

If faith's perspective bring the scene to view,
And nature's shudder prove the record true,
I, if I weep not, must be marble too!

Weep, then, my heart; mine eyes, a fountain flow;
Melt all my griefs, and deep dissolve in woe
This mind of marble and this breast of snow.

The pillar, stone! more soft its hardest part
Than that in me, whose rock defies the smart
That rent the Suff'rer, and that brake his heart.

Come, then, Reflection, and before mine eye
Let these sad sorrows in perspective lie,
Till marble weeps, and weeping rocks reply!

So shall I stand, as bound with Him who stood
Firm as a rock, resisting unto blood;
Redemption's witness, and the friend of God!

Arm'd with his mind,—all meekness, but all zeal,
Patient to bear, though exquisite to feel,
Hell's dread assaults, and Heav'n's more dreadful will!

Come, then, O Thou! my pattern, and my guard;
In life, in death, I meet, by thee prepar'd,
My hope's last conflict, and its last reward!

LIBRARY OF ECCLESIASTICAL KNOWLEDGE.

Lives of Eminent Reformers. Vol. I, Biographical Series, 12mo. cloth, pp. 360. 5*s.* London.

Luther, Zuingle, Melancthon, and Calvin, form the subject of this valuable volume, which we have great pleasure in recommending to our readers. For their extraordinary labours,—in restoring to mankind the possession of the Holy Scriptures, in reforming the churches, overthrowing the arrogant pretensions and the debasing superstitions of Popery,—and recovering the pure doctrines of salvation by Jesus Christ, as contained in the Gospel,—they have laid Europe, and the whole world, under the greatest and most lasting obligations.

M. Claude, in his valuable defence of the Protestant Reformation, gives the following just character of these great men. "God enriched them with a lively and penetrating understanding; a solid judgment; an exquisite and profound knowledge; an indefatigable propensity to labour; a wonderful readiness to compose and deliver; an exact knowledge of the Scriptures, and the principles of the Christian religion; a great and resolute soul; an unshaken courage; an upright conscience; a sincere love of the truth; an ardent zeal for the glory of God; a solid piety, without hypocrisy and without pride; a plain and open carriage; an entire disengagement from the things of the world; an admirable confidence in God and his providence; a cordial friendship to all good men; the greatest aversion to the vices, profanation, and sophistry of others. These were the gifts and talents wherewith the Divine favour honoured the greatest part of them. There yet remains the liveliest character of them in their writings, and they were as the seal with which God would confirm their call. For when his wisdom designs persons to any great work, it is wont to bestow on them those necessary qualifications to acquit themselves in it: and we may say, without fear of being charged with derogating from the truth, by those who know history, that from the sixth age until that of our fathers, that is to say for the space of more than nine hundred years, there could not be found any space of time so fertile in great men as that of the Reformation." This volume illustrates and confirms these observations of Claude.

PUNCTUALITY.

A few years since, in a village in the neighbourhood of London, a committee of eight ladies, who managed the concerns of an institution which had been formed for the relief of the poor, agreed to meet, on a certain day, at twelve o'clock precisely. Seven of them attended punctually at the appointed hour; the eighth did not arrive till a quarter of an hour after. She came in, according to the usual mode, with "I'm very sorry to be behind the time appointed; but really the time slipped away without my being sensible of it. I hope your goodness will excuse it. I am sure I beg pardon." One of the ladies, who was a Quaker, replied: "Truly, friend, it doth not appear clear to me that we ought to accept of thine apology. Hadst thyself only lost a quarter of an hour, it would have been merely thy concern; but in this case the quarter must be multiplied by eight, as we have each lost a quarter; so that there have been two hours sacrificed by thy want of punctuality."

"Closet religion is the first thing: but that religion which comes from God is diffusive, like the God from whom it comes."

RECOMMENDATION OF THE
CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE.

For the interests of our Country, especially of the Poorer Classes, we are deeply convinced of the importance and necessity of a Cheap Religious Publication of sound principles, and adapted for general circulation at the present eventful crisis. Such a Periodical we consider the "Christian's Penny Magazine," which has been carried on successfully for about eight months. This work has been established on the great principles of the Protestant Reformation, without controversy on those minor points about which British Christians are divided: as such we feel pleasure in recommending it to the Public; and so long as it continues to adhere to those Evangelical principles, we will afford it our patronage.

PROFILE VIEW OF THE EGYPTIAN SPHYNX.

THE EGYPTIAN SPHYNX AND PYRAMIDS.

EGYPT has been celebrated as a theatre of wonders for a period of more than 4000 years, from the time of ts founder Misraim, the grandson of Noah. Divine nspiration in the Bible, has recorded the antiquity, richness, and magnificence of Egypt, while it predicted ts ruin and baseness as a nation. (See especially Ezek. xxix.) Some of these particulars will engage our attention on a future occasion, as an illustration of the authenticity, and confirmation of the divinity of the Holy Scriptures.

Among the astonishing antiquities of this once famous nation, the three PYRAMIDS and the SPHYNX are regarded as the most prodigious remains of human power and skill.

These stupendous monuments of the "mighty dead," have excited the admiration of both scientific and philosophical travellers, whose reports have afforded the highest gratification to the inquisitive who tarry at home.

"THE PYRAMID OF CHEOPS," supposed to have been built by a prince of that name, is the largest; the dimensions of which have been differently given. Herodotus, who visited it about 2300 years ago, computed it at 800 feet square; but the sands blown from the Lybian desert have increased into hills around it, burying part of its base. It has been recently measured by a French engineer, who states that the base is a square of 746 feet on each side, covering nearly fourteen acres of land. It is said to be as large as the area of Lincoln's Inn Fields. The perpendicular height is about 560 feet; being 156 feet higher than St. Paul's Cathedral in London. The summit, which, viewed from below appears as a point, is found to be a platform, each side of which is 18 feet long. Many of the stones with which this enormous edifice is built, are 30 feet long; and the whole mass is estimated at 6,000,000 of tons; and that it would be sufficient to build a wall 10 feet high and one foot thick, round the whole kingdom of France, which is about eighteen hundred miles!

"The Pyramid of Cephrenes," from the name of its supposed founder, the second in magnitude, is stated to be 655 feet at its base, and 398 feet in height! Both of these gigantic monuments have been described by many travellers, to whom we refer our readers for particulars, especially to Pocock, Thevenot, Shaw, Graves, Denon, Salt, Savary, Volney, and Belzoni. One of these modern writers remarks: "Their stupendous height, the steep declivity of their sides, their enormous solidity, the distant ages they recal to memory, the recollection of the labour they must have cost, and the reflection that these huge rocks are the works of man, so diminutive and feeble, who crawls at their feet, lost in wonder, awe, humiliation, and reverence, altogether impress the mind of the spectator in a manner not to be described."

Situated about 300 paces from the Pyramid of Cephrenes, is the celebrated Sphynx. This monument, whose enormous bulk excites astonishment in the spectator, is a statue representing a monster of the heathen mythology. Superstitious dread in the mind of fallen man conceived this most extravagant idea, which consists of the head and breasts of a woman, the body of a dog, the tail of a serpent, the wings of a bird, the paws of a lion, and a human voice!

Dr. Pocock, about two hundred years ago, found only the head, neck, and part of the back of this statue visible; the rest being covered with the vast accumulations of sand, which have buried part of the Pyramids. He states the height of the head to be twenty-seven feet; the beginning of the breast thirty-three feet wide, and about one hundred and twenty-five feet from the fore part of the neck to the tail. According to Thevenot, a traveller about fifty years later, it was twenty-six feet high, and fifteen feet from the ear to the chin. Pliny, a Roman writer, who lived in the time of the Apostle John, mentions this Sphynx, and assures us, that the head was no less than one hundred and two feet in circumference, and sixty-two feet high from the belly, and that the body was one hundred and forty-three feet long. It was believed to have been the sepulchre of King Amasis, who ascended the throne of Egypt in the time of the prophet Ezekiel, five hundred and sixty-nine years before the Christian era.

Travellers have admired the sculpture of this stupendous image: but the nose of it has been shamefully mutilated by rude barbarians. Denon remarks, "Although the proportions are colossal, the outline is pure and graceful; the expression is mild, gracious, and tranquil; the character is African; but the mouth, the lips of which are thick, has a softness and delicacy of execution truly admirable; it seems real life and flesh. Art must have been at a high pitch when this monument was executed; for, if the head is deficient in what is called style, that is, the straight and bold lines which give expression to the figures under which the Greeks have designated their deities, yet sufficient justice has been rendered to the fine simplicity and character of nature displayed in this figure."

M. Belzoni, with the assistance of some Arabs, succeeded in removing immense quantities of sand from the base of the Pyramids; and with the like industry, he cleared away the sand from a great part of the Sphynx, laying open a multitude of curious objects. A temple of a single stone, considerable in its dimensions, was discovered between the legs of the Sphynx, and another in one of its paws. The ground in front was covered with Grecian buildings, inscriptions on which commemorate the visits of emperors and great men to view this remarkable monument. Sphynxes are among the most common ornaments on the ancient temples of Egypt; from which we may conclude they were intended to convey some important instruction.

MYTHOLOGY OF THE SPHYNX.

Many of our readers, especially those whose reading is limited, will naturally be anxious for some information concerning the origin of such a strange monster as the Sphynx. This anxiety we will endeavour to gratify, as a reason for urging our friends to prize the blessed volume of the Divine Revelation, and to cherish gratitude to God for such a precious treasure of knowledge, truth, and salvation, as is contained in the Holy Scriptures.

Heathen mythology informs us of its tradition, that the Sphynx was the daughter of Typhon and Echidna. Typhon is said to have been the son of Juno, whom the heathen called the queen of heaven. Typhon is said to have had no father; and so vast was his magnitude, that he touched the east with one hand and the west with the other, and the heavens with the crown of his head. A hundred dragons' heads grew from his shoulders: his body was covered with feathers, scales, rugged hair, and adders: from the ends of his fingers snakes issued, and his two feet had the shape and folds of a serpent's body: his eyes sparkled with fire, and his mouth belched out flames. He was at last overcome, and thrown down; and, lest he should rise again, the whole island of Sicily was laid upon him!

Echidna, the mother of the Sphynx, is represented as "a beautiful woman in the upper part of the body, but as a serpent below the waist!" Some say the mother of the Sphynx was Chimæra, a monster, which "had the head and breast of a lion, the belly of a goat, and the tail of a dragon!"

Juno is said to have sent the Sphynx into the neighbourhood of Thebes, in Egypt, for the purpose of punishing the family of Cadmus, whom she persecuted with immortal hatred; and it laid this part of Bœotia under continual alarms, by proposing enigmas, and devouring the inhabitants if unable to explain them. In the midst of their consternation, the Thebans were told by the oracle, that Sphynx would destroy herself as soon as one of the enigmas she proposed was explained. In this enigma she inquired, "What animal is that, which goes upon four feet in the morning, upon two at noon, and upon three in the evening?"

Upon this, Creon, king of Thebes, promised his crown and his sister Jocasta in marriage, to him who could deliver his country from the monster by a successful explanation of the enigma. It was at last happily explained by Œdipus, who said, "Man is that animal; for he creeps upon his hands and feet in his infancy, or the morning of life, and so may be said to go on four feet: at noon, or in manhood, he walks erect upon two feet: and in the evening of life, or old age, he uses the support of a staff." The Sphynx, on hearing this explanation, dashed her head against a rock, and expired.

Learned mythologists have explained the fable of the Sphynx as relating to one of the daughters of Cadmus, or Laius, who infested the country of Thebes by her continual depredations, because she had been refused a part of her father's possessions. Her having the body of a dog, they explain as denoting her lasciviousness; the paws of a lion signified her ferocious cruelty; her enigmas, the snares she laid for strangers and travellers; and her wings, the dispatch she used in her predatory expeditions.

Our young readers especially will not fail to be interested in some further illustrations of this subject, which we will add chiefly from the pen of Mr. Taylor, the learned editor of "Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible." They occur under the article Caucasus, which is the name given to immense chains of mountains in Asia, extending from China, through India and Persia, to the shores of the Mediterranean sea. It was on part of this range, Ararat (Gen. viii, 4), that Noah's ark rested after the Deluge; and from his descendants, apostatizing from the patriarchal worship, and from their corrupted traditions, that most of the heathen fables arose. Taurus is a name given to a long range of these mountains, on which Mr. Taylor remarks: —

"The word Taur, in many languages, signifies a bull; it is so in Spanish, and French, at this time; it was so in Latin, Greek, Arabic, &c.; and above all, as being most ancient, it was so in Chaldee; which language was little distant, either in time or place, from the first settlement on mount Taurus. To account for this name, observe, (1.) that Noah, on coming out of the ark, sacrificed to God, among other things, a young bull, or beeve, as the most valuable offering in his power: the place of sacrificing might be denominated from this first offering. (2.) As Noah was of pastoral manners, no doubt he kept around him all the valuable domestic animals he could, which he cherished, multiplied, and employed. The chief of these, the bull, might give name to the mountain where they pastured.

"But not only was this mountain called the 'Mountain of the Bull,' or beeve; it was also commemorated under the figure of a bull; though possibly sometimes under that of other domestic animals. The number of animals, companions to mankind by their nature, is not very great: after the beeve, the goat and sheep, the dog, the swine, the horse, perhaps the elephant, and the camel. The number of birds also is not great, the house cock, the swan, and especially the pigeon or dove. Among reptiles, though it may startle us, is the serpent, of which some kinds are esteemed in many parts of India to be guardians of the house and premises, and are accordingly admitted as inmates to every apartment. Indeed, of the whole serpent tribe, terrible as its name sounds in our ears, not one kind in ten is venomous; and those which are fatal, seldom strike without provocation. To the serpent we may add the lizard. Among insects, the bee. Such are the chief pastoral riches of mankind, and such were the pastoral riches of Noah. From these must have descended whatever breeds afterwards roamed the earth; and the mountain on which these first swarmed, seems to have been typified by the figure and appellation of some one or more of them; while distant parts of the same range of mountains, to which the savage creatures were exiled, were typified by figures and appellations of them; as the lion, the tiger, &c. among beasts; the eagle, &c. among birds. And in like manner, as parts of these mountains might derive names from the bull, or beeve, so might other parts from the lion, or from the eagle; which suggests one reason why the gods of the heathen were accompanied with images of those kinds of creatures which referred to these mountains. So Jupiter had the eagle, originally in reference to 'Eagle Mountain,' or a district called 'The Eagle' — the Garoora-sthan of the present Bramins. Dionysius had the bull, Cybele had lions, Venus had doves, bees, &c. Hence, in after-ages, the imaginary improvement, but really great deterioration of symbolic lore, by combination of figures into unnatural forms; as, a bull with a human head, meaning 'Bull Mountain,' with the man who headed it (i. e. governed it), composes the Minotaur (i. e. Menuh-taur) [taur, or bull, of Menuh?]. By equal perversion, the goat and the lion are compounded; and when a delineator, or his patron who directed the representation, dissatisfied with a single mountain, or district [perhaps, dominion], was desirous of including the whole range (or Caucasus at large), he combined, in one most monstrous form, — the lion, denoting one mountain, the goat, another mountain, and the tail he converted into a serpent. Hence originated the griffin — an eagle's head (Mount Eagle) on a lion's body (Mount Lion), with a multitude of other emblems, all referring to the region where mankind originally settled, or to events principally connected with that region."

"Armenia Alta is one of the highest regions in the world," says Moses Chorenensis, "for it sends out rivers in contrary directions towards the four cardinal points in the heavens. It has three mountains, and abounds with wild animals, and many species of fowl for food; also, with hot baths, and mines of salt, and other things of utility, and the chief Carina." The reader will recollect, that in coincidence with this testimony, Moses, in Gen. ii, 11—14, specifies three provinces adjacent to Paradise; for though the number of his rivers is four, the number of his provinces is but three; Ethiopia, Havilah, and Assyria; and we can scarcely doubt, that this number (three) was received in like manner among the ancients. In proof of this might be quoted the well-known emblem of Caucasus — a lion, a goat, and a serpent, three; or, the bull, the eagle, and the man, three; or, the lion, the eagle, and the human head, three: hence also the Griffin, and the Sphynx.

EXPENSES OF WAR.

Christianity shall ultimately destroy wars, by renovating and sanctifying the minds of men. "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people: and they shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." LONDON MORALS.

By an official return it appears, that from Jan. 1, 1831, to Jan. 1, 1832, the new Metropolitan Police force has apprehended no less than 72,824 persons on different charges; namely, 45,907 males, and 26,917 females. Out of this number, 23,787 drunken persons were discharged by the police after they became sober, and 4,379 were fined five shillings each, amounting to 1,094*l.* 15*s.* Of these, 3,187 were males, and 1,194 females. From the above returns, the police-men have apprehended on an average about 199 per day. These statements do not include the city itself. Such are the statistics of ignorance and vice! — Teacher's Mag.

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

His Mental Improvement.

THIRSTING for knowledge, especially in those branches of it which relate to the realities of religion, William was anxious to form some plan for the cultivation of his mind. The claims of business he regarded as imperative, and gave to them a full measure of his time; attending with his workmen from six or seven o'clock in the morning, and sometimes much earlier, until the same hour in the evening: but by diligent activity, he was able generally to devote from four to six hours a day to reading and literary study. He met with an admirable little work on the "Advantages of Early Rising:" he read it with much interest, and reflected on what Dr. Doddridge, the Rev. John Wesley, and others had accomplished by that healthful practice, and in a good measure followed their worthy example, allowing himself but six hours for sleep each night.

At first he laboured under a painful disadvantage: he had no judicious intimate friend, whom he could consult, as to the most eligible mode of accomplishing his purposes of mental improvement. He sighed over this inconvenience: but perhaps he was too backward in seeking that assistance, which without much difficulty he might have obtained. His purpose, however, was fixed, strengthened greatly by his increasing perception of the inestimable value of sound knowledge.

William found both a stimulant and an excellent counsellor in the well-known work of Dr. Watts. In the memoirs of that excellent man, prefixed to the smaller editions of his Psalms and Hymns, he found the observations of Dr. Johnson, which introduced him to that valuable instructor. "Few books," says that great man, "have been perused by me with greater pleasure than his 'Improvement of the Mind,' of which the radical principles may indeed be found in 'Locke's Conduct of the Understanding;' but they are so expanded and ramified by Watts, as to confer upon him the merit of a work in the highest degree useful and pleasing. Whoever has the care of instructing others, may be charged with deficiency in his duty if this book is not recommended."

Dr. Johnson's opinion was a recommendation sufficient: William purchased it, and gave it a careful reading; and though that work generally supposes a larger measure of learning than he considered himself as possessing, he made an extensive collection of the most useful suggestions and directions, which were never forgotten by him. William was peculiarly affected and encouraged by the Introduction to that invaluable book of Dr. Watts. Probably many of our readers have never seen that work, or met with those judicious and valuable remarks of that "friend to youth." On their account we gladly quote them in this place:—

"No man is obliged to learn every thing; this can neither be sought nor required, for it is utterly impossible: yet all persons are under some obligations to improve their own understanding; otherwise it will be a barren desert, or a forest overgrown with weeds and brambles. Universal ignorance or infinite errors will overspread the mind which is utterly neglected, and lies without any cultivation.

"Skill in the sciences is indeed the business and profession of but a small part of mankind; but there are many others placed in such an exalted rank in the world, as allows them much leisure and large opportunities to cultivate their reason, and to beautify and enrich their minds with various knowledge. Even the lower orders of men have particular callings in life, wherein they ought to acquire a just degree of skill, and this is not to be done well without thinking and reasoning about them.

"Besides, every son and daughter of Adam has a most important concern in the affairs of a life to come, and therefore it is a matter of the highest moment for every one to understand, to judge, and to reason rightly about the things of religion. It is vain for any to say, We have no leisure or time for it. The daily intervals of time, and vacancies from necessary labour, together with the one day in seven in the Christian world, allows sufficient time for this, if men would but apply themselves to it with half as much zeal and diligence as they do to the trifles and amusements of this life, and it would turn to infinitely better account. Thus it appears to be the necessary duty and interest of every person living to improve his understanding, to inform his judgment, to treasure up useful knowledge, and to acquire the skill of good reasoning, as far as his station, capacity, and circumstances, furnish him with proper means for it. Our mistakes in judgment may plunge us into much folly and guilt in practice. By acting without thought or reason, we dishonour the God that made us reasonable creatures, we often become injurious to our neighbours, kindred, or friends, and we bring sin and misery upon ourselves: for we are accountable to God our judge for every part of our irregular and mistaken conduct, where he hath given us sufficient advantages to guard against those mistakes."

William's chief attention was directed, for a considerable period, to the History of the Bible,—the Evidences of Christianity,—and the Doctrines of the word of God. To enumerate all the books which he read on these subjects would be impossible and useless; and as to some of them, he regretted the loss of time which he had spent upon them. Such regrets, it is believed, are very common among those who are seeking improvement without a judicious, well-informed friend to guide them in the choice of their books; and he must be considered as a sincere friend to youth, who, with the wisdom and kindness of an intelligent Christian, performs the office of a friendly counsellor in this respect.

Among the books from which William derived most instruction and delight, on the former branch of knowledge, were "Stackhouse's History of the Bible," "Josephus's History of the Jews," and "Rollin's Ancient History." By these excellent works, a new, extensive, and most pleasing field of wisdom, was set before his mind. The account which the latter writer gives of the customs, learning, riches, public works, and polity of the Egyptians,—the remarkable details of the character of "Cyrus the Persian," and of the siege and conquest of the mighty Babylon, the "Chaldees' excellency,"—the deliverance of the captive Jews, and the utter ruin and desolation of that wondrous city, all in the most exact accordance with the striking predictions of Isaiah and Jeremiah, impressed his mind with astonishment, at the confirmation thus afforded to the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures.

The whole series of Scripture Prophecy was contemplated with still greater admiration by William, on reading "Newton's Dissertations on the Prophecies;" and the refined and sacred pleasure which he derived from this exercise of mind, appeared far superior to the possession of the greatest portion of worldly wealth. He would have been amply satisfied, if he could have devoted his whole time to such studies, without any consideration of worldly gain; but as he was circumstanced, business required his diligent attention, and the hours redeemed in his mornings and evenings only could be spared for the pursuits of intellectual improvement.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XV.

On Punishments.

Dear Madam,

Allow me to offer you a few observations upon this forbidding subject. Your own knowledge and proper sentiments upon this, as upon many other topics, render it needless to recommend, or dissuade from many things, which in a mere treatise on Education it might be proper to insert, in order to meet the circumstances of all persons by whom it might be perused. You are fully aware that the only object of punishment is remedy or prevention, and that the moment the parent's own feelings are commingled with it, it ceases to have this character, and it also fails of accomplishing its end, since children, who are the keenest of observers, soon infer from tones, and looks, and actions, when they cease to be the subjects of discipline, to become the objects on which the parent gratifies his temper; and from that moment the bosom of the child feels a sense of estrangement and injury. I have no doubt also that you will feel, that where education is commenced as early as it ought to be, the best system adopted, and properly pursued, there, punishment of all kinds would be unknown. Punishment is an evil; and, like all evils, it originates in the imperfection of human conduct.

It will also be evident, that in proportion as the best system of education is adopted early enough, and pursued with an approximation to perfection, there also the need of punishment will be proportionably diminished. I will suppose, however, that at some period or other of the infancy of your child, and from some cause or other, your will, which ought ever to be your law, your word, which ought ever to be unalterable, have been withstood by your infant. He has refused to do something which you have commanded, or to cease doing something which you have forbidden. Here is the case to be considered. If you make it a matter of importance at the time, and when his feelings of rebellion are just germinating, you will in all probability awake his self-will into sudden perfection. I would advise, that at the moment you take no notice, but carefully retain the circumstances in your recollection, and choosing some opportunity when he has forgotten the event, and when his feeling has totally subsided, take him with you into solitude, and affectionately yet calmly remind him of all the circumstances: state to him that your will must be obeyed (do not reason with him: reasoning with a young child is thrown away, and always awakens his pride): and then lead him to the scene of his disobedience, and overlook him while he fulfils the neglected duty. Do not seem affected with joy or wonder at his compliance, nor say any thing upon the subject afterwards; and you will perhaps find that your authority is fixed for ever. Should it however so occur that these means fail, they must never be repeated, for their effect depends upon their being but once adopted, and that once being upon the first occasion of disobedience.

Should, however, these means be found insufficient, and should the action complained of be repeated, then it seems advisable that you represent to him how he has grieved your heart. The genuine distress which you will feel, and which he will perceive, will powerfully affect the mind and affections of your infant. Should it however be repeated the third time, then I advise that the only notice you take of it may be, as calmly as possible, to tell him what kind of suffering you intend to inflict upon him upon its being repeated; and when this has been announced, let your conduct as soon as possible assume the same gentle yet decisive tone which you will ever have adopted towards him. I will imagine the forbidden act to be nevertheless performed; and then, whatever may be the penalty, instantly and resolutely inflict it. If it be that you will send him out of the room, do it promptly and resolutely.

The next question which is of importance is, what punishments you will denounce. Of course you will not think of shutting the little offender in a closet, or tie him in an arm-chair, or make him stand in a corner, &c.; still less will you ever dream of raising your hand against him. Banishment from your presence, and an appeal to his father, are among the most efficacious modes of deterring a young child from the repetition of faults. "Charles has torn his picture book, although I had told him not to do so. I am much grieved; but I hope he will do so no more." It is useful also to make his punishment the counterpart to his fault. If anti-social, punish it with solitude. If he is wantonly injuring any thing which has been given to him, tell him, with a look of regret, that you are sorry to punish him, but you are compelled to do so, in order to imprint it upon his recollection: then take it from him. Happy, however, is the mother, whose greatest punishment that she can inflict upon her child is his removal from her presence, or the declaration that she cannot take him with her upon some anticipated excursion or visit.

A well-educated lady, who is in her turn a happy parent, once told me, that she was so educated as that of all punishments she dreaded none so much as to hear her father say, "There, you may now go and amuse yourself;" which she took to mean a dismissal from his presence.

The rules for punishment are very simple; namely, Never let a child be punished for an action which he does not know to be a fault. Never let the punishment be calculated to degrade him in the view of others, for it will then infallibly harden his heart. Never let a child be punished till he has offended in the same way the third time. Never punish him without being sure he has committed the fault in question. And let the punishment you intend to inflict be well considered, and when the proper occasion comes, rigorously inflicted.

I have no need to guard you against certain practices, which are nevertheless sufficiently common, in connection with this subject. For instance, you will often see a parent correct his child, and afterwards lavish peculiar kindnesses upon him. If the boy goes to school, he has a holiday; or if not, his mother gives him something fine or nice. This is the atonement which the misguided parent offers to her own feelings. The child fully understands all this: the punishment was thrown away; provision is only hereby made for its repetition; and, above all, the mind of the child himself is perverted and ruined. — I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

Temperance. — A blacksmith, in the city of Philadelphia, was complaining to his iron merchant, that such was the scarcity of money that he could not pay his rent. The merchant then asked him how much rum he used in his family in the course of the day. Upon his answering this question, the merchant made a calculation, and showed him that his rum amounted to more money in the year than his house rent. The calculation so astonished the mechanic, that he determined from that day to buy and drink no spirits of any kind. In the course of the next ensuing year he paid his rent, and bought a new suit of clothes out of the savings of his temperance. He persisted in it through the course of his life, and the consequence was, competence and respectability.

BRITISH ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

No. III. Christianity among the Britons.

CHRISTIANITY, having been introduced into Britain during the apostolic age, continued to diffuse its light from one native tribe to another, until they were all in some degree enlightened. As the Roman arms made progress throughout the land, they became the undesigned means of furthering the Gospel. For, reducing all the different nations of South Britain under their government, and establishing a free intercourse throughout the country, they prepared the way for the advancement of the Gospel.

Suetonius Paulinus, who commanded in Britain during the reign of Nero, perceiving that the Druids inflamed the resentment of the native tribes, resolved on their extermination. Their strongest place of security was the isle of Anglesey, then called Mona, to which Paulinus marched his terrible legions, and ravaged the consecrated island with fire and sword. Many of the infuriated Druids and Druidesses were taken captive, and sacrificed by the conquerors upon the altars which they had kindled for sacrificing the Roman prisoners, whose leaders they vainly hoped to overcome.

Druidism being thus overthrown, if not quite exterminated, in Britain, one of the greatest obstacles to the progress of Christianity was removed; and we have reason to believe that its influence prevailed extensively, though we have not particular accounts of its divine triumphs. The most popular record we have is that of the conversion of King Lucius: but the accounts respecting him are so contradictory and absurd, that his story is rejected by every judicious writer, as almost altogether a monkish fable. That our readers may form an idea of the extravagance of this tradition, we shall give it in brief.

Nennius, in the seventh century, the most ancient British historian by whom it is mentioned, says, "In the year 164 from the incarnation of our Lord, Lucius, monarch of Britain, with all the other petty kings of Britain, received baptism, from a deputation sent by the Roman emperors, and by the Roman pope Evaristus."

To suppose that Lucius was monarch of Britain, with many petty kings dependent on him, while the Romans held most of the country, is absurd: but much more so that the Roman emperors, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus and his successor Lucius Verus, who were pagans and persecutors, should send a deputation of Christian missionaries to convert and baptize the Britons.

This story became so embellished, that in the twelfth century, five hundred years after Nennius, Jeffrey, a Benedictine monk of Monmouth, says, "Lucius imitates all the acts of goodness seen in his father Coilus, and above all, sent letters to Pope Eleutherius, desiring to be instructed in the Christian religion. That holy pope sent to him two most religious doctors, Faganus and Duvanus, who, after having preached the incarnation of the Word of God, administered to him baptism, and made him a proselyte of the Christian faith. People from all countries assembling, followed the king's example, and being washed in the same holy laver, were made partakers of the kingdom of heaven. The holy doctors almost extinguished paganism in the whole land; dedicated the temples that had been founded in honour of many gods, to the one only God and his saints, and filled them with congregations of Christians. There were then in Britain eight and twenty flamens (head priests), as also three archflamens, to whose jurisdiction the other judges and enthusiasts were subject. These they delivered from idolatry, and where they were flamens made them bishops, where archflamens, archbishops. The seats of the archflamens were at the three noblest cities, vis. York, London, and Caerleon upon Usk, in Glamorganshire. Under these three, now purged from superstition, were made subject twenty-eight bishops, with their dioceses." To complete this account Jeffrey adds, "The glorious king, rejoicing at the great progress the true religion had made in his kingdom, granted, that the possessions and territories formerly belonging to the temples of the gods, should now be converted to a better use, and appropriated to Christian churches. And because greater honour was due to them than to the others, he made large additions of lands and mansion houses, and all manner of privileges." He further adds, that "Lucius departed this life in the city of Gloucester, and was honourably buried in the cathedral church, in the 156th year after our Lord's incarnation."

Though this story is believed by the Roman Catholics, and much of it by many Protestants, yet, as Dr. Henry, in his History of England, observes, "Every one who knows any thing of the state of Britain at that time, must know that it contains as many falsehoods and impossibilities as sentences."

Gildas, a Briton and a zealous Christian, of the sixth century, the most ancient of our historians, gives no hint concerning Lucius; and the whole account is evidently the manufacture of the adherents of the Papacy, to promote that usurpation. Twenty-three different dates are given for the conversion of Lucius; from which it is concluded, that as there are so many allusions to that affair, we cannot reject it altogether. It seems highly probable that a petty prince, named Lucius, about the middle of the second century, was allowed by the Romans to retain a shadow of authority in his country: that this British chieftain embraced Christianity, and used his influence to bring others to yield to its gentle claims. That for this purpose he might possibly seek spiritual advice from Eleutherius, at that time bishop or pastor of the Christians at Rome, and place under his instruction some British converts, to be employed as Home Missionaries in their own country. No military or political agitation attending all this, the Romans might not interfere, to prevent the accomplishment of the desires of Lucius; and Christianity, by this means, would make silent progress throughout the island. Many of all classes would be baptized, the rude pagan temples would be converted into Christian sanctuaries, and numerous congregations might be gathered, listening to the preachers of the gospel of salvation, and worshipping God by faith in Jesus Christ.

Mr. Southey, in his "Book of the Church," speaking of this period, and of the "doubtful legends" concerning Lucius, remarks, "It is said that the first church was erected at Glastonbury; and this tradition may seem to deserve credit, because it was not contradicted in those ages, when other churches would have found it profitable to advance a similar pretension. The building is described as a rude structure of wicker-work, like the dwellings of the people in those days, and differing from them only in its dimensions, which were threescore feet in length, and twenty-six in breadth. An abbey was afterwards erected there, one of the finest of those edifices, and one of the most remarkable for the many interesting circumstances connected with it."

Upon the whole, although the popish legends, concerning those times, afford us but little satisfaction as to the true number and character of the British Christians, there seems reason to believe, that in the "churches of wattles," which, if any reader pleases, he may call cathedrals, there were many, who "believed to the saving of their souls," who were taught by the word and Spirit of God, and who lived to "show forth the praises of Him, who had called them out of darkness into his marvellous light."

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—SENECA.

ANECDOTE OF THE REV. OLIVER HEYWOOD.

IN 1664 came out a writ for apprehending him as an excommunicated person, but he was not taken. He acted with prudence and caution, in order to avoid a long imprisonment, keeping himself private; and it pleased God to protect him from his pursuers. He had now several children, and being deprived of his income, must have been in great straits. Martha Bairstow, a maid servant, who had lived in his family several years, would not desert her master and mistress in their distress. The little stock of money was quite exhausted, the provisions were entirely consumed, and Martha could lend no more assistance from the savings of former days. Mr. Heywood still trusted that God would provide, when he had nothing but the Divine promise to live upon. He said,

"When cruse and barrel both are dry,
We still will trust in God most high."

When the children began to be impatient for want of food, Mr. Heywood called his servant, and said to her, "Martha, take a basket and go to Halifax; call upon Mr. N. in Northgate, and tell him I request him to lend me five shillings; if he will be kind enough to do it, buy us some cheese, some bread, and such other little things as you know we most want; be as expeditious as you can, for the poor children begin to be fretful for want of something to eat. Put on your hat and cloak, and the Lord give you good speed; in the mean time we will offer up our requests to Him who feedeth the young ravens when they cry, and who knows what we have need of before we ask him."

Martha observed her master's directions; but when she came near to the house where she was ordered to beg the loan of five shillings, through timidity, her heart failed her. She passed by the door again and again, without having courage to go in and tell her errand. At length Mr. N. standing at his shop door, and seeing Martha in the street, called her to him, and said, "Are you not Mr. Heywood's servant?" When she had, with an anxious heart, answered in the affirmative, he added, "I am glad of this opportunity of seeing you; some friends at M. have remitted to me five guineas for your master, and I was just thinking how I could contrive to send it." Martha burst into tears, and for some time could not utter a syllable. The necessities of the family, their trust in Providence, the seasonableness of the supply, and a variety of other ideas breaking in upon her mind at once, quite overpowered her. At length she told Mr. N. upon what errand she came, but that she had not courage to ask him to lend her poor master money. The tradesman could not but be affected with the story, and told Martha to come to him when the like necessity should press upon them at any future time. She made haste to procure the necessary provisions, and, with a heart lightened of its burthen, ran home to tell the success of her journey. Though she had not been long absent, the hungry family had often looked wishfully out at the window for her arrival. When she knocked at her master's door, which now must be kept locked and barred, for fear of constables and bailiffs, it was presently opened, and the joy to see her was as great as when a ship arrives laden with provisions, for the relief of a starving town, closely besieged by an enemy. The children danced round the maid, eager to look into the basket, the patient mother wiped her eyes, the father smiled, and said, "The Lord hath not forgotten to be gracious; his word is true from the beginning; the young lions do lack and suffer hunger, but they that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing;" Martha related every circumstance of her little expedition, as soon as tears of joy would permit her; and all partook of the homely fare, with a sweeter relish than the fastidious Roman nobles ever knew, when thousands of pounds were expended to furnish one repast.

Dr. Fawcett's Life of Oliver Heywood, p. 34.

Union among Christians, how effected.—There are only two things that can unite us; the fear of a common evil, which drives us to the same refuge; or a zeal for a common good, which excites us to the same pursuits. The former hath often brought us together: O that the latter had generally the same effect!

Preface to Mason's Serm. ad fin.

Love of the World.—The world troubles and molests me, yet I love it; what, if it did not trouble me?

St. Austin.

Disputes about Religion.—If the sincere love of God and our neighbour were but once thoroughly kindled in our hearts, these pure and heavenly flames would in a great measure extinguish the unchristian heat of dispute and contention; as fires here below are ready to languish and go out when the sun in his full strength shines upon them.—Tillotson, vol. i, p. 425.

Necessity of Pious Dispositions.—Our ideas are but pictures and images of the things themselves: and as the picture of a feast cannot satisfy our hunger, nor the picture of a fire warm and enlighten us; so the finest ideas of virtue and religion, cannot make us good and happy, without those dispositions of heart, which should be raised and kept alive by them.

Leechman on Prayer, p. 24.

Tendency of the above.—All pious dispositions are fountains of pleasant streams, which by their confluence do make up a full sea of felicity.—Barrow, vol. i, p. 58.

Parental Example.—Let us take care of our children: children have every thing to learn, and they will learn every thing of those who are nearest to them. To them example is better than all the books in the world; and indeed it is the only book they study. Let us not cheat ourselves into a neglect of them, by chanting over, what nobody denies, that "God only can make a Christian," which is equal to saying, that God only can make a cucumber.—Robinson's Serm., p. 411.

Christmas.—If one of the wise and virtuous Romans was to return into our world, he would judge from the conduct of some who call themselves Christians, and pretend to keep Christmas, that they were a worse sort of pagans; and that it was not an holy Jesus, but an impure Venus, or drunken Bacchus, whose festival they celebrated.—Needham's Serm., p. 20.

S. J. B**.

The power of Christ will be manifested in all: by the destruction of sin, or the sinner. The hearts which now yield to the impressions of the Spirit, are broken only in order to be formed anew, and to become vessels of honour fitted to the Master's use: those which continue stubborn and hardened, must be dashed in pieces by the stroke of eternal vengeance.—Horne.

THE REVERIE.

O! that in unfetter'd union,
Spirit could with spirit blend;
O! that in unseen communion,
Thought could hold the distant friend!
Who the secret can unravel,
Of the body's mystic guest?
Who knows how the soul may travel,
While unconsciously we rest?

While in pleasing thraldom lying,
Seal'd in slumbers deep it seems,
Far abroad it may be flying.
What is sleep? and what are dreams?
Earth, how narrow thy dominions,
And how slow the body's pace!
O! to range on eagle pinions
Through illimitable space!

What is thought? In wild succession,
Whence proceeds the motley train?
What first stamps the vague impression
On the ever-active brain?
What is thought—and whither tending
Does the subtile phantom flee?
Does it, like a moon-beam ending,
Shine, then melt to vacancy?

Has a strange mysterious feeling,
Something shapeless, undefin'd,
O'er thy lonely musings stealing,
Ne'er impress'd thy pensive mind—
As if he, whose strong resemblance
Fancy in that moment drew,
By coincident remembrance,
Knew your thoughts, and thought of you?

When at Mercy's footstool bending,
Thou hast felt a secret glow;
Faith and hope to heav'n ascending,
Love still lingering below;—
Say, has ne'er the thought impress'd thee,
That thy friend might feel thy pray'r?
Or the wish at least possess'd thee,
He could then thy feeling share?

Who can tell? the fervent blessing—
Angels, did you hear it rise?
Do you thus, your love expressing,
Watch o'er human sympathies?
Do ye some mysterious token
To the kindred bosom bear;
And to what the heart has spoken,
Wake a chord responsive there?

Laws, perhaps unknown, but certain,
Kindred spirits may control;
But what hand can lift the curtain,
And reveal the awful soul?
Dimly through life's vapours seeing,
Who but longs for light to break?
O this feverish dream of being!
When, my friend, shall we awake?

Yes, the hour, the hour is hasting,
Spirit shall with spirit blend;
Fast mortality is wasting,
Then the secret all shall end.
Let then thought hold sweet communion,
Let us breathe the mutual pray'r,
Till in heaven's eternal union,
O, my friend! to meet thee there!

THE INFANT TEACHER'S ASSISTANT,

For the use of Schools and Private Families; or Scriptural and Moral Lessons for Infants: with observations on the manner of using them. By T. Bilby and R. B. Ridgway, Masters of the Chelsea and Hart Street Infant Schools. Second Edition, price 3s.

Infant Schools we hope to see established in every populous neighbourhood of our country. In every point of view we regard them as beneficial to the poor; and much of their system of instruction may be adopted with incalculable advantage by the higher classes in the domestic training of their young. We consider Infant Schools as the best auxiliaries to Sunday Schools, and they have been worthily pronounced the "Nurseries of our Churches." Messrs. Bilby and Ridgway have laid the Public under great obligations by the publication of this volume, which we sincerely recommend to Parents, as well as the Teachers for whom especially it has been prepared.

THE RELIGION OF TASTE,

A Poem, by Carlos Wilcox. Reprinted from the American edition of his "Literary Remains." London, Hamilton, Adams, and Co. pp. 56.

This is an interesting little publication, and we doubt not it will be prized by many of its readers. Mr. Carlos Wilcox, its author, was devoted to the Christian ministry in New England; but his feeble constitution disqualified him for that arduous service. He died in the faith and hope of the gospel in the thirty-third year of his age. His message on his death-bed to his brothers deserves every attention. "Tell my dear brothers," said he, "to prepare, in the morning of life, for a sick bed. Tell them that the world all appears to me vanity now. Tell them that the religion of Christ is the only satisfying portion of the soul. Tell them to make the Bible their daily portion, and the throne of grace their daily resort."

As a specimen of the style of this poem, we transcribe the last of one hundred and seven stanzas.

"Rouse to some work of high and holy love,
And thou an angel's happiness shalt know,
Shalt bless the earth while in the world above:
The good begun by thee shall onward flow
In many a branching stream, and wider grow;
And seeds that in life's present fleeting hours
Thy hands unsparing and unwearied sow,
Shall deck thy grave with amaranthine flowers,
And yield thee fruits divine in heav'n's immortal bowers."

HENRY II, DOING PENANCE AT BECKET'S TOMB.

THOMAS 'A BECKET.

Thomas 'a Becket was one of the most extraordinary men of the twelfth century. The history of his birth s most remarkable. His father, Gilbert Becket, was sheriff of London; but while on pilgrimage in the Holy Land, he was taken prisoner by a Saracen. He succeeded in making his escape from the banditti, and the captain's daughter falling in love with him, followed him to England. Her singular and heroic affection deeply affected him; and having consulted some bishops, he determined on marrying her, she being baptized by the name of Matilda. From this union proceeded the celebrated Thomas à Becket.

Becket was educated for the bar: but gaining high reputation in his profession, he was induced to enter the Church, and made Archdeacon of Canterbury. Having some affairs to manage at the court, Henry II conceived a high opinion of his talents, and made him Lord Chancellor, on the recommendation of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury. In the discharge of this office, Becket behaved to all around him with so much pride and haughtiness, as rendered him extremely troublesome to his equals, and insupportable to his inferiors. Above all things, he was a lover of pageantry and show. He is said to have maintained at his own expense, in the war of Thoulouse, where he attended the king, 700 knights, and 1200 foot soldiers. Upon all occasions Becket showed himself so entirely devoted to the will of the king, that he considered him as always ready to sacrifice every thing to his service.

Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, dying while Henry was in Normandy, the king resolved on preserving the archbishopric for Becket; as, by that means, he might be serviceable to him in counteracting the power of the priesthood, so troublesome and injurious even to royalty. On the recommendation of the king, Becket was consecrated before Henry's return to England, when he sent the great seal to his royal benefactor, relinquishing the office of High Chancellor.

Becket's reason for this step was, his determination to uphold the usurpations and privileges of the priesthood, which Henry had purposed to abridge, as pernicious to the community. Among the greatest grievances to be redressed, one was the impunity of the priests in the commission of crime. By degrees, the clergy had acquired an absolute power over all that belonged to their body; and those accused, were tried in the Ecclesiastical Court, from which there lay no appeal. Their trials were carried on with such indulgence, that the most enormous crimes were punished with degradation only, others with a short suspension, or easy confinement. The laity were liable to the most grievous outrages, which they durst not repel, for fear of ruinous expenses or severe punishment. It was proved in the presence of the king, that during the eight years since his accession to the throne in 1155, above a hundred murders had been committed in the kingdom by the Ecclesiastics, of whom not one was punished so much as with degradation, the penalty enjoined by the canons. Astonishing as it may seem, the prelates gloried in this indulgence, supposing they could give no surer marks of their zeal for religion and the service of God, than by maintaining these immunities of the clergy.

Offended with the haughtiness of Becket, the nobles readily united with the king in the following articles, as regulations necessary for the tranquillity of the nation:—

"I. No person shall appeal to Rome without the king's leave. II. No archbishop or bishop shall go to Rome, upon the pope's summons, without the king's leave. III. No tenant in chief, or any other of the king's officers, shall be excommunicated, or his lands put under an interdict, without the king's license. IV. All clergymen charged with capital crimes, shall be tried in the king's courts. V. The laity, whether the king or others, shall hold pleas of churches, and tithes, and the like."

These articles, though signed by the temporal lords, were rejected by the bishops and abbots, unless they were neutralized with this clause:—"Saving the rights and privileges of the clergy and church."

Provoked by this refusal, the king threatened the clergy with some further abridgment of their powers, and they apologized and signed; and by their entreaty, Becket was induced to follow them: but the pope rejected them, as prejudicial to the church. The archbishop recanted, and took part with the pope; on which Becket was prosecuted, and ordered to be tried as a traitor. Supported by the pope, and encouraged by the king of France, Becket treated the king's courts with contempt, and refused obedience to his sovereign; on which they declared him guilty of perjury.

When he knew that the court of peers was assembled, he went to church, and ordered the words of the second Psalm to be sung, "The rulers take counsel against the LORD, and against his anointed." Then taking his cross in his hand, he daringly entered the room where the king and the lords were seated. The archbishop of York seeing him enter in that manner, severely reprimanded him for his presumption in the royal presence, which was bidding defiance to the king: and bade him consider, that his sovereign's weapon was sharper than his. Becket insolently replied, that "It was true that the king's weapon could kill the body, but his destroyed the soul and sent it to hell." For this insult he was ordered to be imprisoned; but after other provocation, as they feared the daring priests, he was allowed to escape, and he departed in disguise to Flanders.

Becket was well received by the king of France and by the pope; to resent which, Henry ordered to be imprisoned or banished, all the relations of the archbishop, and of those who joined the traitor; on which Becket sent a threatening letter to the king. This dispute continued for six years; when Henry became indisposed, and in the prospect of death, he desired to be reconciled to the pope, and agreed to almost every article required by the archbishop. Accordingly he swore to Becket that he heartily forgave him, and would restore to him the same state he enjoyed before his banishment, and make restitution to all his relations and friends.

Although Becket had obliged the king to pardon all his coadjutors, he was not disposed to show the same generous spirit. Before he left France, he obtained the pope's license to suspend the archbishop of York, and to excommunicate the bishops of London, Durham, and Exeter, whom he supposed his enemies, and friendly to the king. This license he put in execution immediately on landing in England, and carried himself so haughtily towards all, even towards the king's eldest son, who had recently been crowned by his father's desire, that it was not possible for his tyranny to be endured. The excommunicated prelates carried their complaints to the king, still in Normandy; when, exasperated at his insolence, he is said to have exclaimed, "I am an unhappy prince, who maintain a great number of lazy, insignificant persons, of whom none has gratitude or spirit enough to revenge the affronts I receive from a single wretched priest."

These indiscreet words of the king, were caught by four of the knights present, who, reflecting on the reproaches of their royal master, conspired to free him from his enemy. They hastened to Canterbury, and taking the opportunity of the archbishop being at the cathedral, they entered the church armed with swords. After reproaching him with pride and ingratitude to his sovereign, and with his various cruelties, they murdered him near the altar, and retired without molestation, A.D. 1171. The assassins, fearing they had gone too far, durst not return to the king in Normandy, but retired to Yorkshire, where every one shunned them. They at length took a voyage to Rome; and being admitted to penance by Pope Alexander III, they went to Jerusalem; where, by the pope's order, they spent their lives in penitential austerities, died in the Black Mountain, and were buried at Jerusalem, in the church of the Templars.

King Henry was deeply affected at the intelligence of Becket's death; and dispatched an embassy to Rome, to clear himself from the imputation of being the cause of it. Immediately all divine offices ceased in the church of Canterbury, for a year, except nine days; at the end of which, by order of the pope, it was reconsecrated.

It was the policy of the pope to aggravate the blame of the king, as the occasion of Becket's death; and Henry was summoned to meet the papal legates in Normandy, to be tried for that murder! Though the legates had orders to grant the king absolution, they took many depositions, endeavouring to prove him guilty, in order to enhance the favour he was to receive from his Holiness! In short, he was permitted to clear himself by a solemn oath, that he neither commanded nor consented to Becket's assassination. He publicly declared, that he was extremely sorry for having been the occasion of his death, by the words he had imprudently uttered, and was ready to undergo whatever penance should be enjoined by the legates. Upon this declaration, and his oath, he was absolved from the alleged crime, on terms denoting the favour of the pope more than the innocence of the king. To obtain absolution, King Henry bound himself,—I. Never to oppose the pope's will, so long as he was treated as a Catholic prince. II. Never to hinder appeals to the Holy See. III. To lead an army to the Holy Land against the infidels, and to remain there at least three years. However, he might send thither two hundred men instead, if he would rather go in person against the Saracens in Spain. IV. To recal all that were banished on account of the late archbishop of Canterbury, restoring them their estates and revenues. V. To abolish all laws and customs lately introduced to the prejudice of the ecclesiastics at Canterbury, or any part of England. To these, which were made public, a secret article was added, by which the king obliged himself to go barefoot to Becket's tomb, and receive discipline from the hands of the monks of St. Austin.

Dr. Southey gives the following account of King Henry's degradation:—

"Landing at Southampton, he there left his court, and the mercenaries whom he had brought over, and set off on horseback with a few attendants for Canterbury. When he came within sight of its towers he dismounted, laid aside his garments, threw a coarse cloth over his shoulders, and proceeded to the city, which was three miles distant, barefoot over the flinty road, so that in many places his steps were traced in blood. He reached the church trembling with emotion, and was led to the martyr's shrine; there, in the crypt, he threw himself prostrate before it, with his arms extended, and remained in that posture, as if in earnest prayer, while the bishop of London solemnly declared in his name, that he had neither commanded, nor advised, nor by any artifice contrived the death of Thomas à Becket, for the truth of which he appealed to God: but because his words, too inconsiderately spoken, had given occasion for the commission of that crime, he now voluntarily submitted himself to the discipline of the church. The monks of the convent, eighty in number, and four bishops, abbots, and other clergy who were present, were provided each with a knotted cord; he bared his shoulders, and received five stripes from the prelates, three from every other hand. When this severe penance had been endured, he threw sackcloth over his bleeding shoulders, and resumed his prayers, kneeling on the pavement, and not allowing a carpet to be spread beneath him: thus he continued all that day, and till the midnight bell tolled for matins. After that hour, he visited all the altars of the church, prayed before the bodies of all the saints who were there deposited, then returned to his devotions at the shrine till day-break. During this whole time he had neither ate nor drank; but now, after assisting at mass, and assigning, in addition to other gifts, forty pounds a year for tapers, to burn perpetually before the martyr's tomb, he drank some water, in which a portion of Becket's blood was mingled. He then set off for London, where he found himself in a state incapable of exertion, and it was necessary to bleed him!" We leave our readers to make their own reflections on the terrible power of the Papal hierarchy!

This prescribed humiliation was intended by the pope and his council to strike terror into the sovereigns of Europe, and to show how dangerous it was to contradict the pleasure of the blasphemous court of Rome, thus illustrating the prediction of the apostle Paul concerning this Antichrist, "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." 2 Thess. ii, 4.

Canonization of Thomas 'a Becket.

Miracles were reported by the priests at Canterbury, as having been performed at the tomb of Becket. Upon this the pope sent legates to Canterbury to inquire into the matter. To them the good people of the place testified many prodigious things, of which they were persuaded by the priests, as miraculous; upon which, his Holiness passed the decree of canonization of the archbishop, by the name of St. Thomas of Canterbury.

In 1221, fifty years after the murder, Becket's body was taken up, in the presence of Henry III, and a great concourse of the nobility and others, and deposited in a rich shrine, erected at the expense of Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury. This shrine was soon visited from all parts of Christendom, as the pope had decreed that a jubilee of fifteen days should be solemnized in that church every fiftieth year. Gifts and offerings the most costly were presented at the tomb of Becket, as plenary indulgences were granted to all that visited the tomb; so that it is said 100,000 pilgrims were registered at one time in Canterbury. The devotion towards Becket had quite effaced in that town the adoration of the Deity, and almost that of the Virgin Mary. Of this superstition the following may be taken as illustrations. In one year the offerings were—

	£.	s.	d.
At the altar of God	3	2	6
At the altar of the Virgin	63	5	6
At the altar of St. Thomas	832	12	3

But the next year the disproportion was still greater for there was offered—

	£.	s.	d.
At the altar of God	0	0	0
At the altar of the Virgin	4	1	8
At the altar of St. Thomas	954	6	3

Louis VII, king of France, made a pilgrimage to this far-famed tomb, and bestowed on it a jewel, which was esteemed the richest in Christendom!

These are the "cunningly-devised fables," by which religion has been brought into contempt in the nations on the continent. Soon may every vestige of such superstitions be destroyed by the light of the Holy Scriptures!

SIR MATTHEW HALE'S JOURNAL.

The rules by which this great man endeavoured to regulate his daily life, will be read with lively interest.

Morning.

1. To lift up my heart to God in thankfulness for renewing my life.
2. To renew my covenant with God in Jesus Christ.
3. Adoration and prayer.
4. Setting a watch over my own infirmities and passions, over the snares laid in my way.

Day Employment.

There must be employment of two kinds:—

1. Our ordinary calling, to serve God in it, and perform it with faithfulness, diligence, and cheerfulness.
2. Our spiritual employment, mingling somewhat of God's immediate service in the business of the day.

If alone:—Beware of wandering, vain thoughts; fly from thyself, rather than entertain these. Let thy solitary thoughts be profitable: view the evidences of thy salvation, the state of thy soul, the coming of Christ, thine own mortality: it will make thee humble and watchful.

In company:—Do good to them. Use God's name reverently. Beware of leaving an ill impression of evil example. Receive good from them, if more knowing than thou.

Evening.

Cast up the accounts of the day. Beg pardon for every thing amiss. Gather resolutions of more vigilance. Bless the mercy and grace of God, which have supported and preserved thee.

Perplexity.—He that taketh his own cares upon himself, loads himself in vain with an uneasy burthen. The fear of what may come, expectation of what will come, desire of what will not come, and infallibility of redressing all these, must breed continual torment. I will cast all my cares upon God; he hath bidden me; they cannot hurt Him, he can redress them.—Bp. Hall.

ARGUMENTS ADVANCED BY THE JEWS,

TO PROVE THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE SCRIPTURES.

The Jewish nation, for proof of the Scriptures, allege the great and wonderful antiquity thereof. For as God, say they, was before idols, and truth before falsehood; so was the Scripture, which is the history of the true God, before the writings of pagans and infidels. Also, that the greater part of the things recounted in the Bible were done before most of the pagan gods were in existence; and that the very last writers of the Hebrew canon, which are Ezra, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, were almost five hundred years before the coming of Christ, when the second monarchy (i. e. the Persian) was flourishing; and were before most of the ancient heathen historiographers; to wit, Hellenicus, Herodotus, Pherecides, Thucydides, and Xenophon. And although the Gentiles had some poets before, as Homer, Orpheus, Hesiod, and Lycurgus the lawgiver, who lived some time after, yet the oldest of these went no further back than Solomon's time, which was five hundred years after Moses, who wrote the first four books of the Bible; after whose time it was that the most part of the heathen gods were invented, as Vulcan, Mercury, &c. as the Gentile genealogies corroborate. And as for Abraham, who lived five hundred years before Moses, he was not only older than these gods, but also before the most ancient of them, as Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, who were called the most ancient of the race of gods. And yet the Scriptures record events of more than two thousand years prior to these heathen deities being in existence. This proves that the Hebrew Scriptures are the most ancient writings or records known in the world, and were partly translated into various languages previously to the time of the Persian monarchy. See Eusebius, lib. ix, cap. ii, iii.

The first four books of Moses were written from the word of God himself as declared to Moses; but the following books, such as Judges, the Chronicles, &c. were written by general consent, to record the miracles done by God for the Jewish nation; the acts, whether good or evil, of the rulers and kings; the prophecies, as to the future dealings, &c.; and were also written at the time when the events they record actually occurred, or at the time when the aforesaid prophecies were delivered.

When any thing was written or recorded, it was done with much care and extreme caution. For either the whole synagogue who had the approving thereof (and amongst whom were commonly divers prophets) did know most certainly the things and miracles to be true (as did also all the people) that were recorded in these writings, or else they saw the same confirmed from God by signs and wonders, as in the books of the prophets, and of their lawgiver Moses.

When any thing was to be recorded, first there were made twelve authenticated copies for the use of all the twelve tribes; and then again in every tribe there were so many copies made as there were particular synagogues within that tribe: all was done by special persons appointed to that office, called scribes. These copies, after diligent review, were laid up by the whole congregation in the treasure-house of the synagogue, under divers locks and keys, not to be touched but by men appointed, and not to be used but with singular reverence. To add, diminish, corrupt, or alter, was present death by the laws of the nation. Thus, how could it be possible, say the Jews, that among these writings either falsehood should creep in at first, or truth once received should afterwards by any means be corrupted?

"THE WORM THAT NEVER DIES."

Several of our readers have expressed a wish to know the meaning of "that terrible expression of our Saviour," the "worm that never dies," and the "fire that is never quenched," with which the wicked will be punished in a future world. See Matt. xxv, 41; Mark ix, 44; Isa. lxvi, 24; Rev. xiv, 10, 11; and the "second death," Rev. xx, 14, 15.

In reply we would observe, that it is not necessary, as some have maintained, to believe that a living and sensible worm, or real, elementary, material fire is intended. We believe that the expressions are allegorical and figurative. "I have used similitudes," says God, "by the ministry of the prophets," Hos. xii, 10. Jesus Christ also used similitudes, which are denominated parables. In this style the torments of hell are described by fire and the worm, both in the Old and the New Testament. Our Saviour makes use of this similitude, to represent the punishment of condemned souls, Mark ix, 44. He also speaks of the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels, with which the reprobate wicked will be punished, Matt. xxv, 41. The sting and remorse of conscience will constitute the worm that will never die; and the wrath of God upon the whole persons of the lost will be the fire that is unquenchable. Mr. Pollock describes these with much power of language.

"One I remark'd
Attentively; but how shall I describe
What nought resembles else my eye hath seen?
Of worm or serpent kind it something look'd,
But monstrous, with a thousand snaky heads,
Eyed each with double orbs of glaring wrath;
And with as many tails, that twisted out
In horrid revolution, tipp'd with stings;
And all its mouths, that wide and darkly gaped,
And breath'd most poisonous breath, had each a sting,
Forked, and long, and venomous, and sharp;
And in its writhings infinite, it grasp'd
Malignantly what seem'd a heart, swoln, black,
And quivering with torture most intense;
And still the heart, with anguish throbbing high,
Made effort to escape, but could not; for Howe'er it turn'd, and oft it vainly turn'd,
These complicated foldings held it fast.
And still the monstrous beast with sting of head
Or tail transpierced it, bleeding evermore.
What this could image, much I search'd to know;
And while I stood, and gaz'd, and wonder'd long,
A voice, from whence I knew not, for no one
I saw, distinctly whisper'd in my ear
These words—'This is the Worm that never dies.'"

Eternal Death — The Second Death.

"Fast by the side of this unsightly thing,
Another was pourtray'd, more hideous still;
Who sees it once, shall wish to see 't no more.
For ever undescrib'd let it remain!
Only this much I may or can unfold.
Far out it thrust a dart, that might have made
The knees of terror quake; and on it hung,
Within the triple barbs, a being pierc'd
Through soul and body both. Of heavenly make Original the being seem'd, but fall'n,
And worn and wasted with enormous woe.
And still around the everlasting lance
It writh'd, convuls'd, and utter'd mimic groans;
And tried and wish'd, and ever tried and wish'd
To die; but could not die. Oh, horrid sight!
I trembling gaz'd, and listen'd, and heard this voice
Approach my ear—'This is Eternal Death.'"

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XVI.

On Rewards.

Dear Madam,

The aspect of this subject is more inviting than that of the last; but proper views of its nature are equally rare. Reward, you know, signifies payment for good conduct: it is therefore a species of wages. Like wages in other instances, it need not be a matter of precise stipulation, it may be only a tacit expectancy; and, like wages in other instances, it need not be paid in money. Hence then it appears to me, that a question of considerable importance arises; namely, will you reward your child for his good conduct? It appears to me to be decidedly objectionable to do so, for the following reasons.

1st. Whenever a child is rewarded, either with commendations or presents for his good conduct, an impression is thereby communicated to his mind, that he is to be good for the sake of what he can get by it. Thenceforward, virtue and duty represent themselves to his mind as marketable commodities; and the result will be, that when there are no buyers, he will become indifferent to the possession of such wares. You are aware, that it is of the utmost importance to the excellency of your child's character, and to his everlasting welfare, that he should be taught to love propriety of conduct from principle, and inclined to perform it independently of a view to consequences. He may indeed be taught that good conduct is attended with advantage, but every thing which is calculated to make him pursue good conduct for the mere sake of advantage, or with a considerable regard to it, should be avoided. Yet is not this the real tendency of the system of paying him, or giving him presents, or taking him on an excursion, because he has been a good boy?

2dly. The system of rewards for good conduct (I speak simply of the system as applied to private education, and to that stage of it which falls under the immediate superintendence of the parent), is calculated to increase the difficulties of education. If once you begin you must go on with it. At the same time the appetite for reward you have induced in the mind of your infant will increase, and you will find that your successive rewards must increase in value. Besides all this, it is troublesome to the last degree. How painful it is to see a parent purchasing the obedience of his child! How many words, and even hours, are wasted, in conference with the wilful infant! the parent promising and threatening on her part, and the child remaining reluctant or obstinate, till she has either bid high enough, or threatened deeply enough, to induce him to act. How distressing to see a parent reduced to this dilemma, or the child becoming mercenary, and artful, and disobedient!

Mrs. Child relates the following story in her book upon education.

"A mother was very busy in preparing for company. Her children knew by experience, that when she was in a hurry she would indulge them in any thing, for the sake of having them out of the way. George began—'Mother, I want a piece of mince pie.' The answer was, 'It is nearly bed-time, and mince pie will hurt you.' He repeated the request. You shall have a piece of cake, if you will sit down and be still,' was, at length, the reply. The boy ate his cake; and liking the system of being hired to sit still, he soon began again: 'Mother, I want a piece of mince pie.' The first answer was repeated. 'Mother, I want a piece of mince pie—I want a piece of mince pie'—was repeated incessantly. 'Will you leave off teazing, if I give you a piece?' 'Yes, I will—certain—true.' Soon afterwards, with his mouth half full, he began again—'I want another piece—I want another piece.' 'No, George, I shall not give you another mouthful. Go, sit down, you naughty boy! You always behave worst when I am going to have company.' George continued his teazing, and at last said, 'If you don't give me another piece, I'll roar.' This threat not being attended to, he kept his word. Upon this, his mother seized him by the shoulder, and shook him angrily. 'Hold your tongue, you naughty boy!' 'I will, if you will give me another piece of pie,' said he. Another small piece was given him, after he had promised that he certainly would not teaze her any more. As soon as he had eaten it, he of course began again, and with the additional threat, 'If you don't give me a piece, I'll roar after the company comes, so loud that all can hear me.' The end of all this was, that the boy had a sound whipping, was put to bed, and could not sleep all night, because the mince pie made his stomach ache."

This, it seems, is a true story. To me it appears a perfect illustration of the whole system of rewarding a child for good behaviour in any way whatever, and equally of the evil of offering him an inducement to be obedient.

Yet how perpetually is this done in almost every family. As soon as a child can understand, he finds himself praised, or scolded and threatened. He accordingly learns to wait before he will act, till he is induced or driven. What numberless words are thus thrown away, and what lamentable consequences are produced. It appears to me that a child would never expect such things, if they were not offered to him; but that a uniform system of judicious treatment being pursued, a family of young children would be as manageable as a flock of lambs.

With what delight have I witnessed, in a well-regulated family, a young boy coming to his father, and asking permission to accept an invitation to play, given him by the child of a neighbour; and upon the parent, after hesitating a few moments, mildly and without any thing marked in his manner, saying 'No,'—the child was silent. I looked at the expression of their countenances. The father's was that of mild authority: the child's that of unruffled cheerfulness. This was the result of good management, begun at the beginning, and pursued without deviation.

It appears to me that a parent should avoid the system of paying his child to be good, as the greatest of all evils. However kind she may be to him, whatever presents she may bestow upon him, never should she breathe the contaminating secret, that it is because he has been good. I disapprove of a parent giving her child many presents: let those few which she gives be apportioned to his age and pursuits, and be very good of their kind; but let them be tokens of her love, not wages for her child's obedience. Never should she kiss or caress her child after he has pleased her: this is a reward. Never should she praise him: this is of the same nature. Let the structure of education be reared as silently as was Solomon's temple. The materials were all prepared at a distance, and when brought to the spot were only adjusted; and thus this most beautiful edifice daily grew, but there was not the sound of an axe or a hammer heard within it. Education should be a noiseless process.

When I hear a mother and her children debating, when I hear her threatening or promising, and them entreating, even when I hear a command issued a second time, I feel persuaded that defective principles and practice of education have been pursued. Nothing, on the other hand, is so delightful and beautiful as the tranquillity of a well-disciplined household. This is indeed that

CLERICUS.

A VOICE OF PEACE FROM IRELAND.

DISTRACTED IRELAND demands the kindest sympathy of every Christian throughout the British empire. With its complaints and wrongs, and their causes, we do not meddle: we are content to leave them to the wisdom of the Legislature and the Government, praying that the distressed clergy and the suffering peasantry may find speedy relief. While we are hearing such reports of cruelty, malevolence, and irreligion, prevailing in unhappy Ireland, we are delighted to receive such a paper as the following from one of our IRISH Correspondents, we believe a LADY, whose life is devoted to do good. It breathes the genuine spirit of the Gospel of Christ, and may be read with profit by British Christians.—ED.

AN IRISH ADDRESS TO CHRISTIANS.

Dear Brethren and Sisters in Christ,

Permit me to call your attention to a few important facts at the present awful crisis. The enemy of mankind is abroad in the world, using every means in his power to deceive and ruin the souls of our unfortunate fellow-creatures. "He hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them:" and shall we, who by divine grace alone have been "made to differ," shall we not employ the talents committed to our care for their spiritual welfare? It is alone in the power of God to convert the heart of any human being; but He often works by means, and He has commanded us, "while we have opportunity, to do good unto all men;"—let me then, as a fellow-labourer with you in the vineyard of Christ, earnestly and affectionately entreat you all, to unite your efforts in making known to them the Gospel of the Redeemer, which is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Time is rapidly passing; and while we, alas! are but too often spending it in trifles, the souls of those around us are perishing for lack of knowledge, ignorant of Jesus Christ, as their only refuge from the wrath to come. Oh! let us, my dear Christian friends, with these awful considerations in view, be more diligent than heretofore, in setting Him forth as the repentant sinner's friend. Let us, who have found Him precious, recommend Him to those who are unacquainted with his salvation. Let us "cast our bread upon the waters, for we shall find it after many days." We know not where, with God's blessing, it may be made instrumental in "winning souls to Christ." We have many opportunities of imitating the example of our Divine Master, who "went about doing good." Many words might be spoken in season, where Christians are silent. The fear of man, as well as the mistaken idea of wounding the feelings of our unconverted fellow-sinners, prove too often a hindrance to the believer, to speak the truth with all boldness. Let us then pray, that the Holy Spirit may remove every obstacle, and inspire our hearts with more love and zeal in the Redeemer's cause.

Permit me to offer a remark with respect to that bond of Christian union, which should ever distinguish the followers of the Lamb. It is very much indeed to be lamented, that the different opinions regarding the Millenium, as well as the variety of sects and parties which have for years distracted the church of Christ, are great causes of separation among those who are "born of the same Spirit." Dear friends, these things ought not so to be: for while "one saith, I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos, are ye not carnal?" The new commandment given by our adorable Redeemer was, "that ye love one another, as I have loved you;" and are we fulfilling this injunction when we allow subjects, comparatively of minor importance, to sever that bond of Christian union so emphatically enjoined. "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind;" and where a difference of opinion does exist, Christians should especially guard against entertaining any thing like animosity or party spirit, so unbecoming the followers of the "meek and lowly Jesus." If our hearts and minds were more engaged in the exercise of love to Him, and love to the souls of our fellow-creatures, there would not be so much schism in the church of Christ; and the observation made during the primitive ages of Christianity, "See how those Christians love one another!" would be as applicable to us, as it was to those who now surround the throne of the Lamb. Praying that the Holy Spirit may "increase your faith, and give you all joy and peace in believing," I remain, dear Christian friends, in the bonds of the everlasting Gospel,

YOUR FELLOW-LABOURER IN THE LORD.

Dublin, Jan. 16, 1833.

BRITISH SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

LITTLE has hitherto been attempted to invite the attention of British soldiers to the saving realities of the Gospel of Christ. Appeals have been made to us repeatedly on their behalf, and we shall feel happy in contributing by the CHRISTIAN'S PENNY MAGAZINE to promote their spiritual welfare. We have before us a communication, in which the writer says —

"I have the great satisfaction of informing you, that the Soldiers' best interests are not wholly neglected; and I doubt not but you will feel a pleasure in making known the humble endeavours of a Society formed in Westminster, called 'The SOLDIER'S FRIEND SOCIETY for promoting the Knowledge of Religion in the British Army.' They have built for the Soldiers in London a convenient chapel, in White Horse Yard, Broadway, Westminster, where the Gospel is preached to them three times every Sunday, and once in the week; and many are in the habit of attending. This is the first object of the Society: but they have adopted other means, such as establishing Reading Rooms and Libraries for them; the distribution of Religious Tracts and Books; and by encouraging Meetings for Prayer. These various means have been blessed by God to the conversion of many Soldiers. The Society likewise employs a Missionary, who devotes his whole time to the Soldier's cause; and as this is but an infant cause, and does not lend its exertions to the establishment of sects or parties, but endeavours to act upon the broad principles of Christianity, they hope to meet with encouragement from the Religious Public. Good men of all religious denominations are more or less interested in our military population. Infidels are sowing their poisonous productions among them: we hope, by being able to distribute such publications as those of the Religious Tract Society, to counteract their wicked designs."

We shall be glad to hear more particulars of this interesting Society, and to announce the publication of a cheap little volume for Soldiers and Sailors, which is now in the press, entitled, "THE SAILOR AND SOLDIER'S CHRISTIAN FRIEND AND POCKET COMPANION." This work has been compiled by a well-known author, at the urgent request of several devoted friends of our fellow-subjects in the Army and Navy.

Why do I find such struggling in me, provoking me to sin, putting me back from that which is good? The answer is soon given — Thou art a wrestler, not a conqueror. — Gurnal.

Death-Bed Testimonies.

COLLECTED BY THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BUTTON.

No. III.

REV. RISDON DARRACOT,

WELLINGTON, SOMERSET.

In his last letter to me, dated Jan. 1, 1759, he says, after he had been ill eleven days, "I find somewhat infinitely soothing and charming in these four lines, which our dear tutor has put into the mouth of a child,

> 'If to correct me be his will,
> I'll bear it with submission still,
> A tender Father sure He proves,
> And but corrects because he loves.'
> DODDRIDGE.

Oh! what less than a thousand arguments in that one, for the most cordial, sweet, humble submission? O my dear brother, how sweet to see our comforts and our crosses, our mournful and our joyful circumstances, our life and our death, all in the hands of such a Father; all equally under his direction, and all evidently designed by him for our good; all proceeding from his everlasting love, terminating at last in our everlasting salvation. This lays an easy foundation for that precept, which is a strange one to a carnal world, 'in every thing give thanks.'"

Through a tedious illness of three months, and with intervals of excruciating pain (arising partly from five stones found in his left kidney, and partly from such an inflammation in that kidney as occasioned its total putrefaction, which extended also to many adjacent parts), nothing was heard from his lips, but continued expressions of praise and thanksgiving. This led his apothecary to declare, "Of all the death-beds I ever attended, I never saw such an instance of holy resignation and triumph."

In a paper containing the choice of his funeral text, he says, "Before this will be communicated, I shall be gone to my Judge, and I can, and do rejoice, that he is my Saviour. I have good hope through grace, and I have once more tried the foundation of it, and I find it will stand in the prospect of eternity. I am able, blessed be God, and I would not for all the world be unable, to give a reason of the hope that is in me; and to my "SCRIPTURE MARKS" (a small tract of his, that has passed through several editions) I refer, as the solid evidence of my interest in Christ, who in point of all dependence, love, and esteem, is, and has been for more than twenty years, my all in all.

Some of his expressions a few weeks before his death, which a friend took down in writing, were these: "I am going to Jesus, whom I love, and whom I have so often preached." He then added to those that were with him, "I charge you, see to it that you meet me at the right hand of God at the great day."

At another time he said, "O what a mercy is it to have such a rock to build upon as the Lord Jesus Christ! I have found him to be a firm Rock that will never fail. What a mercy is it to have a covenant God to fly to!—a covenant that is ordered in all things and sure, which is all my desire, and all my salvation. I have found him to be a covenant-keeping God." He said to his wife, "My dear, do you speak of the goodness of God towards me, for I want a tongue to do it: I do not want a heart to praise him." At another time he said, "How good is God! He is all love, all goodness." Then added to those about him, "Hold out unto the end: I trust I have begotten you in Christ Jesus; may the Lord pour down plentifully of his Spirit upon you!" He then said, "What attendants have I got! Jesus is with me, angels are my guardians, the blessed Spirit is my comforter and supporter: and you, my dear Christian friends, waiting on me, and my dear wife." To a friend that came in, he said, "I have often sat with you at the table of the Lord here, but I am now going to sit around his board above. Those were days in which I took great delight, when I went to the house of God in company with you." He said to his wife, "I must leave you without any formality. When will the glorious day dawn, and these shadows flee away?"

The Monday before he died, he awoke very calm, and desired to know what the Apothecary thought of him; and when he gave but very little hopes, Mr. Darracot replied, "All is well: blessed be God, I know whom I have believed, and can rely on the promises: they are all mine, especially that, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee, and I am sure he will not."

The night before he died, he said, "Oh! what a good God have I, in and through Jesus Christ. I would praise him, but my lips cannot. Eternity will be too short to speak his praises." He then earnestly desired his tongue might be loosened to speak the praises of God; and the Lord heard and answered him. He was full of heavenly joy, and the faculties of his mind as strong and vigorous as ever. The apothecary coming in, he said, "O! Mr. K. what a mercy it is to be interested in the atoning blood of Jesus. You tell me I am dying. How much longer do you think it will be?" It was answered, that it was uncertain as to a few hours. "Will it be to-night?" It was answered, he might survive the night. "Well," said he, "all is well, I am ready. This, Sir, is agreeably to the doctrine I have at all times preached, that I now come to the Lord as a vile sinner, trusting in the merits and precious blood of my dear Redeemer. O grace, grace, free grace!

One of his Christian friends came to see him, to whom he said, "O I am glad to see you, you are some of the first fruits of my labours. Be stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; your labour shall not be in vain in the Lord. O! could I tell you what I now feel! No tongue can tell what I now enjoy. I want to be gone. O! GLORY! GLORY! GLORY!" He then begged to see his dear people, to talk to them of Christ and his grace: but he was entreated to forbear, that he might not hurt himself. "Well," said he, "you must sew up my lips or tie up my tongue, if I must not speak of Christ. If you will not let me see my dear people, be my trumpeters, to tell them what God has done for my soul. I told you in my "Scripture Marks," that my last work on earth should be praying for my people; and now would I pour out my whole soul in ardent prayer to God for them." He then offered a few petitions, but his spirits failed.

Upon recovering himself, he related the goodness of God to him in his sickness, and said, if he had a thousand lives to live he would live them all for Christ. He solemnly took his leave of all present, one by one, and said, "Watch your hearts, and keep them with all diligence, for out of them are the issues of life." Upon seeing his wife weeping, he said, "Weep not for me, nor yet for yourself, for you are a child of the covenant. I am going to see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all that are got to glory." He then repeated two stanzas from Watts's hymns, beginning with > "My God, and can an humble child."

The morning he died, his wife said to him, "My dear, you are just on the borders of glory." He replied, "I could not have thought it, had not the doctor and Mr. K. told me so, the passage is so easy." He then lay in a slumber, while all around thought him dying, as there was no pulsation in his wrists. About twenty minutes after, he awoke and asked, "Is Mr. K. come?" Being answered that he was, "My dear friend (said he), did you not tell me last night that I was dying?" I did, replied Mr. K. "Surely (said he) it cannot be, it is so easy, it is so easy; what a mercy is it to be in Christ! Oh! precious, precious Jesus! Now I am hoping, and believing, and rejoicing, and triumphing too!" There were ten or twelve Christian friends around his bed: he asked them how they did? Then wishing them all well, he added, "You see, my friends, I am now dying in the same faith I have always preached to you, and would not die any otherwise for all the world: O keep close to Christ!" Presently afterwards he said with a smile, "Come, Lord Jesus," and again asked, "Is this dying?" Being answered yes, he replied, "It cannot be, it is too good, it is too good." He then called for his wife and children, and took his leave of them with the utmost composedness, and serenity of mind. Observing them and all his friends weeping, he said to his wife, "My dearest, why do you weep? You shall rejoice. Rely on the promises. God will never leave nor forsake you. All his promises are true and sure. Well, I am going from weeping friends to congratulating angels and rejoicing saints in glory. Blessed be God, my dear friends, all is well. Mr. K., how long do you think it will be before I gain my dismission?" It was answered, not long. "Well, all is well, here I am, waiting. What a mercy it is to be in Jesus." He then threw abroad his arms, and said, "He is coming! He is coming! But surely this can't be dying! Oh! how astonishingly is the Lord softening my passage! Surely God is too good to such a worm! O speed thy chariot wheels, why are they so long in coming! I long to be gone." His last words were, "Faith and Hope."

> Funeral Sermon, preached by the Rev. Benjamin Fawcett, from Philip. iv, 1, "Therefore, my brethren, dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved."

"THEY SHALL STILL BRING FORTH FRUIT IN OLD AGE."

Many most remarkable illustrations of this beautiful descriptive prediction might be given, to demonstrate the infinite superiority of scriptural principles above the pernicious speculations of infidelity. We make our appeal to those who may be tempted to doubt the divinity of Christianity, to compare the lives and benevolence of "those who serve God, and those who serve him not." Christianity requires and demands the scrutiny of even its enemies; and it says of its friends, "By their fruits ye shall know them." We may refer to all the benevolent and religious institutions, formed to promote the welfare and happiness of mankind, as a proof of the divinity of their principles.

"Those that be planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing; to show that the Lord is upright." Psal. xcii, 13—15.

Mr. John Hill, who died in the hope of glory, at his house in Westminster, Nov. 12, 1832, aged 88, was a consistent professor of the Gospel for more than fifty years, illustrating the truth of the Psalmist's declaration by subscribing to most of our principal Societies during his life, and left, among others, the following legacies in his will.

THE SAILOR-LAD AND HIS BIBLE.

At a meeting of the Aberdeen Auxiliary Bible Society, the following anecdote was related by an eye-witness of the scene.

"Last year, a vessel from Stockholm, in Sweden, was driven upon our coast, in a tremendous gale, and became a total wreck. Her condition was such, that no human aid could possibly preserve the crew. In a short time after the vessel struck, she went to pieces. The persons on shore beheld with grief the awful state of those on board, but could render them no aid. They all perished, except one lad; and he was driven by the waves upon a piece of the wreck, entwined among the ropes attached to the mast. Half naked and half drowned, he reached the shore.

"As soon as they had rescued him, they saw a small parcel tied round his waist with a handkerchief. Some thought it was his money; others, the ship papers; and others said it was his watch. The handkerchief was unloosed, and, to their surprise, it was his Bible!—a Bible given to the lad's father by the British and Foreign Bible Society. Upon the blank leaf was a prayer written, that the Lord might make the present gift the means of saving his son's soul. Upon the other blank leaf was an account how the Bible came into the father's hands, with expressions of gratitude to the society from which he received it. To this was added, a request to his son, that he would make it the man of his counsel; and the remark, that he could not allow him to depart from home without giving him the best pledge of his love—a Bible; although that gift deprived the other parts of the family of so great a treasure. The Bible bore evident marks of having been often read with tears."

CHINESE IDOLS.

NOTICES OF CHINA.

ı, with its teeming population of idolaters, must s a generous sympathy in every Christian bosom. individual in Britain is reminded every morning ening of its fertility, while partaking of the re- ıg beverage of TEA, the whole of which, to the ıt of about 30,000,000 lbs. annually, is furnished ıt remote but interesting country. We purpose ng two or three articles to the illustration of the ers of that most ancient of all nations in the ; for they can trace up their history to the time : Deluge!

· engraving contains a representation of three of ıost celebrated idols of China, copied from the lid folio account of the Dutch Embassy of the teenth century. The first idol on the left hand sents Immortality, and is twenty feet high; the on the right hand is the image of Pleasure, of me height; and that in the middle denotes the King Kang, most gorgeously attired and crowned. ices of a costly kind were, at their festivals, d to these abominable representations.

na Proper is reckoned by Pinkerton 1,330 British from north to south, and 1,030 miles from east to west. Its population in 1794 was reported to the British Embassy, to be three hundred and thirty three millions; but Dr. Morrison, who acted as interpreter to Lord Amherst's Embassy in 1814, translated a statistical account of China, from which it appears that the population was less than half that number, being not quite one hundred and forty-six millions: still that is an immense multitude of immortal souls, living without the true knowledge of God, and of the only Mediator between God and man, Jesus Christ.

Infidels have availed themselves of the Chinese claims, in relation to the antiquity of their nation, with a view to overthrow the chronology of Moses, as contained in the book of Genesis: but it has been only to show more clearly the divinity of the Scriptures. Gibbon, whom no one will commend as a friend to religion, observes, "The original seat of the nation appears to have been in the north-west of China, in the provinces of Chen-si and Chan-si. Under the two first dynasties, the principal town was still a moveable camp: the villages were thinly scattered: more land was employed in pasture than tillage: the exercise of hunting was ordained, to clear the country from wild beasts; Pe-tcheli (where Pekin stands) was a desert; and the southern provinces were peopled with India savages.

The dynasty of the Han (before Christ 206) gave the empire its actual form and extent.

"The era of the Chinese monarchy has been variously fixed, from 2952 to 2132 years before Christ; and the year 2637 has been chosen for the lawful epoch, by the authority of the present emperor. The difference arises from the uncertain duration of the two first dynasties, and the vacant space that lies beyond them, as far as the real or fabulous times of Fohi, or Hoang-ti. Sematsien dates his authentic chronology from the year 841. The thirty-six eclipses of Confucius (thirty-one of which have been verified) were observed between the years 722 and 480 before Christ. The historical period of China does not ascend above the Greek Olympiads.

"After several ages of anarchy and despotism, the dynasty of the Han (before Christ 206) was the era of the revival of learning. The fragments of ancient literature were restored; the characters were improved and fixed; and the future preservation of books was secured by the useful inventions of ink, paper, and the art of printing. Ninety-seven years before Christ, Sematsien published his first history of China. His labours were illustrated, and continued, by a series of one hundred and eighty historians. The substance of their works is still extant; and the most considerable of them are now deposited in the king of France's library."—Decline and Fall, vol. iii, p. 328.

Dr. Shuckford, in his "Sacred and Profane History of the World Connected," makes it appear all but certain, that Fohi, the founder of the Chinese empire, was no other than the Noah of the Bible. That learned author remarks, "The Chinese have been supposed to have records that reached higher than the history of Moses: but we find by the best accounts of their antiquities that this is false. Their antiquities reach no higher than the times of Noah, for Fohi was their first king. They pretend to no history or memoirs that reach up higher than his times; and by all their accounts, the age of Fohi coincides with that of Moses' Noah. Their writers in the general agree, that Fohi lived about 2952 years before Christ. The author of Mirandorum in Sinâ et Europâ computes him to reign but 2847 years before our Saviour; and Alvarez Sevedo places his reign not so early, imagining it to be but 2060 years; and all these computations agree well enough with the times of Noah; for Noah was born, according to archbishop Usher, 2948 years, and died 2016 years before Christ; so that all the several computations about Fohi, fall pretty near within the compass of Noah's life. But we shall hereafter see many reasons to conclude Moses' Noah and the Chinese Fohi to be the same persons." Vol. i, 26, 27. The Doctor adds,

"There are many reasons, from the Chinese traditions concerning Fohi, to think him and Noah the same person. First, They say Fohi had no father, i. e. Noah was the first man in the postdiluvian world; his ancestors perished in the flood, no tradition hereof being preserved in the Chinese annals; Noah, or Fohi, stands there as if he had no father at all. Secondly, Fohi's mother is said to have conceived him encompassed with a rainbow; a conceit very probably arising from the rainbow's first appearing to Noah, and the Chinese being willing to give some account of his original. Thirdly, Fohi is said to have carefully bred seven sorts of creatures, which he used to sacrifice to the Supreme Spirit of heaven and earth: and Moses tells us that Noah took into the ark, of every clean beast by sevens, and of the fowls of the air by sevens; and after the flood, Noah built an altar, and took of every clean beast, and every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings. Fourthly, The Chinese derive the name of Fohi from his oblation; and Moses gives Noah his name upon account of the grant of the creatures for the use of man, which he obtained by his offering. Lastly, The Chinese history supposes Fohi to have settled in the province of Xeusi, which is the north-west province of China, and near Ararat, where the ark rested." Vol. i, pp. 90, 91.

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

WILLIAM now perceived more fully the importance of an acquaintance with the "Evidences of Christianity." Desirous of being furnished and established in mind on those subjects, he resolved on paying further attention to that branch of study. He was in a good measure convinced, from his previous reading, that it would be the most effectual means of improving his mind, and of promoting his spiritual edification.

By a happy providence he became possessed of some of the most admirable authors in that department of knowledge, in the publication of a choice collection of the most valuable works of that class. With inexpressible pleasure, as well as edification, he read that extended series, including "Paley's Evidences of Christianity;" "Grotius on the Truth of Christianity;" "Porteus's Summary of the Evidences of Christianity;" with the excellent works of Addison, Locke, Doddridge, and Soame Jenyns, on different branches of the same subject; "Littleton on the Conversion of St. Paul;" "West on the Resurrection;" "Sherlock's Trial of the Four Witnesses;" "Drs. Douglas and Campbell on the Miracles;" "Jones's Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity;" Dr. Beattie on the "Immutability of Truth," and some others.

These works William read with considerable attention and care; by which his mind was thoroughly confirmed in the truth of Christianity; more especially after reading the "Three Sermons of Dr. Watts on the Inward Witness of Christianity." This last appeared to him, in many respects, far more valuable than any of the others, especially in one particular, as it leads the plain, unlettered Christian to the consideration of that species of proof, which is at once the most simple and satisfactory, peculiar to the godly man, and ever ready at his command—the assurance which is derived from his own experience, in the transforming influence of the Gospel upon his own soul.

Some of the remarks of Dr. Watts, to which William refers, are the following:—

"Many and glorious are the outward testimonies that God has given to our religion, both in the days when his Son Jesus Christ dwelt on earth, and in the time of the ministration of the apostles, who followed their blessed Lord. The miracles wrought, the prophecies fulfilled, and the various glories attending the ministration of the gospel, conspire to confirm our faith; each of them are evidences of the truth and divinity of this doctrine; and all of them joined together, bear such a testimony as cannot be resisted. We live now, in these latter days, at a long distance from those seasons wherein these miracles were wrought, and wherein God appeared in so immediate a manner from heaven, to witness to the gospel of his Son; but God has taken care to furnish every true believer with a sufficient witness of Christianity; we are not left void of evidence at this day. 'He that believeth, hath the witness in himself.' There is an internal testimony given to the gospel of Christ in the heart of every one that receives it in truth.—The gospel of Christ is like a seal or signet, of such inimitable and divine graving, that no created power can counterfeit it; and when the Spirit of God has stamped this gospel on the soul, there are so many holy and happy lines drawn or impressed thereby, so many sacred signatures and divine features stamped on the mind, that give certain evidence of a heavenly signet, and a heavenly operator.

"A Christian, who has well studied the doctrines and proofs of Christianity, can give sufficient reasons for the truth of them, and for his believing them. He finds what is sufficiently satisfactory to confirm his belief in the outward testimonies, in the miracles wrought in the world, and in the prophecies fulfilled. 'I have,' says he, 'in my understanding many arguments and evidences of the truth of the gospel, and my reason is convinced that it is a divine religion. But there is a miracle wrought in my heart, that is of more efficacy than this, and it is to me a more convincing proof of the gospel of Christ—eternal life is begun in me. I find my conscience, that was disturbed with the guilt of sin, established in peace upon solid hopes of pardon. I have an interest in the love of God, and lively sensations of that love; I have a hatred of all sin; I live above the world, and have a holy contempt of the trifles, businesses, and cares of this life; I delight in the company of Him who dwells in heaven; I find in my soul that I love him, and love those who are like him: I walk as seeing him who is invisible; and I have a zeal for his glory, and with active diligence I am employed for the honour of his name in the world. These things I find wrought in me by the gospel of Christ. I feel that I am quite altered from what I once was, I am a new creature, and the change is divine and heavenly. There is something within me, that bears witness, that my religion is from God.'

"It is a strong and powerful witness, and ever ready at hand to baffle the most learned sophisms, and the boldest temptations. It lies so near, and is always at hand, that it is a present shield against every flying arrow from the camp of infidelity. The quibbles of logic, against the sense and experience of a true Christian, are but as darts of straw and stubble against the scales of a leviathan.

"And though there are many and sufficient arguments drawn from criticism, history, and human learning, to prove the sacred authority of the Bible, and such as may give abundant evidence to an honest inquirer, and full satisfaction that it is the word of God; yet this is the chief evidence that the greatest part of Christians can ever attain, of the divine original of the Holy Scripture itself, as well as the truth of the doctrines contained in it, viz. that they have found such a holy and heavenly change passed upon them, by reading or hearing the propositions, the histories, the promises, the precepts, and threatenings of this book: and thence they are wont to infer, that the God of truth would not attest a book, which was not agreeable to his mind, with such glorious instances of his own power and grace."

Mrs. Hannah More urges upon those who have the education of ladies, to direct the attention of their pupils to the "Evidences of Christianity;" and, as one of the principal means of strengthening and improving their minds, that wise preceptress recommends "Bishop Butler's Analogy of Religion."

But perhaps no one has urged this course of mental improvement with greater force than the late Rev. Mr. Orme, in his discourse on "The Advantages of an extensive acquaintance with the Evidences of Revelation." In recommending to Teachers this course of training to their pupils, Mr. Orme observes, "With the greatest safety might they put into their hands some of the best works in support and illustration of the Christian scheme, and direct their course of reading; by which they would gradually be fitted for understanding the whole subject, and enabled to perceive the breadth and depth of the foundation on which the entire edifice of Christianity rests. This investigation would sharpen their acuteness, and stimulate their improvement. It would lead them to examine the different kinds of testimony and evidence; to discriminate the pretensions of imposture from the claims of truth; to appreciate the value of solid argument; and to scorn the wickedness of misrepresentation, and the impiety of levity and jesting on sacred subjects. It would induce a love of truth, a reverence for its claims, a hallowed regard to its authority, with a hatred of every thing opposed to integrity and honour, which might form the basis of moral habits of the most important description. It would be impossible to promote this acquaintance with the evidences of Revelation, without extending the range of their knowledge. An uninformed or ignorant person is not capable of estimating the full strength of the Christian cause. It supposes an acquaintance with many subjects, if its full amount is to be ascertained. History, criticism, science, and experience in argument, all furnish their aid in this important inquiry, and contribute their respective quotas to confirm or elucidate the claims of the word of God."

Upon the comfort and happiness to be derived from an extensive knowledge of the "Evidences of Christianity," Mr. Orme makes these striking remarks:— "The enjoyment which springs from an enlightened acquaintance with the great scheme of redemption, and from an extensive knowledge of its grand and overpowering evidence, is of the purest and sublimest order. In that divinely-accredited scheme, we perceive the infinite love of God pouring its exhaustless stores to effect the deliverance and happiness of the world:—providing a Saviour, revealing his character, accepting his work, and attesting his claims:—appointing an order of means suited to the nature of the plan, and the condition of the objects proposed to be benefited by it:—connecting with those means a system of effective influence to ensure success, and to carry forward the design:—and encouraging all who believe to labour actively, and to suffer patiently, by the promise of an inheritance of imperishable glory. To have the full satisfaction that all this is the truth of God which cannot lie, the work of God which cannot fail, the engagement of God which cannot disappoint, must afford to the heirs of salvation, who have fled to lay hold on the hope set before them, strong and everlasting consolation. The floods of tribulation may swell around, and threaten to engulph them; but their anchor will hold fast, 'being fixed within the vail.' The world may seek to ensnare and allure them; but its honours and pleasures will have no glory in their estimation, by reason of the 'glory which so far excelleth.' The workings of unbelief may occasionally darken and bewilder their mind, and endanger their peace; but the word and oath of God, confirmed by the sacrifice of his Son, when again contemplated, will restore confidence, and reinvigorate the life of godliness. The darts of Satan may fly thick, and both annoy and wound; but the shield of faith, formed by the testimony of God, will at length successfully repel them all. Bodily strength may decay, mental vigour may decrease, death may approach clothed in all its terrors; but the deathless principle of God's implanting, fed by the means of his own appointment, and nourished by the sweetest influences of his Spirit, will even in those circumstances increase in strength, and evince its unearthly nature and origin. It will resist the progress of time, the effects of disease, and the fear of death. It will pass unhurt through the dark and cheerless valley, survive the dissolution of nature, smile over the ruins of the universe, and reign and triumph in immortality."

BRITISH ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

No. IV. Christianity in Britain in the Third Century, until the Conversion of Constantine the Great, A.D. 313.

Christianity doubtless made some progress in Britain after its revival in the time of Lucius, A.D. 164. But we have no information respecting its advancement until the close of the third century, when the tenth general persecution of the Christians arose under the emperor Dioclesian. Many were the martyrs to Christ in that season of trial, though we are not able to gain a perfect knowledge of the facts from the disfigured monkish legends in which they are recorded.

Alban, canonized by the superstitious with the title of "Saint," from whom his native town Verulamium, now St. Alban's, has been called, is mentioned as the first British martyr for Christ: we must therefore give a few brief notices of him. Alban had been seven years a soldier in the emperor's army; but returning to his native town, he entertained Amphibalus, a persecuted Welsh minister, by whose doctrines, prayers, and holy deportment, he was converted to the faith of Christ. His persecutors tracing the object of their pursuit, gave information to a magistrate, who sent to apprehend the Christian preacher. Alban generously put on the hairy cassock of his guest, and delivered himself to the officers, who led him to the tribunal. The judge demanding an account of his family, he replied, "To what purpose do you inquire of my family? If you would know my religion, I am a Christian." Then being asked his name, he said, "My parents named me Alban; and I worship the only true and living God, who created all things." Refusing to betray his pious guest, his spiritual father, or to sacrifice to the Roman gods, he was sentenced to be beheaded. Alban was first scourged, and then led to execution, as is said, on the spot where the Abbey now stands, which was erected to his memory, and called after his name. It is also said, that the soldier, who was appointed to put him to death, was so affected by the resignation and magnanimity of the virtuous Briton, that he chose rather to die with him than to be his executioner.

Amphibalus was soon discovered, and made to glorify his Saviour in shedding his blood, being first embowelled, and then stoned! The precise year in which these things occurred we cannot ascertain. Dioclesian ascended the throne of the Cæsars A.D. 284, and laid aside the purple A.D. 305. Some think the persecution under him raged but the two last years in Britain, though it continued nine years in most parts of the empire. Bede, and most of our old historians, place the martyrdom of St. Alban A.D. 286.

Aaron and Julius, two citizens of Caerleon, and many others, both men and women, suffered at the same time for the name of Christ; but most of their names have perished from the records in our old chronicles. Fuller, a church historian, has beautifully remarked concerning them, "It was superstition in the Athenians to build an altar to the unknown God; but it would be piety in us here to erect a monument in memorial of those unknown martyrs, whose names are lost. The best is, God's calendar is more complete than man's best martyrologies; and their names are written in the book of life, who on earth are wholly forgotten."

Divine Providence soon put a stop to these cruel persecutions, and the church enjoyed a large measure of tranquillity. Christianity in Britain henceforward received imperial protection. Constantine the Great, the first Roman emperor who embraced Christianity, is, by Dr. Anderson in his "Royal Genealogies," made not only a native of Britain, but son of a British princess! It is certain that his father, Constantius Chlorus, was at York, when, upon the abdication of Dioclesian, A.D. 305, he shared the Roman empire with Galerius Maximus, and that he died at York, A.D. 306, having first caused his son Constantine to be proclaimed emperor by his army and by the Britons.

That amiable prince expressed in his last moments his desire that his son Constantine should succeed him, as his filial affection to his mother Helena had been most exemplary. Constantius himself had steadily opposed the persecuting spirit of the times; and in reply to some courtiers, who urged him to dismiss from his service those who would not abandon the profession of Christianity, remarked, that "it could not expected of those who had forsaken their God, that they would prove faithful to their prince." Constantius is said to have recommended the Christians to the protection of his son Constantine with his expiring breath. We need not wonder therefore that he should embrace Christianity, especially when its principles were recommended by his pious mother Helena.

Constantine appears to have hesitated whether he should embrace Christianity or not: but in marching at the head of his army into Italy, it is said, that seeing the Christians so rapidly increase, and knowing their excellent principles and conduct, he retired to a place of solitude: revolving in his mind the consequences of the expected battle with his rival Maxentius, he implored the protection of the God of the Christians, when he beheld in the heavens the vision of a Cross, with this inscription in Greek, "CONQUER BY THIS." His pagan priests interpreted it as an ill omen, but the Christians were encouraged by it, and some of them recommended to him to have a standard made with that significant inscription. Constantine adopted the suggestion: a splendid banner was prepared, emblazoned with that motto: he marched against Maxentius, defeated him, and entered imperial Rome as conqueror.

At his triumph, he rejected the homage and applause of the multitude, pointing them to his new standard, as representing that by which he gained the victory; and when his own statue was afterwards erected in the Capitol, he caused an emblematical representation of the cross to be introduced, with this inscription: "By this victorious cross, Constantine has delivered Rome from tyranny, and restored to the senate and people their ancient glory."

From this period the profession of Christianity was honoured with all possible dignity and splendour. Helena, the mother of Constantine, became especially lavish in her contributions to honour the name of Christ; and though we have no particular account of her liberality towards Britain, the supposed land of her nativity, she is celebrated as having built a sumptuous edifice, or church, over the supposed site of the sepulchre of Christ at Jerusalem; for a particular account of which, see the "Christian's Penny Magazine," Vol. I, No. 22.

A REFLECTION AT SEA.

See how, beneath the moon-beam's smile,
  Yon little billow heaves its breast,
And foams and sparkles for a while,
  And murm'ring then subsides to rest.

Thus man, the sport of bliss and care,
  Rises on Time's eventful sea;
And, having swell'd a moment there,
  Thus melts into Eternity!

LETTER XVII.

On Habits of Order.

Dear Madam,

There is no need to explain to you the benefit of habits of order. You well know how much the beauty and the happiness of the universe result from the order which pervades it. You also know how important order is in the arrangement of our intellectual acquirements; and you have long ago experienced that it is essential to the quietude and well-being of a family. These sentiments must be common to every person who has arrived at maturity, and who has therefore had an opportunity of experiencing the comfort resulting from this principle, and of learning its value by having suffered from the want of it. But your child has no notion of all this; neither has he any inclination either to know, or still less to practise it. Habits of order must, like all other good habits, be early and habitually instilled.

As soon then as you give him a present, or entrust any thing to his keeping, tools, clothes, pencils, pens, paint-box, &c. let him be taught to have a particular place for every thing; and when he has done with it, let him be taught to return it, clean and in an orderly state, to its place. Let this rule be adopted, and pursued most rigorously. Never let him, for instance, go to bed, or out to walk, till he himself has put away the things which he had been using. Make him very particular about putting every thing into its place. Let the same rule be inculcated with regard to every thing relating to him, his books, his clothes, &c. &c.

In addition to the value of this rule, arising from the facility secured by it of finding every thing when it is wanted, and of having every thing in a constant readiness to be used, we may consider its influence upon the mind. Accustomed to arrangement in his conduct, he will insensibly learn to arrange his ideas. His mind, like his own little room, will be in constant order. He will know where to look for his knowledge, if I may so speak, and there he will find it. When he acquires a new idea, he will put it to the ideas of the same sort of which he is possessed already.

It may seem strange to talk of having a place for our ideas; but it is a mode of speaking respecting the subject which is common to writers, and we are all conscious of what it means. The benefit of it is incalculable. It enables us to pursue one topic of writing and of speaking steadily. It affords us the means of knowing the real amount of our information upon any topic, and the power of using it at will.

This mental habit is however only to be acquired and preserved by use; and in consequence of the sympathy between our habits of body and of mind, the observance of order in domestic arrangements is in this respect alone truly valuable.

Closely allied to this habit is that of punctuality. I am afraid that punctuality is a matter a good deal of disposition. Some persons are naturally punctual: others can scarcely ever acquire the habit, although suffering every day from the want of it. It seems essential to success in life. It is the girdle of all other good qualities. The celebrated Lord Mansfield is said to have declared, that he had known many men of great talent, who had never been successful because they were not prompt and punctual; and that, on the other hand, he had known many persons who were prompt and punctual, but who did not possess any particular talent; and that between these two causes, multitudes fail of reaching that point of utility to their fellow-men, which they would otherwise have attained.

The want of punctuality is often to be ascribed to an acquired listlessness of disposition, the want of order, thoughtlessness in making engagements, irresolution to withstand temptation, and, above all things, to a want of sacred reverence to a promise. Let all these things be cautiously attended to. Teach him to avoid making a promise as much as possible. Teach your child always to consider well before he makes an engagement, whether he shall be able, and in all probability inclined, when the time comes to fulfil it. Never permit him to drink of the fatal delusion, that in order to be agreeable he must comply with every body's request. Many persons suffer intensely from a spurious species of good-nature, in being unable to resist a solicitation which they see will gratify others. They would be much happier if they could learn to say "No" on proper occasions. Should you see this disposition exist in your infant, eradicate it as a weed of bitterness. Show him that the genuine respect of mankind is all that is worth having; and they never respect any thing but stability, prudence, and decision: that the listless, irregular, and unpunctual man, though often good-natured and pleasing and kind and inoffensive, is nevertheless the mere plaything of society, a mere means of amusement, often wanted, but little valued: that he is generally left behind in the race of human life, daily labouring under disadvantages which result from his habits; and that the rest of mankind, if they do not condemn or despise him, yet make him the object of their wayward pity.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.

Clericus.

A MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

To whom was Sir William Jones almost exclusively indebted, in his most important, because earliest years, for all his future eminence? Who was it that bent the twig, or taught the young idea how to shoot? Who was it, that, to his incessant importunities for information on casual topics of conversation, and which were so watchfully stimulated, used kindly and constantly to reply, "Read, and you will know?" Who was it that cultivated his mind so that in his fourth year he was able to read any English book, and stored his mind from his birth to his ninth and tenth years? When, in his ninth year, he had the misfortune to break his thigh bone, which detained him at home more than a year, who was it that was his constant companion, and amused him daily with the perusal of such English books as were adapted to his taste and capacity? For all this, and much more than this, we are referred to only one individual, and that was his dear mother—an extraordinary woman, then a solitary widow, his father having died when William was only three years old.

THE BLESSEDNESS OF THE SAINTS IN AN INTERMEDIATE STATE.

Above all sin and sorrow they are plac'd,
And with the sight of God Incarnate grac'd.
In outward courts at present they reside,
And at a distance from the throne abide:
There, longing for reunion to their dust,
For the full congregation of the just;
To hear the awful trump to judgment sound;
To be eternally absolv'd and crown'd;
With bodies glorified to be array'd;
Inhabitants of the bright temple made:
Their morning bliss no thought can comprehend,
Which their meridian beams shall far transcend.

SCRIPTURAL REFLECTIONS ON THE ALMIGHTY.

The greatest blessing that man can enjoy on earth, is the sense of reconciliation with God; to be enabled to hold sweet spiritual converse with the Author of his being, by that lively faith and apprehension of Him, which can be realized only whilst we view the Great Jehovah under the character given of him in the Scriptures:—a merciful Parent! an Almighty and a faithful Friend! All which and infinitely more he is through Jesus Christ. The Scriptures are full of consolation on these points. They reveal to man the means of access to God! They point to him "an open door," a "new and living way to the holiest of all by the blood of Jesus." Having taken God at his word, what scenes of glory and blessedness open for the contemplation and enjoyment of the soul! That God, who has been so imperfectly known, or recognized under characters only of vastness and majesty, perhaps as the Great Eternal! the Almighty! the Great Spirit of Nature! or by other of the more powerful attributes of Deity, now appears in a light of infinite love, attracting the sublimest regard of his creatures by developments of the unbounded goodness as well as greatness of his character. When discovered under such representations as those of "a Father"—"The God who is love"—"The Saviour"—The Sanctifier"—"The Holy One"—"The Husband"—The Vine"—"The Foundation"—"The fulness of Him that filleth all in all"—"The Shepherd"—The Friend of man"—"The Brother born for adversity"—"The Portion of his people"—and numberless other equally beautiful and tender, yet familiar designations;—who would not wish to love such a God? The way then is open: Christ Jesus is the way; and the Holy Spirit will be the guide to it; and eternity shall unveil the fuller irradiations of the glory of God, which flesh and blood cannot inherit. S. F. W.

DIFFERENT VIEWS OF DEATH.

A calm and placid reflection on death, is what few can attain; and to most, the very idea of the time when this last enemy shall have them within his grasp, is accompanied by an inward and involuntary shudder. Any attempt to place the character of death in its true light, and to inculcate principles, the acting on which can alone make sweet the hour of awful solemnity, when all earthly things are closing on us for ever, cannot, it is to be hoped, be altogether unprofitable.

But in considering the subject of death, we must look at it in two distinct lights, as relating to the righteous, and to the wicked.

First, then, we will consider the character of death, as relating to the righteous. By the true and established Christian believer, it cannot, if calmly reflected on, or at least ought not, to be viewed with any feelings, but those of satisfaction and welcome. It ought to be hailed by him as the messenger sent by God to free him from this world of sin and temptation, and exalt him to that heavenly rest which will prove so refreshing to his soul, which hath borne the heat and burthen of the day. Yet so deeply is our nature corrupted, so strong is the hold which the things of this world have obtained in our affections, that many even of true Christians do not look upon death with feelings altogether consistent with their character, as seeking a better country, even an heavenly. Were this subject oftener before their minds, and did they more frequently reflect on the necessarily short period which must elapse, before they must pass from time to eternity, how widely different would the transient things of this world appear. If it be asked, how such a blessed state of mind can be attained, as to be composed, calm, and happy in our last moments, the reply is, by a life of faith on the Son of God. O how many, and how great are the blessings with which such a life is attended, not only in the next life, as many perhaps may think, but even in this life. O how false is the idea (so common, alas!) that religion is an enemy to happiness. Certain it is, that true happiness and serenity of mind is alone to be found in a strict adherence to the commands of God, and a firm reliance on his infinite mercy, through the atonement of our blessed Saviour.

The second light in which we are to consider death, is as relating to the wicked. This is indeed an awful subject for contemplation. Well may the wicked man fly as it were from the very thought of death! Well may he shrink with horror when the thought flashes across his mind, that he too must soon be brought to pass through the valley of the shadow of death; for then the moment will have arrived when Justice shall execute her terrible work, and he will be left to mourn through all eternity the fatal effects of his infatuated conduct. As such will certainly be the consequence of a sinful life, let not the following blessed words of Scripture pass unheeded by us: "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him turn unto the Lord and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God for he will abundantly pardon him." REFORMED GIPSIES IN ENGLAND.

No. 6 of the Christian's Penny Magazine contains some historical and statistical notices of this singular people. Every benevolent mind must feel a lively interest in this degraded class of wanderers, and anxious to promote their moral and religious improvement. The Home Missionary Society deserves the thanks of the nation for the attention its agents have been employed to call their minds to the consideration of the Bible, and to the saving doctrines of the gospel of Christ.

Our readers will feel pleasure in reading the following account of a Christmas meeting of reformed gipsies. "In Southampton, a small colony of reformed gipsies has been established five years, consisting of twenty individuals. The fourth anniversary was held at Springhill, on Friday, the 28th of December 1832, when one hundred and twenty-six wandering gipsies also attended. A great number of praying and benevolent friends assembled on the occasion. After Divine service had been performed, in which many of the gipsies appeared deeply interested, a pleasing account of the colony was given, and some interesting facts related respecting the moral improvement of these poor outcasts in Devonshire, Gloucestershire, Surrey, Scotland, and Germany. Their order at the dinner-table was pleasing, and their gratitude was strongly expressed, especially when every family was supplied with a blanket and with calico, and each person with a pair of stockings. On examination, it was ascertained that not above five of the number were able to read; but to each of these was given the word of life. A great number of the neighbouring gentry were present, and felt pleasure in waiting on these poor outcasts, and conversing with them. It was the general opinion, that if more attention were paid to them in imparting to them religious instruction, they would soon leave their present course of life. The reformed gipsies are respected by their friends and benefactors. Several of them have learned trades; and their improvement in reading and religious principle has rendered two of them fit to teach in a Sabbath school."

Friends of your country—friends of the Home Missionary Society, weigh with seriousness the closing observations of this interesting statement!

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disperses what she has gathered into her cells."—SENECA.

REV. OLIVER HEYWOOD, continued.

IN this state of confinement, Mr. Heywood sometimes ventured to admit a few friends into his house, in whom he could confide, and preached to them with such fervour and affection as his present circumstances tended to inspire. Now and then he supplied vacant churches at a distance, when he could obtain permission of the churchwardens so to do. But the spirit of persecution raged so hotly against him, that this worthy man was under the necessity of taking leave of his dear family, and going he knew not whither. But the question was, how he should be equipped for his journey? He had a horse, but the little money that remained must be left for the support of his family, for whom he was much more concerned than for himself.

One winter's morning, while it was yet dark, the horse was saddled, and this good man, after bidding adieu to his wife, and saluting his children in their beds, set out, like Abraham, when he left his father's house, not knowing whither he went. He moved silently along in bye-ways for some time, for fear of being seen, till he got out of the neighbourhood. Having not one farthing in his pocket, he committed himself to the protection of Providence. He determined at length to leave his horse at full liberty to go which way it would; and thus travelled on for a considerable part of the day, till both man and beast stood in great need of refreshment. Towards evening, the horse bent its course to a farm-house, a little out of the road. Mr. Heywood called at the door, and a clean, decent woman came out to inquire what he wanted. I have reason, said he, to make an apology for giving you this trouble, being an entire stranger in these parts. My horse stands in need, as well as myself, of shelter and refreshment for the night; if you could any way make it convenient to furnish my horse with a little hay, and a stand under cover, and myself with a seat by your fire-side, I ask no more. The good woman, a little surprised at his request, told him she would consult her husband. After a few minutes, they both came to the door, and Mr. Heywood repeated his request, but told them he had no money to satisfy them for any trouble they might have on his account; yet he hoped God would reward them. They immediately desired him to alight; the master led the horse into the stable, and the mistress took the stranger into the house, invited him to sit down, stirred up the fire, and began to prepare him something to eat. Mr. Heywood told her he was concerned to see her give herself so much trouble, that being unable to make her any recompense, he did not require either a supper or a bed, but only that he might sit by the fire-side till morning. The mistress assured him, that for an act of hospitality she did not expect any reward, and that though the accommodations her house would afford were but indifferent, he should be welcome to them; and therefore she hoped he would make himself easy.

After supper, they all sat down before the fire, and the master of the house desired to know of the stranger, what countryman he was. I was born, said he, in Lancashire; but I have a wife and family in the neighbourhood of Halifax. That is a town, said the farmer, where I have been; and some years ago, I had a little acquaintance with several persons there. Pray do you know Mr. S. and Mr. D.? And is old Mr. F. yet alive? The stranger gave suitable answers to these, and many other inquiries. At length the kind hostess asked him if he knew any thing of one Mr. Oliver Heywood, who was formerly minister at some chapel not far from Halifax, but was now for some account or other forbidden to preach. The stranger replied, There is a great deal of noise and talk about that man; some speak well; others say every thing that is bad of him: for my own part, I can say little in his favour. I believe, said the farmer, he is of that sect which is everywhere spoken against; but pray do you personally know him? And what is it that inclines you to form such an indifferent opinion of his character? I do know something of him, said the stranger; but as I do not choose to propagate an ill report of any one, if you please, we will talk on some other subject. After keeping the farmer and his wife in suspense for some time, who were a little uneasy at what he had said, he told them, that he was the poor outcast of whom they had made so many kind inquiries.

All then was surprise, and joy, and thankfulness, that a merciful Providence had brought him under their roof. The farmer said, Mr. Heywood, I am glad to see you here, having long had a sincere regard for you, from the favourable report I have always heard of you. The night is not far spent: I have a few neighbours who love the gospel; if you will give us a word of exhortation, I will run and acquaint them. This is an obscure place, and as your coming here is not known, I hope we shall have no interruption. Mr. Heywood consented; a small congregation was gathered; and he preached to them with that fervour, affection, and enlargement, which attending circumstances served to inspire. On this joyful occasion, a small collection was voluntarily made to help the poor traveller on his way.—Dr. Fawcett's Life of Oliver Heywood, p. 38.

The Danger of Impenitence after Afflictions.—To be impenitent after severe corrections, is to poison ourselves with that which is intended for our physic, and by a miraculous kind of obstinacy to turn rods into serpents.—Tillotson, vol. i, p. 235.

The Joys of Heaven.—The joys of heaven, are without example, above experience, and beyond imagination; for which the whole creation wants a comparison, we an apprehension, and even the word of God a revelation.—Norris's Serm., vol. ii, p. 191.

Popish Altar-piece.—I had a mind to see a picture, that, as I was told, is over one of the popish altars there [at Worms], which one would think was invented by one of the enemies of Transubstantiation to make it appear ridiculous. There is a windmill, and the Virgin throws Christ into the hopper, and he comes out at the eye of the mill all in wafers, which some priests take up to give to the people.—Bp. Burnet's Letters, p. 32.

Lord Chesterfield's Letters.—The substance of them is comprised in a few words. Adulation to those we despise; courtesy to those we hate; connections without friendship; professions without meaning; good-humour without benevolence; good manners without morals; appearances saved, and realities sacrificed.
Porteus's Serm., p. 377.

Compound and Simple Interest.—One penny put out at our Saviour's birth at five per cent. compound interest, would before this time have increased to a greater sum than would be contained in three hundred millions of globes of solid gold, each globe as large as the earth: but if put out at simple interest, it would have amounted to no more than seven shillings and sixpence.—Price's Observ., edit. 1803, p. 314.

Dr. Price made this calculation in 1791.

"It must be acknowledged, the Gospel of Christ is full of mysteries; and if it be a revelation of God, it must be so. Secret things belong to God; revealed things belong to us. It ought to excite no wonder in the weakest mind, that the ways of God are mysterious. If we look into creation, we may trace cause to effect, and effect to cause; yet we come to something at last that we cannot explain."

MISSIONARY REFORM;

Or, the Ability and Duty of Christendom to supply the World with Missionaries. By a Missionary. Second Edition, 12mo. pp. 40.

Missionary Institutions, as at present conducted, we are convinced, from many years' acquaintance with them, are the noblest of all systems of active benevolence. Much and sincerely as we regard them, we are not, however, satisfied that they are incapable of improvement. We believe that they may be newly modelled, and carried to a far higher degree of efficiency and extensiveness in their operations. We are decided Reformers, not merely political and ecclesiastical, but personal, ministerial, and social. Motives and rules for reform, in every respect, we find in the inspired institutes of our holy religion, which is essentially reforming, regenerating, and sanctifying, and destined to influence every tribe and family of mankind. "Does it never occur to the zealous friends of Missions, that the sum total of Protestant Missionaries supported by all the Missionary Societies in existence, does not perhaps exceed six hundred: and that these have no less a task to perform than the conversion of six hundred millions; that is, each Missionary has one million for his part of the labour?"

Most earnestly do we recommend this wise and faithful pamphlet, on one of the most interesting subjects, to every Christian philanthropist, especially to the officers and members of the several Missionary Societies.

OBSERVATIONS FOUNDED ON SELECT PASSAGES OF SCRIPTURE;

With Original Hymns adapted to the Subjects, intended as an Occasional Help to Domestic Devotion. By Thomas Bradshaw, Minister of Paragon Chapel, Bermondsey. 12mo. cloth, 3s. London, pp. 214.

These "Observations" of Mr. Bradshaw are properly short sermons on some of the most important subjects of the word of God. Their style is plain, their doctrine is sound, and their adaptation to the end designed is judicious. On these grounds the volume before us is entitled to our recommendation: but when we reflect upon the gratuitous ministerial labours of the author, in a populous neighbourhood lamentably destitute of the means of evangelical instruction, and that "the object of this publication is to assist in liquidating a debt on the Sabbath school connected with the author's place of worship, and that the profits arising from its sale will be applied to this purpose,"—we feel additional reasons for recommending this useful volume.

The first volume of the Christian's Penny Magazine, from June to December 1832, is now complete, and may be had, neatly bound in canvass, price 3s. 6d. through any Bookseller or Newsman; and also any of the preceding Parts or Numbers. A specimen of the Embellishments in the First Volume is printed on a large Sheet, price 2*d*., which will be found to contain some beautiful articles for Books of Prints.

The demand for the Sheet of Engravings having been much greater than was anticipated, it has been found necessary to reprint it. Subscribers and others can now be supplied through the usual channels.

SAXON DIVINITIES, FORMERLY WORSHIPPED IN BRITAIN.

ritish Ecclesiastical History," requires some ice of the religion of the Saxons, by whom Britain s conquered in the fifth century. Our young readers mot but feel an interest in this subject of their ional annals, which will not fail to be the means exciting their gratitude for the blessings of the Holy iptures.

. The Idol of the Sun, from which Sunday is ived, dies solis, was placed in a temple by the Saxons. rifices were offered to it, as they believed that the co-operated with this image. He was repre- ted like a half-naked man, with his face resembling sun, holding on his breast with both hands a rning wheel, signifying his course round the world; fiery gleams denoting the light and heat with which warms and nourishes all things.

. The Idol of the Moon, from which comes our nday, dies lunæ, anciently Moon-day. This idol ap- rs singularly strange, being habited in a short coat e a man. Her holding a moon is a sufficient distinc- n; but the reason of her wearing a short coat, and ong-eared cap, is lost in oblivion.

. Tuisco, the most ancient and peculiar deity of Germans, is reckoned to have been the grandson of Japhet, the son of Noah, and to have peopled the north of Europe. He is represented in his garment of skin, according to the ancient manner of clothing by that people. Next to the sun and moon, the Saxons paid their adoration especially to this idol, and dedicated the next day to him, from which Tuesday is derived, anciently Tuis-day. The Romans called this day dies Martis. But this idol is very unlike Mars.

4. Woden, or Odin, was the supreme divinity of the Saxons who settled in Britain, and his marvellous exploits formed the greatest part of their mythological creed. He is supposed to have migrated from the east; but from what country is not known. He is represented as the god of battles, and as having slaughtered thousands at a blow. His image was prayed to, for victory over their enemies; which, if they obtained, they usually sacrificed to him the prisoners taken in battle. His palace in the invisible world is called Valhal, situated in the city Midcard, where, according to fable, the souls of heroes, who had bravely fallen in battle, enjoy supreme felicity, feasting on the choicest dainties, and drinking mead out of the skulls of those whom they had slain in the days of their flesh. Our Wednesday is derived from him; anciently called Woden's-day. The northern historians make him the father of Thor.

5. Thor is reckoned the eldest and the bravest of the sons of Woden, and his wife Freu, or Friga. He was represented as sitting in a large hall, on a bed canopied over, with a crown of gold on his head, and twelve stars over it, holding a sceptre in his right hand. The Saxons and Danes believed that Thor reigned over all the aerial regions, which composed an immense palace, consisting of 540 halls; and that, as he pleased, he launched the thunder, pointed the lightnings, and directed the meteors, winds, and storms; that he sent plagues or health, fair and seasonable weather, causing fertility. To him the fifth day of the week, Thursday, was consecrated, anciently called Thors-deag. Among the Romans this day was called dies Jovis, as this idol may be thought substituted for Jupiter the thunderer.

6. Friga, or Frea, the Venus of the Saxons, represented both sexes, holding a drawn sword in the right hand, and a bow in the left; denoting, that women as well as men should fight in time of need. She was generally taken for a goddess, and was reputed the giver of peace and plenty, the author of love and friendship. Her day of worship was called by the Saxons Fri-deag, now Friday: by the Romans dies Veneris: but the habit and weapon of this figure resemble Diana rather than Venus.

7. Seater, or Crodo, is represented as standing on the prickly back of a fish, having a visage and his hair long, with a long beard, bare-headed and bare-footed, carrying a pail of water in his right hand, in which are fruits and flowers, and holding up a wheel in his left; his coat being tied with a long girdle. His standing on a fish was designed to signify to the Saxons, that by worshipping him, they should pass through all dangers unhurt; by his girdle flying both ways was shown the Saxons' freedom; and by the pail with fruit and flowers was denoted his care to nourish the earth. From him, or from the Roman divinity Saturn, we have Saturday.

Some learned men have remarked a striking resemblance between these Saxon deities and the seven principal gods of the Romans, from whom their days were also named—Apollo, Diana, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, and Saturn.

Dr. Southey, in his "Book of the Church," has some valuable remarks on the religion of the Saxons, and the influence of their conquest in Britain, and upon the state of Christianity as it was professed by many of the Britons. He says, "The Saxons, Angles, and other kindred tribes, to whom we are indebted for the basis and character of our fine language, and of our invaluable civil institutions, were at the time of their establishment here a ferocious people, but not without noble qualities; apt for instruction, and willing to be instructed. The heathenism which they introduced bears no affinity, either to that of the Britons, or of the Romans. It is less known than either; because while it subsisted as a living form of belief, the few writers who arose in those illiterate ages were incurious concerning such things: but it has left familiar traces in our daily speech, and in many of those popular customs which in various parts of the country still partially maintain their ground. They had idols wrought in wood, stone, and metals of different kinds, even in gold: this fact implies considerable proficiency in art, beyond that to which the ancient Britons had attained. One of these idols was designed as standing upon a fish, others as having many heads; a gross but intelligible mode of representing to the senses of a rude people, that the gods whom they worshipped, beheld the actions which were done on all sides. The latter images may be thought to imply by their fashion a Tartaric origin; the former may not improbably be referred through the same channel to India, and perhaps to the corrupted tradition of the Deluge, which seems to have been preserved wherever ancient traditions are found. They had temples, a ritual worship, and a regular priesthood. The rites were bloody. The Saxons on the continent are known to have decimated their prisoners for sacrifice. But there is some reason to infer, that the priests, when they accompanied the conquerors hither, had attained to that stage of intellectual advancement, wherein it became their wish so to direct their influence as to mitigate, rather than increase the evils to which their fellow-creatures were liable in an age of violence and incessant war. From the Saxons it is that we derive the holy name of God; its literal meaning was, the good; and we must acknowledge the propriety of that reverential feeling which induced them thus to express goodness and divinity by the same word. The enclosures of their temples were held to be profaned if a lance were thrown into them: and the priests were not permitted to bear arms; nor to ride like warriors on horseback,—only upon mares. When the image of their goddess Hertha, or mother earth, was borne abroad in a covered carriage, so long as it continued without the consecrated precincts, all hostilities were suspended, and nothing was thought of but festivity and joy. At the expiration of this festival, which otherwise might seem to have been instituted in favour of humanity, the vehicle, the garment which covered it, and the idol itself, were washed by slaves in a lake which none but the servants of the goddess were allowed to approach, and after this ceremony, the slaves were sacrificed by drowning. They worshipped the Sun and Moon, the Thunderer, and Odin, the favourite god of those who settled in this island, because he was a deified warrior, from whom the kings of the Heptarchy traced their descent. Of the other objects of their mistaken worship, little more than a few names can now be ascertained. That of the goddess Eostre, or Eastre, which may probably be traced to the Astarte of the Phœnicians, is retained among us in the word Easter, her annual festival having been superseded by that sacred day.

"The change produced in Briton by the Saxon conquest was greater than that which took place in any other part of the western empire, when it was broken up, and divided among the Gothic conquerors. Everywhere else they soon conformed to the religion, and intermingled with the inhabitants of the conquered provinces, so that a mixed speech presently grew up, retaining more traces of Roman, than of its Barbaric origin. But the Roman tongue, and the Roman religion, the unfashionable and unpatronized rites of its perishing Paganism, as well as the flourishing forms of its corrupted Christianity, were at once swept away from that largest and finest portion of Britain in which the conquerors fixed themselves; and the Saxons established their heathen superstition and their language, without any compromise or commixture. The Britons themselves were divided into an unknown number of petty kingdoms, and their princes were animated with as much hostility against each other as against the invaders. But they were too high-minded to brook that forced and ignominious incorporation to which the Gauls, and Spaniards, and Italians, had submitted; and gradually retiring to the western peninsula, to the land of Lakes, and to the Highlands of Scotland, their language ceased to be spoken in that great division of the island which now obtained the name of England, from its Anglian conquerors. The priests and monks withdrew with them, as well as the less placable votaries of the old Druidical faith; and Christianity, as a public establishment, disappeared from the kingdoms of the Heptarchy for about a hundred and fifty years."

BRITISH ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

No. V. Christianity in Britain, from the Conversion of Constantine, A. D. 313, to the arrival of the Saxons, A. D. 449.

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT publicly professing Christianity A. D. 313, multitudes were induced to follow the imperial example. The ministers of the gospel became more zealously active in prosecuting their labours, and numbers, especially among the Britons, it is said were led to embrace the faith of Christ. Even before he left Britain he gave proof of his kindness to the Christians, and showed them more favour than his father had done, though he was tolerant. Encouraged by these favourable dispositions of the new emperor, the British chieftains came out of their lurking-places, rebuilt their sacred edifices which had been demolished, and observed their holy solemnities with joyful hearts.

Imperial favour shone upon the ministers of Christ, and wealth and honours were largely heaped upon them. Christianity being now the principal path to preferment, persons of rank sought its dignities and emoluments, and a hierarchy was framed corresponding with the civil government, and consisting of many orders of ministers unknown to the former ages of the church, perverting the divine institutions of the New Testament.

Dr. Henry, in his "History of Great Britain," observes, "After the conversion of Constantine, he and his successors interested themselves greatly in the administration of ecclesiastical affairs, and acted as the supreme heads on earth of the church, as well as of the state. By their authority the hierarchy was brought to an almost perfect conformity with the civil government of the Roman empire. In order to this, several new ecclesiastical dignitaries, as patriarchs, metropolitans, and archbishops, were established in the church, to correspond ro the præfecti, prætorii, vicarii, and præsides provinciarum in the state. According to this model, there should have been one metropolitan, and first three, then four, and at last five archbishops in Britain. But it seems probable that this model of church government was never fully established in Britain, on account of the unsettled state of the country, and the poverty of the British churches, which could not well support so many prelates of so high a rank agreeably to their dignity."

Dr. Henry remarks, "While the churches of Christ were obnoxious to the civil power, and every moment in danger of persecution, they performed the rites of their religious worship with much privacy and little pomp. This was most agreeable to the pure and spiritual nature of the Christian worship, and most conducive to real piety. But after they came to enjoy security, wealth, and royal favour, they began to embellish their worship with many new-invented ceremonies, and even adopted some of the Pagan rites and practices with little alteration. Great numbers of magnificent churches were built, and adorned with the pictures of saints and martyrs, in imitation of the Heathen temples; the Christian clergy officiated in a variety of habits, not much unlike those of the Pagan priests; fasts, festivals, and holidays, were multiplied; and, in one word, an ostentatious and mechanical worship, hardly to be distinguished in its outward appearance from that of their heathen neighbours, was introduced in the place of pure and rational devotion. The Christian clergy were betrayed into this criminal and fatal imitation of their Pagan predecessors, partly by their vanity and love of pomp, and partly by their hopes of thereby facilitating the conversion of the heathens. There was, indeed, an almost infinite variety in the forms of religious worship in the Christian church at this time, and almost every particular church had something peculiar in its way of worship. The British churches differed considerably from those of Gaul, and still more from those of Italy, in their public service, and had not as yet departed so far from the genuine simplicity of the Gospel. The British Christians, however, of this age did not want their share of superstition, of which it will be sufficient to give one example. About this time it began to be imagined that there was much sanctity in some particular places, and much merit in visiting them. The places which were esteemed most sacred, and were most visited, were those about Jerusalem, which had been the scenes of our Saviour's actions and sufferings. To these holy places prodigious numbers of pilgrims crowded from all parts of the Christian world, and particularly from Britain. 'Though the Britons,' says Jerome, 'are separated from our world by the intervening ocean, yet such of them as have made any great progress in religion, leaving the distant regions of the West, visit those sacred places at Jerusalem, which are known to them only by fame, and the relations of Holy Scripture.' Nay, some of these deluded and superstitious vagabonds, who had more strength or more zeal than others, went as far as Syria to see the famous self-tormentor, Simeon Stylites, who lived fifty-six years on the top of a high pillar. 'Many people came to see him,' says Theodoret, his historian, 'from the most remote corners of the West, particularly from Spain, Gaul, and Britain.'"

Corruption in every form, both in doctrine and worship, sprung up among the Christians, from the time of Constantine especially. Some affirm that the British churches were infected with Arianism, which now arose; and that some bishops from Britain were present at the council at Nice, A. D. 325, in which that system was considered and condemned.

Pelagianism certainly prevailed among the British Christians. Its author was Pelagius, or Morgan, a native of Wales. It is not necessary to enumerate all the opinions of Pelagius; but the most important and plausible we here state, which were these:—"That Adam was mortal by his creation, and would have died though he had not sinned: that Adam's sin affected only himself, but not his posterity; and that children at their birth are as pure and innocent as Adam was at his creation: that the grace of God is not necessary to enable men to perform their duty, to overcome temptation, or even to attain perfection; but they may do all this by the freedom of their own wills, and the exertion of their natural powers." These notions, so soothing to the pride of man, were disseminated in Britain by Agricola, whose father, Severianus, was a bishop; while Pelagius himself, and his coadjutors, Celestus a Scotsman, and Julianus a Campanian, were employed in the same work at Rome, about A. D. 430.

The orthodox bishops perceiving the increase of these opinions, sent to their brethren in Gaul to assist them in rooting out the pernicious infection. Touched with sympathy for their brethren, the Gaulish bishops assembled in council appointed Germanus bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus bishop of Troyes, to proceed to Britain. Extravagant accounts are given of the miracles which they are said to have wrought. "Germanus had, it seems," as Dr. Henry remarks, "brought with him a very large and valuable cargo of relics of all the apostles, and of many martyrs, which he deposited in the tomb of St. Alban!"

These zealous bishops are said to have preached sometimes in the churches, and sometimes in the highways and fields; and so filled the whole island with the fame of their virtues, learning, and eloquence. At Verulam they held a conference with the Pelagians, and confuted their opinions; but after their departure, the condemned sentiments revived. Aged Germanus undertook a second voyage into Britain, accompanied by Severus bishop of Troyes: but despairing to convince the Pelagians by argument, he caused them to be condemned as obstinate heretics, and to be banished by the edict of Valentinian III.

Germanus, before he left Britain, is said to have founded several schools, which afterwards produced many bishops famous for their piety and learning. But the country being ravaged by the Caledonians, called Scots and Picts, and the Saxons, the natives entreated the assistance of Germanus and his colleagues: many of them, being instructed, desired baptism, and a great part of the army received that ordinance at Easter, in a church which they made of boughs of trees twisted together. The festival being over, they marched against the enemy with Germanus at their head; and he, having been a captain in early life, posted his men in a valley through which the enemy were to pass, surprized and defeated them; after which they returned to the continent.

From this period to the arrival of the Saxons, we have no account of religion in Britain; but the Scots and Picts, ravaging the northern parts of the country, out of enmity to the Britons and their new religion, destroyed many of the churches. By this means much corruption of manners arose among the clergy, who had declined from the purity of their faith. Gildas and Bede however state, that the peace with these marauders, and the consequent plenty, occasioned much depravity among the people, and that gluttony, drunkenness, avarice, and luxury, reigned among the ecclesiastics, so that they no longer preached the gospel to their flocks, nor regarded the claims of their professed religion.

Britain thus became an easy prey to the Saxons, the character of whose idolatry we have shown in the preceding article.

THE BIRMINGHAM APPRENTICE.

TRANSACTIONS of trade in Birmingham, brought William into contact with some of the disciples of the late Dr. Priestley. Though, after the "disgraceful riots," he had removed to America, where he died, many who had attended his ministry in Birmingham, cherished a high degree of respect for his memory, as a man of vast learning, as a great philosopher, and as a diligent instructor of the youth in his congregation. The splendid medal of their friend, engraved by Mr. Halliday, one of his pupils, is a worthy memorial of their veneration. Some of these were diligent in training their young people in the anti-scriptural principles of that great philosopher. With several of these Unitarians, who soon noticed the serious disposition of William, he was occasionally drawn into conversation on religious subjects. They were persons of considerable intelligence, and of courteous, gentlemanly manners; but decidedly hostile to those articles of faith which William had embraced as the doctrines of his salvation. They made repeated attacks upon his principles, apparently for the sake of triumph; their objections were new, and threw a temporary gloom over his spirit. Being unaccustomed to that kind of controversy, he felt incapable of answering their objections to their conviction, or to his own satisfaction. On one occasion he was affected even to tears, on reflecting upon their insinuations and declarations against those doctrines which he believed to be the very truths of God.

Although at first William was unable to defend himself in ready argument against his Socinian friends, he perceived that their sentiments rendered it impossible for them, in their conversations upon religion, to adopt the common expressions and uniform language of the New Testament writers. The wonderful love of Christ in coming into our world, giving himself for sinners,—eternal redemption by his atoning blood,—regeneration by the Holy Spirit,—and free salvation by his grace,—were sentiments which they derided, and the terms used by apostles when speaking on these things, they could by no means employ. Besides, he reflected, that the principles which supported the martyrs in their controversies with the papists, and in their painful sufferings and triumphant deaths, were the very opposite to the doctrines of these Unitarians; and on these grounds he concluded they must be errors.

But the awakened and inquisitive mind of William was not satisfied with this general conclusion. He wished to understand the subject better. He implored the direction and blessing of God upon his inquiries relating to the controversy, which he determined, as he might be able, on examining thoroughly for himself. He consulted a worthy Christian friend, with whom he became acquainted very seasonably at that period, by whom he was introduced to the THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY, which was being commenced. United with the founders of that most valuable institution in Birmingham, he became interested in its treasures, and read Dr. Pye Smith's "Discourse on the Sacrifice of Christ;" "Dr. Outram on Sacrifices," translated by Allen; Dr. Magee on the "Atonement and Sacrifice of Christ;" Mr. A. Fuller's "Calvinistic and Socinian Systems Compared;" Dr. Wardlaw's "Discourses on the Socinian Controversy;" Dr. Pye Smith's "Scripture Testimony to the Messiah;" Dr Nares's "Review of the Socinian Version of the New Testament;" and Mac Gowan's "Twenty Letters to Dr. Priestley," besides several other works of the same class, with the liveliest interest, from which he derived the most substantial edification, and the most delightful satisfaction. In these inestimable volumes, he found, not only the momentous sentiments of the word of God, but the glorious truths, which, as themselves declared in their writings, sustained and consoled the martyrs in prison and at the stake; and feeling their adaptation to the necessities of his own mind, as a transgressor, guilty before God, he was persuaded they were the "principles of the doctrines of Christ," the pure essentials of the gospel, the doctrines of salvation.

Besides these works on those great subjects of controversial divinity, William read many volumes of the standard writings of Owen, Hervey, Leighton, Bunyan, Witherspoon, Newton, Cecil, and others of that class, with "Middleton's Evangelical Biography," by which his mind became established in the great doctrines of Protestant Theology.

Ecclesiastical History was a branch of knowledge with which William desired to become familiar. He read "Fox's Book of Martyrs," which at once produced astonishment in his mind, at the power of divine grace in their triumphs, and a determination to search the records of the church through successive ages. This subject also he found involved, and strongly recommended, in most of the works on the Evidences of Christianity which he had read; indeed, works of that class constitute, as he found, a very considerable portion of those evidences. This study, therefore, appeared to him of the greatest possible importance to Christians, especially as giving an exhibition of true religion in the holy lives and triumphant deaths of its most distinguished ornaments, from the apostles downwards, and as pointing out the origin and progress of the various errors and corruptions, which have disgraced the Christian name.

The Theological Library in Birmingham contained several valuable works in that department, and William read them with his accustomed avidity and interest. Among the works of this class, he read Milner's Church History; in which he was delighted to see an edifying exhibition of the power of the gospel, through successive ages, from the ascension of Christ to the Reformation in Germany. Dr. Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History he found equally valuable with Milner's, but written upon a different plan. He had met with a remark of Dr. Johnson, in which he pronounced it, in his day, the only work of the kind that deserved that title. Though it speaks far less of the peculiarities of spiritual religion, it seemed a necessary companion to Milner's; as he exhibits more fully the rise and progress of the innumerable abominations, which have been practised by an ambitious and worldly priesthood, under the abused name of Christianity. Mosheim brings down the history of the church to the early part of the eighteenth century. "Dr. Haweis's Impartial Church History," he found more brief than either of the others; but it appeared in most respects worthy of its title, and it carries down the history to the opening of the nineteenth century, and the establishment of the London Missionary Society, to whose directors it is dedicated. "Jones's History of the Waldenses," opened a new field of contemplation in the existence, piety, and sufferings of that people, connected with a brief view of Ecclesiastical History from the time of the apostles. "Neal's History of the Puritans," presented to his mind an affecting portraiture of Christian integrity on the one hand, in the sufferings of that people from the time of the Reformation; and on the other of prelatical intolerance and cruelty, until the Revolution, when the Act of Toleration rendered the forms of worship among the Dissenters lawful. He also read "Bogue and Bennett's History of Dissenters," which he found might be considered as a kind of continuation of "Neal's History," to the beginning of the nineteenth century, a work apparently indispensable to show the advancement of the cause of Christianity in England. Besides these, William read the Church Histories of Brown, Gregory, Sabine, and some others; from all which, he was still more firmly established in the belief of the doctrines of the gospel which he had embraced, in love with religious liberty, which he perceived to be a peculiar and distinguishing characteristic of the Christian dispensation, while he was led to cherish a cordial esteem for good men of every denomination of professing Christians, who lóve our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

In addition to the histories already mentioned, William read "Hume's History of England;" "Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire;" "Dr. Robertson's History of Charles V, of Scotland; of America; and of India;" and a considerable part of "Dr. Mavor's Universal History," with many others, for the purpose of the cultivation of his mind; and though he felt considerable interest in works of a generally improving character, he cherished the most lively interest in those which related to the things of Jesus Christ and his universal kingdom, which the prophets of God declare shall include all the nations upon earth.

"The dread and dislike of death do by no means prove that a person is not a child of God. Even a strong believer may be afraid to die. We are not in general fond of handling a serpent, even though its sting is drawn, and we know it to be so."—Mr. Martin.

Letters to a Mother, upon Education.

LETTER XVIII.

On exciting Fear.

Dear Madam,

FEAR, you are aware, means the dread of evil. It must be distinguished from the mere apprehension of evil, by the disquieting aversion from the event or object apprehended, and which, instead of prompting exertion to avoid it, induces a listless horror, which occupies the soul, and wears out its energies. There are degrees in this passion proportioned to the qualities of the object by which it is excited. But the passion in any degree is generally useless, and frequently injurious. The susceptibility of fear may exist in different degrees in different constitutions; but, as it appears to me, always requires in the first instance an exciting cause to awaken it into action. It is also evident that these exciting causes may be of such a nature, or so numerous, as to augment this susceptibility, till at length timidity shall be excited upon the prospect of almost every contingency, and often in the prospect of none whatever; a habit of mental watchfulness and foreboding may be established, which may paralyse the capacity, induce a dread of action, and contribute to cast a gloom over much of such a person's existence. This habit of mind becomes more forcible with the advancing infirmities of age, or with the augmenting cares of human life; and at length, and often at a premature period, the feverish existence terminates by death. Such persons resemble the hare couching in its form, sleeping with its eyes open, and listening with retracted ears to the approach of every pursuer. But the person I am describing is even less happy than this creature, which, in the absence of hostile sounds, is perhaps incapable of imagining danger, and during the night steals forth, and in its sports by moonlight enjoys an hilarity which makes up for the suspicion to which it is doomed by day.

Fear, as defined above, may be directed to any and every object, real and imaginary. But towards any and every object it is improper. It originates in the existence of improper associations or circumstances. I hope in a future Letter to show, that through the influence of Revelation, the Supreme Being himself ought not to be the object of fear, as above defined.

In the mean while it may be observed, that the passion of fear and a fearful state of mind are often exhibited towards mankind, such as robbers, thieves, murderers, child-stealers; towards animals, insects; towards water, darkness, woods; and above all these, perhaps, towards the inhabitants of the invisible worlds.

It appears to me, that a parent should most carefully beware of ever making his child afraid, or of imagining he could be so, by any real or supposed circumstances.

It is an unhappy practice to read accounts of thefts and murders and robberies by footpads in the hearing of a young child. Alas! how few parents are there who know how to select what ought to be read, even from a newspaper, before their families. Let him steal a glance from the newspaper to his young child, and see those earnest prominent eyes, that flushed cheek, which all betoken an alarmed imagination. Let him know, that the mind of his child will people every field and lane and meadow with thieves and kidnappers, and then farewell for ever to the bliss and the improvement to be derived from scenes of nature, and to which quietude of heart is indispensable. I have known a child, by hearing such stories, rendered perfectly miserable. He could not walk a mile from home without a beating heart, or see a strange traveller on the road without dread. Nor should your child be taught to dread the superior strength of a playmate who has become a foe. You will have early taught him, that "the righteous Lord loveth righteousness," and that when he has done moral wrong, then only should he be afraid: that then he should acknowledge it, and make restitution as soon as possible, and then dismiss fear. Above all things, guard against making him fear to do and assert what is right, because he is liable to suffer from the superior power of others. Teach him rather to suffer than to give up his own principles. Teach him the dignity of suffering in such a cause.

The dread of animals and insects originates in the silly habit of nurses, who in order to keep a child quiet, tell him of a mouse, or of a rat, or of a bear, or of some terrible creature, who will come and eat him, or take him away. All this told an infant, with tones of aversion and horror, by the nurse, causes that disgust at certain animals and insects, which some persons cannot overcome in after-life. Never let your child be taught to call any creature, even a toad, ugly and disgusting. Teach him that the same Creator formed him and them: that they have all their use: that in each other's view they are not offensive. It is to the use of such epithets in early life, that the habit of cruelty to such helpless creatures, or indifference to their sufferings, may be traced in manhood.

I was once walking with a father and his children. The father belonged to a learned profession. One of the boys called out that there was a toad by the side of our path. The father turned out of our way, and seizing a large flint stone, dashed the wretched creature into a writhing mass of suffering. In vain I expostulated: one stone after another was heaped upon it; and when it was supposed that all was over, the rolling down of some of the stones attested that the throes of agony were not extinct. What was the fault of this miserable creature? What mighty fault had this being done, which was formed by the hand of Him who made the seraph? It was a toad! The blind and inconsiderate man who had destroyed it had early learned to hate a toad.

It is important to disabuse the mind of a child of all mal-associations with any creature, or to prevent their existence. Teach him the real character of obnoxious creatures. Tell him that a toad is perfectly harmless: that a bee or a wasp will not sting unless provoked; or that if they sting when undesignedly injured, it is owing to their want of sufficient intelligence to discriminate. Teach him (and show him a plate of the ear), that the earwig cannot get into the head by the ear. Tell him that the earwig is a very amiable insect, which broods over its young ones after the manner of a hen over her young: that it is remarkable for its attachment to its progeny. Teach him to regard even the meanest creature as a complication of wonders, as the result of infinite wisdom, as the object of almighty care and goodness. Tell him that even venomous snakes and serpents do not voluntarily attack man: that their poison is intended to dispatch the mice and rabbits upon whom they feed, sooner than could be done by the crush of the teeth, and therefore is a provision of benevolence: that a snake stings a man or a child only in the same circumstances and from the same causes as does the wasp. Teach him too, that the poison of every species would not generally be fatal of itself upon man; and that in all countries where they abound, the God of nature has caused the antidotes to grow abundantly which are to be applied, when any of these snakes accidentally sting a human being. In a word, never let a prejudice or a fear of any creature, and especially of the lower orders of beings, exist in his mind. He will otherwise regard such ranks of being as his enemies, and will extend to all the aversion and the disgust with which he has erroneously been permitted to regard a few. But I see that my paper is filled up. I have yet many more observations to make upon the other objects of fear alluded to in a former part of this Letter, and with which I hope to present you in my next.

I am, dear Madam, yours, &c.
Clericus.

SCRIPTURE GAZETTEER.

Intelligently to read the Holy Scriptures, it is necessary to possess a tolerable idea of the Geography of the countries to which the sacred writers refer. A Scripture Gazetteer, therefore, must be of much value to our younger readers, for whose instruction we have made preparation; and we shall occasionally devote a page to this interesting purpose.

Abarim, (passages, or passengers), mountains of; the northern boundary of the land of Moab. They are an exceedingly high ridge of desolate mountains, no otherwise diversified than by a succession of naked rocks and precipices, rendered in several places more frightful by a multiplicity of torrents which fall on each side of them. This ridge is continued all along the eastern borders of the Dead Sea, as far as our eye can carry, affording all the way a most lonesome, melancholy prospect, not a little assisted by the intermediate view of a large stagnating, unactive expanse of water, rarely, if ever, enlivened by any flocks of water fowl that settle upon it, or by so much as one vessel of passage or commerce that is known to frequent it. Nebo and Pisgah were some particular parts of these mountains, whence Moses beheld the land of Canaan, before he was gathered to his people. Num. xxvii, 12, 13.

Abel-Shittim (mourning of the thorns), or Shittim, a city situate in the plains of Moab beyond Jordan, opposite to Jericho. Eusebius says, it stood in the neighbourhood of Mount Peor. Moses encamped at this city some time before the Hebrew army passed the river Jordan. Here the Israelites fell into idolatry, and worshipped Baal-Peor, for which God punished them so severely by the hands of the Levites.

Abilene (the father of mourning), the country of; the eastern boundary of Galilee. It was so named from its chief city Abila, and is thought by some to have lain with the borders of Naphthalim, though it was never subdued by that tribe. Mr. Maundrel tells us, that the next day after he left Damascus, in his return towards Tripoli, they came to a small village called Sinic, just by which is an ancient structure on the top of a high hill, supposed to be the tomb of Abel, and to have given the adjacent country in old times the name of Abilene. The tomb is thirty yards long, and yet is here believed to have been but just proportioned to the stature of him who was buried in it.

Accad, or Archad (a vessel, a pitcher), according to the LXX, a city built by Nimrod, the situation whereof is not very well known; but some footsteps of its name Archad, are, according to Dr. Wells, thought to be preserved in the river Argades, mentioned by Ctesias, as a river near Sittace, lying at some distance from the river Tigris, and giving name formerly to Sittace, &c., a country lying between Babylon and Susa; and because it was very usual, particularly in these parts, to have rivers take their names from some considerable city they run by; hence it is not improbably conjectured, that the city Sittace was formerly called Argad, or Archad, and took the name Sittace, and Psittace, from the plenty of pistachias, a sort of nut, which grow there.

Accho (inclosed, or pressed together), afterwards called Ptolemais, lay north of Mount Carmel, with a harbour to the sea. It fell to the tribe of Asher upon the division. The Israelites would not extirpate the inhabitants of Accho, and it continued in the hands of the Canaanites.

Achaia (grief, or trouble), a province of Greece. The Romans distinguished all the countries which went under the general name of Greece into two provinces, viz. Macedonia and Achaia; under the former of which they comprehended Epirus and Thessaly; under the latter, Greece properly so called, and the Peloponnesus. The word is taken in the Old Testament in the largest sense, so as to include Macedonia; but in the New, it is plainly taken exclusively of Macedonia, and as equivalent to Achaia in the Roman acceptation of it; i. e. so as to include not only Greece, properly so called, but also the Peloponnesus, wherein lay Achaia Propria, whereof Corinth was the capital. In this city St. Paul preached, (Acts xviii, 12), and St. Andrew suffered martydom.

Adramyttium (the court or mansion of death), a sea-port town in Mysia, in the Lesser Asia, lying over against the Isle of Lesbos, and not far from Troas. St. Paul, in his first voyage into Italy, embarked in a vessel which was going to that port. Acts xxvii, 5.

Adria (Acts xxvii, 27); the Adriatic Sea, whereby was denoted all the sea lying between Crete and Sicily, together with the lower parts of Italy. It received its name from Adria, a city upon the Tartaro, in the state of Venice.

"The Bee that wanders, and sips from every flower, disposes what she has gathered into her cells."—Seneca.

ARCHBISHOP TILLOTSON.

Mr. Robert Tillotson went up to London on a visit to his son, when he was Dean of Canterbury, and being in the dress of a plain countryman, was insulted by one of the Dean's servants, for inquiring if John Tillotson was at home. His person, however, being described to the dean, he immediately exclaimed, "It is my worthy father," and running to the door to receive him, he fell down upon his knees in the presence of his servants, to ask his father's blessing.

Dr. Fawcett's Life of Oliver Heywood, p. 139.

The celebrated Mr. John Howe was particularly intimate with Dr. Tillotson (afterwards Abp) in respect to whom the following anecdote is worthy of notice. The Dean, as he was then (1680), preached a sermon at Court, on Josh. xxiv, 15; in which he asserted, that "no man is obliged to preach against the religion of a country, though a false one, unless he has the power of working miracles." King Charles slept most of the time. When the sermon was over, a certain nobleman said to him, "It is a pity your Majesty slept, for we have had the rarest piece of Hobbism that you ever heard in your life." "Have you?" said the king, "he shall print it then;" and immediately called the Lord Chamberlain to give his command to the Dean for this purpose. When the sermon came from the press, the Dean, as was usual with him, sent it as a present to Mr. Howe; who, on the perusal, was grieved to find a sentiment which had so ill a tendency, and drew up a long letter, in which he freely expostulated with the Dean for giving such a wound to the Reformation; and carried the letter himself. The Dean, upon the sight of it, proposed a little journey into the country, that they might talk the matter over without interruption. Mr. Howe enlarged upon the contents of the letter as they travelled in the chariot. The good Dean at length wept, and said, it was the most unhappy thing that had befallen him for a long time; owned that what he had asserted was not to be maintained, and urged in his excuse, that he had but little notice of preaching that day, and none of printing the sermon.

Chalmers's Biog. Art. Till., and Palmer's Noncon. Mem., 2d. edit. vol. ii, p. 85.

The certainty of Death, a poor remedy against the fear of it.—Some consider death no otherwise than as it is common to all men, and they think it reasonable enough to submit to what they cannot avoid. 'Tis true this is a reflection that may contribute something to lay the disturbances of the mind when death approaches; but this alone is a very poor argument against the fear of death; they ought to think it as true, that all men must be judged, as that all men must die.—Lucas's Serm., p. 198.

RULES FOR RELIGIOUS DISCOURSE.

1st. Never to talk of religion but when you think of it. There are a sort of people in the world that have such a lazy, unthoughtful, listless, yawning way of talking of religion, that one would almost think they talked in their sleep. They have a road of pious expressions, and are got into a certain set of good words, such as "Lord Jesus Christ"—"What pleases God"—"The Lord's will be done"—"Please God I live"—"We are all mortal," &c., which upon all occasions they go over by rote, just as a seaman doth his compass, or rather as a bellman doth his godly rhimes, without thinking what they say, or being at all affected with it. Methinks when I hear such people talk of religion, I fancy the chimes going to the tune of a psalm. The truth is, there is but too much resemblance between them; they both go as they are set, and one almost as mechanically as the other; only there is this unhappy difference in the case, that the bells oft-times call people to their devotions, whereas these sleepy, dreaming talkers of religion, do but make them sick of it.

2dly. To talk of it seriously, gravely, and soberly.

3dly. Practically.

4thly. Seasonably. There is prudence and management in all things; and if we make choice of a convenient time to give physic to a man's body, much more should we when we administer it to his soul. That is a convenient time, when it is likely men will be the better for what is said to them. For there are times when men are not likely to be the better but rather the worse, and to talk religion to them then, is both to spill your physic, and injure your patient.

5thly. To join along with it the great advantage of a good life, which will give weight to our words.

Norris's Serm., vol. iv, p. 38.

In prosperity, prepare for a change; in adversity, hope for one.—Burgh's Dignit. Hum. Nat., p. 82.

The devil tempts the active and vigorous into his service, knowing what fit and proper instruments they are to do his drudgery: but the slothful and idle, nobody having hired them or set them to work, lie in his way, and he stumbles upon them as he goes about, and they do, as it were, offer themselves to his service; and having nothing to do, they even tempt the devil himself to tempt them, and to take them in his way.

INSCRIPTION UNDER THE PICTURE OF AN AGED NEGRO WOMAN.

Art thou a woman? So am I; and all
That woman can be, I have been, or am;
A daughter, sister, consort, mother, widow.
Whiche'er of these thou art, O be the friend
Of one who is what thou canst never be!
Look on thyself, thy kindred, home, and country;
Then fall upon thy knees, and cry, "Thank God,
An English woman cannot be a slave!"
Art thou a man? Oh! I have known, have lov'd,
And lost, all that to woman man can be;
A father, brother, husband, son, who shar'd
My bliss in freedom, and my woe in bondage:
A childless widow now, a friendless slave.
What shall I ask of thee; since I have nought
To lose but life's sad burthen; nought to gain
But heaven's repose? These are beyond thy power.
Me, wretched! thou canst neither wrong nor help.
What then? Go to the bosom of thy family,
Gather thy little children round thy knees,
Gaze on their innocence, their cheerful eyes
All fix'd on thine, and in their mother mark
The loveliest look that woman's face can wear,
Her look of love beholding them and thee;
Then at the altar of your household joys,
Vow one by one, vow altogether, vow
With heart and voice, eternal enmity
Against oppression by your brethren's hands:
Till man nor woman under British laws,
Nor son nor daughter born within her empire,
Shall buy, or sell, or hold, or be, A SLAVE!

THE BLASPHEMER CUT OFF IN HIS SIN.

MR. EDITOR,

The following awful instance of unprepared death was related as a recent fact by the clergyman of the place where it occurred. Thinking it may be useful to some of your Readers, I beg to send you the particulars, as nearly as I can recollect them.

Sir ——— is in the habit of visiting the village of ——— annually, and bringing with him about half a dozen young men, profligates like himself. While these misnamed gentlemen continue in the place they are the pest of the neighbourhood, polluting all the young people who come in their way. One of these dissolute young men was sitting drinking with a party of others. In a state of intoxication, he and another agreed, for a sum of money, to try their skill in blasphemy; the prize to be given to him who should be unanimously considered to have poured out the most horrible imprecations and blasphemies. The above-mentioned young man, having been more accustomed to the scenes of high life than his antagonist, and being also perfectly familiar with all kinds of sea-slang, was unanimously acknowledged conqueror.

Crowned with this hellish honour, he left the place; but not reaching home so soon as was expected, a person was dispatched in search of him. The wretched man was found in a field near a ditch, QUITE DEAD, and a scythe near him. From the position of the body, it was supposed, that he had taken up the scythe, intending either to throw it into the ditch for a frolic, or to try his skill at a stroke; but, being in liquor, he had fallen over on the scythe's sharp edge: for he was found lying in a pool of his own blood, with the main artery of his thigh completely cut through. He must have died in a few minutes after the cut. Thus, in a fit of drunkenness, and bearing off the prize as the most accomplished blasphemer, he was hurried into eternity!

SCRIPTURAL EDUCATION,

A HINT TO TEACHERS.

Individual and national happiness, it is admitted by every intelligent person, depends principally on a proper education. Admitting the Bible to have been given by divine inspiration, that education must be seriously defective, if not in many respects pernicious, which is not grounded on an extensive training by the Holy Scriptures. Infidels, in all cases, are grossly ignorant of the contents of the sacred volume: and though we are not of opinion that Infidelity is solely the fruit of ignorance, we are certain it is so in a very great degree. Infidelity arises from the natural alienation of the heart from God: but this fatal principle is nourished by ignorance, and especially by the absence of pure scriptural knowledge.

There is one work, WATTS'S SCRIPTURE HISTORY, which especially we wish to recommend to the Teachers of Youth of both sexes, as an invaluable lesson book. It is probably the most instructive of the kind, and well adapted to serve as an introductory Commentary on the Bible. It may now be purchased in a very neat form for a couple of shillings, with the explanatory plates annexed. At least once a week this might be read with incalculable advantage to the young: and though we do not undervalue the Histories of England, Greece, and Rome, as necessary class books, we are persuaded that Watts's little volume is beyond comparison superior in importance.

A FATHER, AND TEACHER.

THE MOMENT OF DEATH.

"How wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan."—Jer. xii. 5.

When on the verge of death I stand,
With Time's dread confine close at hand,
As then I pause on being's brink,
Assist me, Saviour, as I sink.

Speak but the word, in mercy say
Thou art my hope, my soul's blest stay:
Oh! gently whisper I'm forgiv'n,
And point my parting soul to heav'n.

There's not a cloud shall dim the way,
If thus I hear my Saviour say.
Though lightnings flash, though thunders roll,
Though earthquakes break from pole to pole,

My soul serene shall then abide,
If God my Saviour be my guide;
To meet Him, joyful I will fly,
Scarce heeding life's last fleeting sigh.

Though dark, though drear, I'll hail the road
Which leads my spirit to its God;
And Death shall not a victory cry,
For I am conqueror when I die.

MISSIONARY INSTITUTION AT BASLE, IN SWITZERLAND.

GENERAL NOTICES OF SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland, the ancient Helvetia of Cæsar, by whose conquests and writings it has been rendered famous, is bounded by France, Germany, Austria, and Italy. It has been celebrated by travellers as the most picturesque and romantic country in Europe. It is considered the most mountainous district in the globe; though the Andes in South America, and the Himalayas of Nepaul, in Northern India, may be more stupendous and elevated than the Alps. The towering Alps, crowned with everlasting snows, and rendered still more dreary by immense fields of ice, resembling a stormy sea, are contrasted with valleys of the most luxuriant fertility and beauty; and the varied surface of the whole, is such as would be sought in vain in any other country upon earth.

Switzerland is about 200 miles long from east to west, and about 130 broad from north to south. In the southern division especially, the mountains Titlis, Yungfrahorn, Shruckhorn, Monch, Eiger, Finsteraar, Glockner, and Ostele, raise their lofty summits from 10,000 to 12,000 feet above the level of the sea; and Mont Rasa, and Mont Blanc, are computed as having an elevation of more than 15,000 feet.

Switzerland is equally famous for its lakes: they are numerous, and some of them of considerable magnitude, exhibiting on their borders the most enchanting landscapes, whose beauties have repeatedly been celebrated by writers of great respectability. The larger lakes are those of Constance,	length 45 miles,	breadth 15 miles.

Geneva	40	9
Neufchatel	25	4
Zurich	25	4
Lucerne	15	5

From its mountains and valleys, Switzerland, as may be expected, possesses almost every variety of climate, yet the air is reckoned pure and salubrious. Delicious fruits of various kinds, and excellent corn, abound in this country; but the principal wealth of the inhabitants consists in their cattle.

Switzerland is divided into twenty-two provinces, called Cantons, which form a confederacy for their mutual support and defence; and the government is administered by a General Diet, the President of which is styled the Lundamman. The population of this country in 1828 amounted to 2,037,030.

Literary and Religious Notices of Switzerland.

Switzerland, in a literary and religious point of view, will be most interesting to the readers of the Christian's Penny Magazine. Its learned writers have been considerable, in consequence of liberty having been extensively enjoyed by its inhabitants. Several of the name of Gesner have acquired great celebrity; among whom, Conrad Gesner, called the German Pliny, one of the greatest writers on Natural History; and Solomon Gesner, a poet, called the German Theocritus. Paracelsus, Bonnet, Hirzel, Haller, and Zimmerman, are names well known as Physicians: the Bernoullis and Euler, celebrated mathematicians, were natives of this country. Moser, a native of Schaffhausen, originated the Royal Academy of Arts in London, of which he died the keeper. Necker, the French financier, and De Lolme, author of the "Constitution of England," were natives of Switzerland: and Lavater, the physiognomist, is known in every part of Europe.

Among its celebrated divines and preachers, are reckoned Zuingle, Calvin, Bullinger, Beza, and the Turretines, father and son.

.Religious professors in Switzerland are divided into two classes, Protestants of the Reformed or Calvinistic creed, and Roman Catholics. Of the former there are said to be 1,218,110, and of the latter 817,110, besides 1,810 Jews. The standard creed of the Protestants, is the Helvetic Confession of Faith, agreeing in substance with the doctrinal articles of the Church of England, and with the Confession of Faith of the Church of Scotland; and their discipline is Presbyterian, similar to the latter establishment.

"While Luther was labouring to promote the noble work of reformation in Germany, God graciously caused the light of evangelical truth to shine upon Switzerland. In 1516, Zuinglius, a canon of Zurich, of learning perhaps superior to Luther, and of like intrepidity of spirit, expounded the Scriptures, and testified against the abominations of popery. Samson, an Italian monk, selling indulgences in Switzerland in 1617, roused the indignation of Zuinglius, who, being encouraged by some learned colleagues, who had been educated in Germany, boldly opposed the impious traffic.

"Pope Adrian in vain endeavoured to gain Zuinglius by promises. He employed Faber, afterwards bishop of Vienna, to dispute with him; but the reformer, appealing to the word of God, was unconquered. He published his sentiments in 1523, in sixty-seven particulars, all confirmed by passages of Holy Scripture.

"At Basil, in 1520, Wolfgang, Capito, and Œcolampadius, introduced the doctrines of the Reformation with success.

"In 1522, Hofmeister published them in Schaffhausen, and Haller maintained them in Berne.

"The Cantons of Zurich, Basil, Berne, Schaffhausen, and also parts of Appenzel and Glaris, having embraced the Reformation, were obnoxious to the nine popish cantons, who took up arms to compel them to return to the Catholic church. They were resisted by the troops of the reformed party. Zuinglius accompanied them as chaplain, in 1531, and fell in one of their engagements. The papists found him lying among the wounded, with eyes uplifted to heaven; and as he would not comply with their wishes, to confess to the Virgin Mary, they murdered him. The same year, many having perished on both sides by the sword, a peace was concluded, on the condition that each canton should retain its own form of religion. The celebrated Helvetic Confession of Faith was prepared and adopted by their synod in 1566.

"Zuinglius was succeeded in the church of Zurich, by Bullinger, a man worthy of that age. After labouring for the faith of Christ, he died in the assured hope of glory, in 1575. Death approaching, among other delightful things, he said, 'I rejoice exceedingly to be taken from this corrupt age, to get to my Saviour Christ. I am sure that I shall see my Saviour Christ, the saints, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and all the holy men who have lived from the beginning of the world. Since I am sure to partake of their felicity, why should not I be willing to die, to enjoy their perpetual society in glory?'"—Church History through all Ages, p. 205, 206.

Geneva was favoured with the last twenty-eight years of the ministry of the great French Reformer. "Calvin was singularly endowed, by the Father of lights, for eminent services in the church of Christ. He was a man of extraordinary genius, immense learning, and flowing eloquence; to which were added the most elevated piety, and indefatigable industry. All his talents were consecrated to the cause of Christ, from 1534, when he embraced the doctrines of the Reformation. He endured various persecutions from the king of France; to whom he dedicated his famous work, entitled, 'Institutes of the Christian Religion,' and in 1536, settled at Geneva. His numerous, learned, and orthodox commentaries, and other writings, rendered his name high authority; and, by his learning and wisdom, he became the principal director to all the reformers, in every nation throughout Europe, after the death of Luther."—Ibid. p. 208.

The Protestant doctrines continued to be taught at Geneva, and through the several reformed cantons, especially under Beza, who succeeded Calvin and died in 1605, and Turretin, another theological professor, who died in 1687, and his son, who died in 1737. But infidelity raging in France, scriptural religion declined in Switzerland, through the lukewarm professors of divinity becoming inclined to speculations rather than to serious godliness. They gradually fell therefore into a system of neology, resembling Socinianism, whose infidel creed many of them publicly countenanced. This was especially the case at Geneva: but a better state of things is arising in that lovely and romantic country.

"The canton of Berne has been distinguished for activity in the cause of Christ, by circulating the Scriptures, and promoting a missionary spirit. A Bible Society was formed at Bâsle in 1804, and others have since been instituted at Berne, Zurich, and several other places.

"An evangelical Missionary Society has been formed at Bâsle, from which several worthy missionaries have been sent forth, six of whom were ordained in 1822, to labour among the ignorant people on the shores of the Caspian sea.

"Dr. Malan, an evangelical minister of Geneva, has been for many years a zealous and successful labourer in that city, but not without molestation. On account of his noble stand for the gospel of Christ, 'he was deposed from his office as regent of the college, deprived of his ministerial character in the church, and he is indebted to the indulgence only of the government for the degree of toleration he has enjoyed, in being suffered to preach in a chapel which has been built for him without the walls.' Many religious tracts have been composed and circulated in great numbers, both in Switzerland and in France, by Dr. Malan, and chiefly at his own expense. But the visits of that distinguished preacher to England, have excited a lively interest in favour of the Swiss, and considerable assistance has been rendered to them by British Christians.

"Persecution in vexatious forms has arisen in various parts of Switzerland, and some of those ministers who have dared to preach the gospel, have drawn down upon them the frowns of their lukewarm brethren, whose influence with a worldly, irreligious magistracy, has generally prevailed. Thus a very numerous body of Dissenters has arisen and increased, and the pure truth of the gospel of Christ is extensively prevailing, not only by the direct ministry of zealous pastors, but by itinerant preachers, and by several periodical publications, which are eagerly read by the people.

"Notwithstanding this hostility, vital godliness is rapidly advancing in Switzerland, not only among dissenters, but among those of the established church. Sunday schools, and others on the British system, have been established in several cantons, and they are greatly flourishing, auxiliary to the gospel."—Church History through all Ages, p. 419—421.

Missionary Institution at Basle.

Bâsle is the largest city in Switzerland, though not so populous as Geneva, the latter city containing about 25,000 inhabitants, while the former is supposed not to contain much more than 16,000. The origin and progress of the Bâsle Missionary Institution, of which we give an engraving in the first page of this Number, we extract from No. 37 of the Church Missionary Society's Papers.

"It was in the last calamitous war, in the year 1815, that the spirit of Missions struck its first roots in the hearts of some Christian friends at Bâsle, in Switzerland. In this eventful year, a Russian army encamped on one side of our town; and, on the other side, the fortress of Huningen began to pour out a dreadful torrent of bombs against our dwellings. In these sorrowful moments, the Lord of the elements sent a very violent east-wind, which had a wonderful effect on the fire of the enemy. The bombs were exhausted in the air before they could reach our homes, without injury to any life of the inhabitants. While the fire of the fortress was, in a remarkable manner, quenched by the wind of God, a holy flame of missionary zeal was kindled in the hearts of some Christian friends. They resolved to establish a Missionary Seminary, as a monument of this most remarkable salvation of our town, and to train up a number of pious teachers for the instruction of the Heathen and Mohammedan tribes, who were sent from the interior of Asia to be our deliverers."

The Rev. Theophilus Blumhardt, in 1822, stated in his speech, from which the above was taken—"In the first year, 1816, we had only a few rooms, inhabited by a small number of missionary scholars: by the sixth year, the blessing of God had enabled our Committee to prepare a Missionary College. In the first year, we had an income of little more than 50*l*.: in the sixth year, the blessing of our Lord increased it to about 5000*l*. In the first year, our Society consisted only of a small number of Christian friends at Bâsle: by the sixth year, more than forty Auxiliary Societies had been established, in Switzerland, in Germany, and among the Protestants of France, to support the work of our God. In the first year, a very small number of Christian friends met together in our monthly prayer meetings: and now, the grace of the Lord has opened, in many parts of the Continent, cathedrals, and churches, and halls, to the heavenly influence of the Missionary spirit. This is the work of our gracious God, and unto Him alone be all the praise and the glory for ever!"

The number of students also greatly increased. Mr. Blumhardt began, in 1816, with two. These soon increased to ten. In the latter part of 1818, nine more were received: in the beginning of 1821, thirteen: towards the close of 1822, twelve: and about the end of 1823, eleven; making a total of fifty-five.

The course of studies continues four years, and the whole of each week-day is laid out for study, except necessary recreation, from five in the morning till ten at night. Mr. Blumhardt has the direction of the Biblical and Theological studies. The Rev. Mr. Haeudel is rector of the Institution, and the Rev. Mr. Schlatter instructs them in languages and general knowledge.

One who had been a student in this seminary for three years, writes of it: "It is an Institution of God—a house of peace and love—an altar, from which daily ascend fervent prayers, both for the salvation of him who prays, and for the perishing souls of the Heathen: and so long as the spirit of prayer, zeal, love, and humility, remains thus therein, so long will it be a house of God, and a blessing to thousands."

Surely every Christian will include this Institution in his supplications at the throne of the heavenly grace, when he bears upon his heart the Church Missionary College at Islington, with the Colleges of the London, Baptist, and other kindred Societies for the promotion of the same glorious object, in every part of the world!

THE WISE TAKEN IN THEIR OWN CRAFTINESS.

Mr. Editor,

Considering that any communications relative to the first circulation of the Holy Scriptures in English would be acceptable to your Readers, I send you the following. H.

"Tunstal, bishop of London, with Sir Thomas More, being sorely grieved by Tyndal's translating the New Testament, anno 1526, at Antwerp (in which place Tyndal had sought refuge), devised how they might destroy that false, erroneous translation, as they called it. It happened that one Augustine Packington, a mercer, was then at Antwerp, where the Bishop then was. This man favoured Tyndal, but showed the contrary unto the bishop. The bishop being desirous to bring his purpose to pass, communed how that he would gladly buy the New Testaments. Packington hearing this, said, 'My lord, I can do more in the matter than most merchants that be here, if it be your pleasure; for I know the Dutchmen and strangers that have bought them of Tyndal, and have them here to sell: so that, if it be your lordship's pleasure, I must disburse the money to pay for them, or else I cannot have them; and so I will assure you to have every book of them that is printed and unsold.' The bishop, thinking he had the matter secured, said, 'Do your diligence, Mr. Packington: get them for me, and I will pay whatever they cost; for I intend to burn and destroy them all at St. Paul's Cross.'

"Then Mr. Packington went unto Tyndal, and declared the whole matter; and so, upon comport made between them, the bishop had the books, Packington the thanks, and Tyndal the money.

"After this, Tyndal corrected the same New Testament again, and caused them to be newly imprinted, so that they came thick and threefold over to England. When the bishop perceived that, he sent for Packington, and said to him, 'How cometh this, that there are so many New Testaments abroad?' Then answered Packington, 'Surely I bought all that were to be had; but I perceive they have printed more since. I see it will never be better so long as they have letters and stamps: wherefore you were best to buy the stamps too, and so you shall be sure.' At which answer the bishop smiled, and so the matter ended."
